The use of the word "damaged" in this section in connection with the word "taken" indicates clearly that the damage contemplated was such as would result from the making of an improvement in which the right of eminent domain might be called into use.

The first sentence directly and specifically inhibits the taking or damaging of private property for public or private use without just compensation. It is in no wise limited by the following provisions which prescribe the procedure in the appropriation of private property to a public use. The inhibition applies wherever condemnation proceedings are or might be necessary, or proper, whether such proceeding is instituted or not. The provision being thus limited, it may be held, as has been done in many jurisdictions, that the right of recovery under such a constitutional provision is not limited to actions maintainable at common law. This construction obviates the possible objection, suggested by Judge Helm in Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, 10 Colo. 403, 15 Pac. 714, that if actions for compensation were not limited to those maintainable at common law, a landowner might be liable to an adjoining lot owner for "incidental injuries occasioned by a prudent exercise of his right of dominion."

The full purpose of the provision cannot be effected if the rule announced in the Dickman Case is to prevail. Under that rule, where condemnation proceedings are instituted in the making of a public improvement, a property owner, no part of whose property was taken, and who was not, therefore, a party to the proceedings, would be without remedy, save in a case of negligence, no matter how greatly his property might be damaged by the improvement.

Under that rule, if a part of a property is taken, the owner may recover the value of what is taken, and such damages to the residue as result from the taking; but one whose property does not abut upon the improvement, although damaged, is without remedy, because he has no right to begin condemnation proceedings. It is so held in Stetson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. 75 Ill. 74. However, such an owner is not in fact without remedy; he may bring his action for damages. Rigney v. Chicago, 102 Ill. 64; Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Heisel, 47 Mich. 393, 11 N. W. 212; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fuller, 63 Tex. 467; Gottschalk v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 14 Neb. 550, 16 N. W. 475, 17 N. W. 120; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Miller, 132 U. S. 75, 33 L. ed. 267, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 34; Brown v. Seattle, 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 34 Am. St. Rep. 839, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214; Atlanta v. Green, 67 Ga. 386;

St. Louis v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. 272 Mo. 80, 197 S. W. 107; Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6; Jackson v. Kiel, 13 Colo. 378, 6 L.R.A. 254, 16 Am. St. Rep. 207, 22 Pac. 504; Pueblo v. Strait, 20 Colo. 13, 24 L.R.A. 392, 46 Am. St. Rep. 273, 36 Pac. 789, 20 C. J. 672-739. And this is true where a public improvement is constructed without condemnation proceedings. Elgin v. Eaton, 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412. In this respect he is not limited to the cases in which he had a right of action at common law, but may sue for damages suffered, though there be no negligence in the making of the improvement in question. Denver Circle R. Co. v. Nestor, supra; Rear-don v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492, 56 Am. Rep. 109, 6 Pac. 317; Chicago v. Taylor, 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; White v. Metropolitan West Side R. Co. 154 Ill. 620, 39 N. E. 270; Aldis v. Union Elev. R. Co. 203 Ill. 567, 68 N. E. 95. The latter case holds that in an action by a property owner for damages the measure of damages and the rules of evidence are the same as in a direct proceeding by condemnation.

Eminent domain—
injury by public improvement—right to damages.

All these cases, including those from this court, are in direct conflict with the holding in the Dickman Case, in which, it may be noted, there is no authority cited in support of the ruling under consideration. Denver v. Bayer, 7 Colo. 113, 2 Pac. 6, is cited, as to the purpose of the constitutional provision, the fact being apparently overlooked that the case is directly in conflict with the court's subsequent statement that said provision applies only to proceedings in eminent domain.

If the case is to stand, the frequently exercised right of recovery for damages in the making of public improvements, such as viaducts and bridges, the changing of street grades, etc., where damages are not assessed in eminent domain proceedings, or where the improvement is made without such proceedings, no longer exists in this jurisdiction.

In the case at bar, though the injuries are consequential, they are to the corpus of the plaintiff's property. No question is made but that the injury resulted from the placing of the bridge embankments as they are.

Upon a full view of the case, we are constrained to hold that the limitation in the Dickman Case to damages such as might be recovered in eminent domain proceedings was without justification. We therefore hold that the rule there announced does not properly construe the constitutional provision in question, and it cannot defeat plaintiff's right of recovery. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled, and there was no error in the entering of judgment on the verdict.

The judgment is accordingly affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Right under constitutional provision against taking or damaging, to recover in other than an eminent domain proceeding, for consequential damages to property no part of which is taken.

That the constitutional provision against taking or damaging property may, as held in the reported case (LOGAN COUNTY v. ADLER, ante, 512), be invoked in a proceeding other than an eminent domain proceeding, seems to be well settled. It is settled more by practice, however, than by direct adjudication upon the point. That the rights guaranteed by this constitutional provision may be enforced and applied in an action in damages is held in Dallas County v. Dillard (1908) 156 Ala. 354, 18 L.R.A. (N.S.) 884, 47 So. 135; Hamilton v. Alabama Power Co. (1915) 195 Ala. 438, 70 So. 737. And see cases set out infra.

In one case in which an owner of two lots a part of one of which was being taken in an eminent domain proceeding for a railroad was seeking to obtain damages to the lot not taken and separated from the first one by a street, the court, in denying his right to have the damages to the second lot included in the damages allowed in the eminent domain proceeding, says that if, by the construction and operation of the railroad on the first lot, the property of the owner in the second lot will be specially damaged, and the damages sustained by him are not common to the public, he has a complete remedy in an action at law to recover all damages sustained.

White v. Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. (1894) 154 Ill. 620, 39 N. E. 270.

The court in Aldis v. Union Elev. R. Co. (1903) 203 Ill. 567, 68 N. E. 95, says that where no property is taken, the improvement may be made before the damages are ascertained and paid, and in such a case the property owner is driven to his action at law for damages, but that such action is in the nature of a condemnation suit, and, when resorted to, the measure of damages and rules of evidence which are to be adopted are the same as though a direct proceeding had been brought to determine the amount of damages to be paid prior to the making of the improvement.

In denying the right of an adjoining owner to be made a party to a condemnation proceeding of a lot of land for the purpose of building thereon a jail, the court in Mercer County v. Wolff (1908) 237 Ill. 74, 86 N. E. 708, after stating that the damages to the adjoining owner were entirely consequential, says that, when no part of the land of an abutting owner is taken, the Constitution does not require the ascertainment and payment of his consequential damages before entry can be made upon the property condemned, that "damages resulting to an abutting proprietor no part of whose land is physically taken are not within the contemplation of the eminent domain act, but he is remitted to his action at law for his damages."

In Cook v. Lehigh Valley R. Co. (1920) 181 N. Y. Supp. 217, where a railroad company had interfered with an easement without instituting action for condemnation, the court held that the owner of the easement was entitled to maintain an action in damages. This decision, however, refers to a statute providing a tribunal for the ascertainment of damages arising to property owners whose lands are either taken or injured.

In Gram Constr. Co. v. Minneapolis, St. P. & S. Ste. M. R. Co. (1916) 36 N. D. 164, 161 N. W. 732, an action by a property owner to recover for damages occasioned to plaintiff's property by the construction and operation of a spur track in front of the same, the court says: "An action for damages is, in such a case, indeed similar to a condemnation proceeding and the injury to the property from the construction of the railroad can be estimated even though the amount of the future traffic is not actually proved."

In Chester County v. Brower (1888) 117 Pa. 647, 2 Am. St. Rep. 713, 12 Atl. 577, an action on the case to recover damages of a county caused by the erection of a county bridge, the court, after stating that the legislature had not provided any remedy to enforce the constitutional provision that municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements, says: "But the Constitution confers a right upon the citizen to recover consequential damages in certain cases, and he cannot be deprived of that right by the neglect or omission of the legislature. When a right exists, and no adequate remedy is provided, it may be enforced by an action on the case."

In sustaining the right of an abutting owner to maintain an action in damages against a railroad which had constructed and was operating its road in the street in front of his property, the court says that, by the addition of the guaranty against damaging property, to that against taking property, the right was conferred to sue for damages for the injury sustained, and not the right to arrest the progress of the work until compensation was made or secured. Settegast v. Houston, O. L. & M. P. R. Co. (1905) 38 Tex. Civ. App. 623, 87 S. W. 197.

In sustaining an action in damages under a constitutional provision against taking or damaging private property for public use without compensation, the court in Swift & Co. v. Newport News (1906) 105 Va. 108, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 404, 52 S. E. 821, says that when, in a constitutional provision, damage to private property is forbidden, but no remedy is pointed out, and no statute affords one for the invasion of the right of property thus secured, the constitutional provision is self-executing, and the common law which provides a remedy for every wrong will furnish the appropriate action for the redress of such grievance.

An action for damages for injury done to real estate by a change of grade was sustained in Nelson County v. Loving (1919) 126 Va. 283, 101 S. E. 406, on the theory advanced in Swift & Co. v. Newport News (Va.) supra.

It is stated in Frankle v. Jackson (1887) 30 Fed. 398, that under a constitutional provision against damaging property without compensation, any lot owner the value of whose lot is diminished by the laying of a railroad track and the running of trains in the street in front thereof may have an action for such damages.

Equitable and extraordinary legal remedies have frequently been denied the landowner on the theory that he has an adequate remedy in damages. In denying the right of a person whose property was damaged by a regrading of a street, to mandamus to compel the institution of condemnation proceedings, the court in State ex rel. Whitten v. Spokane (1916) 92 Wash. 667, 159 Pac. 805, says that the landowner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law to recover damages, and therefore the action in mandamus will not lie. An injunction was denied in Thorberg v. Hoquiam (1914) 77 Wash. 679, 138 Pac. 304, in favor of a landowner who had permitted a city to begin and prosecute a street improvement involving a change of grade, until near completion, to restrain the city from further proceedings in the improvement on the theory that the plaintiff's only remedy in the case was to recover damages. Under the West Virginia constitutional provision that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation; nor shall the same be taken by any company incorporated for the purpose of internal improvements until just compensation shall have been paid or secured to be paid to the owner; and when private property shall be taken or damaged for public use for the use of such corporations compensation to the owner shall be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by general law,"—an owner who is merely damaged by the erection of a public improvement is not entitled to an injunction restraining the improvement until his damages have been ascertained, but must sue the improvement company doing the damage in a court of law. Spencer v. Pt. Pleasant & O. River R. Co. (1884) 23 W. Va. 406. A decision similar to the Spencer Case appears in Watson v. Fairmont & Suburban R. Co. (1901) 49 W. Va. 528, 39 S. E. 193. In denying a motion for a temporary injunction by a lot owner to enjoin a railroad from constructing and operating its railway on the street in front of his property, the court in Lorie v. North Chicago City R. Co. (1887) 32 Fed. 270, says that if the complainant can show that the construction and maintenance of the tracks in front of his premises will result in a special injury to him, not a mere injury which he will sustain in common with the public at large, his remedy will be at law for the special damage, and not by injunction.

A landowner whose injuries from the construction of a drain were consequential was left to his action for damages in Woodlawn Trust & Sav. Bank v. Drainage Dist. (1918) 163 C. C. A. 562, 251 Fed. 568, and an injunction denied.

An injunction was denied in Stetson v. Chicago & E. R. Co. (1874) 75 Ill. 74, to an owner of property whose damages were consequential from the construction of a railroad, on the theory that he will be left to his action at law. This case was approved in Moore v. Atlanta (1883) 70 Ga. 611. The decision in the Georgia case is criticized in Brown v. Seattle (1892) 5 Wash. 35, 18 L.R.A. 161, 31 Pac. 313, 32 Pac. 214, on a point not within the scope of this note; that is the right of the landowner to an injunction. The court in the Washington case points out that the Georgia constitutional provision is that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public purposes without just and adequate compensation being "first" paid. The Washington court granted the injunction, but this, as above stated, that is, the right to an injunction, is not within the scope of this annotation. The court in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Darke (1893) 148 Ill. 226, 35 N. E. 750, says: "The Constitution gives to every property owner whose property is damaged for a public use the right to compensation, and while he cannot sue as for a nuisance where his property has been damaged by a public improvement erected and maintained in pursuance of law, his right to compensation remains and may be enforced by any appropriate remedy."

It is stated in Southern R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1921) — Va. —, 105 S. E. 663, that if the owner of private property which is damaged, but not taken, is not a party to the proceeding to condemn the property of another, and his rights have not been passed upon, he may maintain an action at law to recover just compensation. The right to recover such compensation is not restricted to the proceeding in which the right of eminent domain is exercised.

That incidental damages can only be recovered in the method provided by the statute authorizing a company to exercise the power of eminent domain, is stated in Moraski v. T. A. Gillespie Co. (1921) 239 Mass. 44, 131 N. E. 441, citing Perry v. Worcester (1856) 6 Gray (Mass.) 544, 66 Am. Dec. 431, and Saltonstall v. New York C. R. Co. (1921) 237 Mass. 391, 130 N. E. 185.

The Pennsylvania constitutional provision that "municipal and other corporations and individuals invested with the privilege of taking private property for public use shall make just compensation for property taken, injured, or destroyed by the construction or enlargement of their works, highways, or improvements, which compensation shall be paid or secured before such taking, injury, or destruction," is held in Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Marchant (1888) 119 Pa. 541, 4 Am. St. Rep. 659, 13 Atl. 690, to be intended to apply to such injuries as are capable of being ascertained at the time the works are being constructed or enlarged, and not from the future operation or management of the work. The provision that the damages shall be paid in advance, or security given therefor in advance, is held to require this construction.

It was held, however, in Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Walsh (1889) 124 Pa. 544, 10 Am. St. Rep. 611, 17 Atl. 186, that where a railroad was laid in a street, close to the curbstone in front of abutting property, and has continuously and constantly run locomotives and trains of passenger and freight cars over the track, that the injury is caused by the construction of the road, and not by its operation, within the meaning of this rule and therefore damages are recoverable. This was on the theory that the access to the property was interfered with. In the subsequent case of Pennsylvania Schuylkill Valley R. Co. v. Ziemer (1889) 124 Pa. 560, 17 Atl. 187, recovery was allowed for the construction of a railroad in a public street in such a way as to interfere with drainage.

In Stork v. Philadelphia (1900) 195 Pa. 101, 49 L.R.A. 600, 45 Atl. 678, it was held that the appropriate remedy for enforcing the constitutional guaranty is not in a proceeding before viewers, but for injury by negligent performance of the work; the remedy must be by action of trespass. This case is followed in Curran v. East Pittsburg (1902) 20 Pa. Super. Ct. 590, and Cooper v. Scranton City (1902) 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 17.

In Parish v. Yorkville (1913) 96 S. C. 24, L.R.A.1915A, 282, 79 S. E. 635, it is held that if a municipality fails to take the initiative by proceedings under the condemnation statute to condemn property which is injured by the pollution of a stream from sewage, the landowner may institute such a proceeding or compel the municipality to proceed to condemn the right. The court did not decide whether the landowner had a right of action in damages, saying that that was unnecessary. The constitutional provision invoked in this case seemingly forbade only the taking of private property.

That the owner of property may compel the institution of an eminent domain proceeding, see Stockdale v. Rio Grande Western R. Co. (1904) 28 Utah, 201, 77 Pac. 849.

In North Sterling Irrig. Dist. v. Dickman (1915) 59 Colo. 169, 149 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 973, disapproved in the reported case (LOGAN COUNTY v. ADLER, ante, 512), an owner of land brought an action against an irrigation company to recover damages for injury to his land as a result of seepage from a ditch constructed and operated by the irrigation company. No negligence in the construction of the ditch was alleged, the plaintiff relying upon the constitutional provision that private property shall not be taken or damaged for public or private use without just compensation. In denying the right to recover, the court takes the general theory, as stated in the reported case, that this constitutional provision refers to and is limited to proceedings in eminent domain or to cases where injury results by reason of the taking of property in which the abutting owner has an interest.

In a number of cases the right to recover for consequential damages, under such a constitutional provision, in an action in damages, has been sustained.

United States.—Chicago v. Taylor (1887) 125 U. S. 161, 31 L. ed. 638, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820; Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. v. Wolf (1906) 78 C. C. A. 589, 148 Fed. 961; Idaho & W. N. R. Co. v. Nagle (1911) 106 C. C. A. 578, 184 Fed. 598.

Arkansas.—Hot Springs R. Co. v. Williamson (1885) 45 Ark. 429, affirmed in (1890) 136 U. S. 121, 34 L. ed. 355, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 955.

California.—Eachus v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1894) 103 Cal. 614, 42 Am. St. Rep. 149, 37 Pac. 750.

Georgia.—Atlanta v. Green (1881) 67 Ga. 386; Campbell v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1889) 82 Ga. 320, 9 S. E. 1078; Smith v. Floyd County (1890) 85 Ga. 420, 11 S. E. 850; Austin v. Augusta Terminal R. Co. (1899) 108 Ga. 671, 47 L.R.A. 755; 34 S. E. 852.

Illinois.—Stone v. Fairbury, P. & N. W. R. Co. (1873) 68 Ill. 394, 18 Am. Rep. 556; Elgin v. Eaton (1876) 83 Ill. 535, 25 Am. Rep. 412; Rigney v.

Chicago (1881) 102 Ill. 64; Chicago & W. I. R. Co. v. Ayres (1883) 106 Ill. 511; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Trustees of Schools (1904) 212 Ill. 406, 74 N. E. 39.

Louisiana.—Helmer v. Colorado Southern N. O. & P. R. Co. (1908) 122 La. 141, 47 So. 443.

Minnesota.—Stuhl v. Great Northern R. Co. (1917) 136 Minn. 158, L.R.A.1917D, 317, 161 N. W. 501.

Mississippi.—Alabama & V. R. Co. v. Bloom (1893) 71 Miss. 247, 15 So. 72.

Texas.—Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Fuller (1885) 63 Tex. 467; Gainesville, H. & W. R. Co. v. Hall (1890) 78 Tex. 169, 9 L.R.A. 298, 22 Am. St. Rep. 42, 14 S. W. 259; Ft. Worth & R. G. R. Co. v. Downie (1891) 82 Tex. 383, 17 S. W. 620; Rische v. Texas Transp. Co. (1901) 27 Tex. Civ. App. 33, 66 S. W. 324; Novich v. Trinity & B. Valley R. Co. (1907) 45 Tex. Civ. App. 664, 101 S. W. 476; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Calkins (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 79 S. W. 852.

Utah.—Cook v. Salt Lake City (1916) 48 Utah, 58, 157 Pac. 643.

Washington.—Jacobs v. Seattle (1916) 93 Wash. 171, L.R.A.1917B, 329, 160 Pac. 299.

West Virginia.—Stewart v. Ohio River R. Co. (1893) 38 W. Va. 438, 18 S. E. 604. W. A. E.

PARKER WAGNER, By Guardian ad Litem, Respt.,
v.

MATHILDA A. MITTENDORF, Appt.

JENNIE P. WAGNER, Respt.,
v.

SAME, Appt.

New York Court of Appeals—February 3, 1922.

(232 N. Y. 481, 134 N. E. 539.)

Negligence — accidental aggravation of injury — liability.

One negligently breaking another's leg is liable to compensate him for a second break accidentally caused without his negligence, when, under the doctor's orders, he is beginning to get about.

[See note on this question beginning on page 524.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming judgments of a Trial Term for New York County in favor of plaintiffs, and from orders denying motions for new trial, in actions brought to recover damages for personal injuries to the minor plaintiff alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, and for loss of services. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. George S. Mittendorf and F. DeLysle Smith for appellant.

Messrs. Alfred W. Meldon and Joseph Force Crater for respondents.

Crane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While Parker Wagner, a young man eighteen years of age, was riding a motorcycle on the Albany Post road at Montrose, New York, he collided with a touring car owned by the defendant, breaking his right leg. These actions were brought, one by him to recover for his personal injuries, and the other by his mother to recover for her loss of services, which have resulted in verdicts for the plaintiffs in moderate sums. The judgments entered upon these verdicts having been unanimously affirmed by the appellate division, it is conclusively established thereby that the defendant, through her chauffeur, was negligent, that Parker Wagner was free from contributing neglect, and that the damages found have been sustained.

We, however, allowed an appeal to this court on exceptions taken to the admission of evidence bearing upon the injury and damage, presenting a question which we deemed to be of sufficient importance to review, as it had not heretofore been directly passed upon by this court.

After the accident the plaintiff was taken to the Peekskill hospital, where his leg was set in a plaster of paris cast. On October 25th he was able to get around on crutches and was taken by automobile from Peekskill to his home in Ninety-fourth street, New York city. Dr.

Ransom Parker, of that city, removed the plaster cast, and thereafter the plaintiff was able to get around on crutches, although unable to put the least weight on his foot. Dr. Parker, in his testimony, states that it was about the 10th of November that he removed the plaster cast, and found his leg in good condition, except that the upper part, the tibia, projected just a trifle beyond the lower part. There seemed to be a good union, but the leg was not absolutely straight. He advised the patient to get around and take a little exercise, as he thought it would strengthen up his leg, and because the muscles after being a long time in a cast become weakened. The doctor wanted them strengthened and told Wagner to exercise.

The plaintiff says that after the cast was taken off his leg he had been walking around with the assistance of his crutches, had been out, on a few little walks, out in the park, one day, and was just able to put the least little bit of weight on this foot.

The plaintiff then testified as follows:

I was a member of the Naval Militia at the time, and I wanted to go down and see Dr. Kimball. He was in the Medical Department of the Naval Militia. My duties were in the Medical Department down there, and I wanted to see Dr. Kimball and some of the boys, and also watch the drill, and I went down there in a taxicab with a couple of boys, who accompanied me, and while there I went to step over a doorsill, to go into one of the other rooms, and one of my crutches slipped, and I fell halfway, and hit this leg against a desk.

The plaintiff had refractured his leg, said Dr. Parker, at the same point exactly where it had been broken before. It had been rebroken. Over objection and exception, the plaintiff and his doctor then detailed his re-entry into the hospital and the consequences of this second fracture. The court charged the jury as follows: "Now upon the question of damages the question arises as to what effect the second injury that he received will have upon the damages. The law is this: 'If a person is injured, as the plaintiff was, and proceeds in accordance with the doctor's instructions and in a careful manner, reasonably careful manner in getting about, and another accident happens to him which results in aggravating his injury, without negligence on his part, then the added injury may be added to the original injury, and the damages may be compensation for all of the injury. If, on the other hand, the second injury was the result of the negligence of the plaintiff, disobedience of the instructions of his physician, for example, lack of care in going about, if the second injury results from lack of care, then the defendant may not be charged with the added injury so received. The defendant, in any event, is only liable for the injuries naturally resulting from the accident.'"

By reason of the unanimous affirmation all the facts are conclusively presumed to have been found in plaintiff's favor. The jury must, therefore, have found that the plaintiff did not break his leg the second time through any neglect or carelessness upon his part. Or else, if the jury found that the break was due to his neglect, then, under the instructions of the court, the defendant has not been harmed, as no damage has been allowed for the second break. We consider the charge as made by the trial court as substantially stating the correct rule of law for these facts. There has been no decision in this state, so far as we can ascertain, directly upon this point, although one or two cases suggest the rule.

In Lyons v. Erie R. Co. 57 N. Y. 489, the defendant objected to the plaintiff offering proof that the exercise which he took and which might have retarded his recovery was due to the advice of his physician. The evidence was held competent, Earl, J., saying: "When one receives an injury through the carelessness of another, he is bound to use ordinary care to cure and restore himself. He cannot recklessly enhance his injury and charge it to another. If his arm be broken he cannot omit to have it set, and charge the loss of the arm to the wrongdoer. He is not obliged to employ the most skilful surgeon that can be found, or resort to the greatest expense to ward off the consequence of an injury which another has inflicted upon him. He is bound to act in good faith and to resort to such means and adopt such methods reasonably within his reach as will make his damage as small as he can. But suppose he makes a mistake and innocently eats or exercises so as to retard his cure or impair his chances of recovery; or suppose he employs a physician who makes a mistake in his treatment, so that he is not as well or as soon restored as he otherwise would have been; who is to be responsible for the mistake? Can the wrongdoer, who has placed him in the position where he must make the choice of remedies and doctors, take advantage of such mistake? Can he shield himself from all the consequences of his wrong because the injured man has not adopted the best means and employed the best doctors? I think not. A wrongdoer breaks an arm; the injury is then done, and the arm for accidental aggravation of injury—liability.*

*Negligence—

the time is destroyed. He cannot complain that the injured person has failed to restore it so long as he has acted in good faith in its treatment, using the ordinary means within his reach." Page 490.

Matter of Phillips v. Holmes Exp. Co. 229 N. Y. 527, 129 N. E. 901, arose under the Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 67). The claimant, a chauffeur, received a fracture of the right forearm while cranking a motorcar. Some time thereafter the claimant returned to work, and while attempting to crank a car the fracture rebroke. After the first accident the policy of the Aetna Life Insurance Company expired, and the Maryland Casualty Company was the insurer at the time of the second break. Which insurance carrier was liable? We determined, in affirming the appellate division, that the latter injury was the result of the former, and that the first insurer should bear the entire liability.

Of course, these cases are not directly in point, but indicate that added injuries may be included in the damage provided they arose out of the first injury or would not have happened but for the first injury, and are not due to the neglect or carelessness of the injured party.

The precise question has, however, arisen in other states. In Hoseth v. Preston Mill Co. 49 Wash. 682, 96 Pac. 423, the plaintiff, about three months after he received his original injury, was permitted by his physician to go about the hospital wards on crutches, and as he was ascending the stairs from the wards one of his crutches slipped on the landing and he fell to the floor, rebreaking his leg. The supreme court of Washington said: "The rule is that the injured person must exercise reasonable care to effect a cure, both as to the selection of a physician and as to his own personal conduct, and if he does so he may recover all damages flowing naturally and proximately from the original injury. And in this case if the respondent was out on crutches under the instructions of his physician, and was in the exercise of due and reasonable care at the time of his fall, he may recover the entire damages sustained, provided, of course, the second injury was attributable to and would not have occurred except for the original injury."

In Conner v. Nevada, 188 Mo. 148, 161, 107 Am. St. Rep. 314, 86 S. W. 256, the plaintiff had broken her leg. While subsequently riding in a buggy with her husband before the fracture had united, the wheel of the carriage broke down and the broken bones slipped. The court said: "Whilst it was the duty of the plaintiff to have used reasonable care to promote a recovery, yet if she was guilty of no negligence in this respect and an accident happened to her in which the result was more serious because of her then condition than it would have been if she had not already been afflicted, such more serious result in reality becomes the result of the first accident. There was nothing to indicate that the plaintiff was imprudent in this respect; the accident occurred by the breaking down of the wheel of the vehicle, but for which there would have been no jar, and but for the already broken and yet ununited bone in her leg the jar would have produced no ill effect."

To the same effect is Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Hulsey, 132 Ala. 444, 31 So. 527.

The testimony regarding Parker Wagner's second fracture of his leg and the consequences resulting therefrom was competent and properly admitted by the trial judge. The charge of the court correctly stated the rule of law applicable to these circumstances. We find no error in the case justifying a reversal.

The judgments appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

Hiscock, Ch. J., and Hogan, Cardozo, Pound, McLaughlin, and Andrews, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of person causing injury for aggravation thereof by accident.

The liability of a person causing an injury, for the aggravation thereof due to a subsequent accident, is exhaustively discussed in the annotation in 9 A.L.R. 255. In the reported case (WAGNER v. MITTENDORF, ante, 520) and in two other recent cases the question has again been raised and decided.

It appeared in the reported case (WAGNER v. MITTENDORF) that the plaintiff had suffered a fractured leg, and that after the plaster cast had been removed he began to walk, on the advice of the attending physician, for the purpose of straightening his leg. While so doing, and while in the exercise of due care, he fell, refracturing his leg. The court holds the original wrongdoer to be liable for the aggravation of the injury, on the theory that the second injury was a sequence or natural result of the first fracture.

A like conclusion was reached in Stahl v. Southern Michigan R. Co. (1920) 211 Mich. 350, 178 N. W. 710. In that case it appeared that the plaintiff fell from one of defendant's cars while in the act of alighting therefrom. Following her fall, she was carried to her sister's home, who lived near by. A physician was called, and, after making a superficial examination, found an injury to the sciatic nerve, but was of the opinion that there were no fractures. She remained in bed for a time, and suffered much pain. When partially recovered, and while packing her suit case, it fell against her, and she lost her balance and fell to the floor, striking on the injured hip. Another physician was called, who found that the left hip was fractured. In an action for damages for both injuries the defendant contended that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover for any injuries which she may have suffered in the suit-case accident. The court said: "If the suit-case injury was the result of the injuries she received in the railway accident, and her own negligence did not contribute to it, she would be entitled to recover all of her damages against the defendant in this action. . . . Under this rule plaintiff was entitled to have the question submitted to the jury whether the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of the suit-case injury, with the instruction that, if they so found, she was entitled to recover all of her damages, if the suit-case accident were not caused or contributed to by her want of ordinary care."

It was held in Clayton v. Holyoke Street R. Co. (1920) 236 Mass. 359, 128 N. E. 460, that there was no error in a refusal to instruct the jury that there was no evidence that the plaintiff's fall in the hospital, some eight or nine weeks after the collision sued for, was the natural and proximate result of his original injury, the court saying that the "testimony of the plaintiff and physician, although meager, warranted the jury in finding that, while Clayton was attempting, with the aid of crutches, to walk in the hospital, he slipped on the floor and fell,—thereby fracturing his leg a second time." The court overruled the contention that the judge in the course of his charge erroneously told the jury, in effect, that the defendant was responsible for the second fracture, as a matter of law, saying: "While this portion of the charge is open to criticism, the defendant's counsel did not except to it at the trial, and cannot avail of it now. If he had called the erroneous statements to the attention of the judge, it is fair to assume that they would have been corrected. Indeed, the jury were charged, as requested by the defendant, that 'the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to prove that his fall in the hospital was the natural and proximate result of his injury occasioned by the collision with the street car, and not the result of a separate, independent, and intervening act for which the defendant is in no way responsible.'" A. S. M.

JAMES BOURLAND and Wife, Appts.,
v.
A. A. BAKER.

Arkansas Supreme Court — December 15, 1919.

(141 Ark. 280, 216 S. W. 707.)

Husband and wife — liability for torts of wife.

1. The common-law liability of a man for the torts of his wife was abrogated by the Married Woman's Act, and therefore he is not liable merely because she drove an automobile against a pedestrian to his injury.

[See note on this question beginning on page 528.]

Appeal — instructions — general — presumption as to action of jury.

2. Under an instruction to find against one alleged to have negligently injured another by driving an automobile against him, if from the evidence it is found that defendant was negligent, the jury will, in the absence of specific objections to the instruction, be presumed to consider only such grounds of negligence as are supported by the evidence, although others are alleged in the complaint.

Trial — instructions — general and specific — right to complain.

3. A defendant in a negligence case who obtains instruction on each allegation of negligence contained in the complaint cannot complain of general terms in an instruction given at the request of plaintiff, that they should find for him if defendant was found to be negligent.

— instructions — reference to complaint — incorporation of allegations.

4. An instruction to find for plaintiff if defendant was found to be negligent as charged in the complaint does not incorporate into the instruction exaggerated forms of lack of ordinary care charged in the complaint, where there are other positive instructions to the contrary.

— instruction as to liability of automobile driver.

5. An instruction cannot be given in an action to hold an automobile driver liable for injuring a pedestrian, exempting defendant from liability, if she temporarily took her eyes off the street to give attention to her children, without any reference to the circumstances under which the act was done.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Sebastian County (Little, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of an automobile by the defendant wife. Affirmed as to the defendant wife; reversed as to defendant husband.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. James B. McDonough and J. Sam Wood for appellants.

Mr. Edwin Hiner for appellee.

Humphreys, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellee instituted suit against appellants in the Sebastian circuit court, Ft. Smith district, to recover $11,000, on account of an injury received by him through the alleged negligent operation of an automobile by appellant Queen Bourland, wife of appellant James Bourland.

The allegations of negligence in the complaint consisted: First, in driving the car at a high and dangerous rate of speed; second, in driving it on the left, instead of the right, hand side of the street, in violation of a city ordinance; third, in driving it without giving the proper warning or keeping the proper lookout when approaching appellant.

Appellants filed answer, denying the material allegations in the complaint, and pleading the negligence of appellee as the proximate cause of the injury.

The cause was submitted to a jury, upon the pleadings and evidence, and a verdict and judgment rendered in favor of appellee for $2,000, from which an appeal has been duly prosecuted to this court.

Appellee was injured by an automobile driven by appellant Queen Bourland. When the injury occurred, he was walking south on the east side of North Thirteenth street, about midway between the suburban railway and North O street. Queen Bourland was on the front, and her little boy and infant on the back, seat of the chummy roadster she was driving. She was on the same side of the street and going the same direction appellee was walking. The street is straight, between the suburban railway and O street, and the distance between the two points about 200 yards. Appellee was near the curbing on the east side of the street. When struck, his legs were thrown under the car and his body on the outside, with his head lying very near the curbing. The car stopped just as the hind wheel reached him. He was severely injured, and as no question is made in regard to the amount of damages recovered, it is unnecessary to set out the nature of the injury.

The evidence on behalf of appellee tended to show that the car was being rapidly driven, and approached and struck him suddenly, without signal or warning, about 2 o'clock in the afternoon of September 17, 1918; that he heard the car, stepped to the east, giving almost the entire street, and did not look back because he expected it to pass around and not strike him; that the place where there should have been a sidewalk was rough and grown up in weeds; that the street was paved; and that he had chosen the east side of the street near the curbing upon which to travel, because automobiles usually traveled on the right-hand, or west, side of the street.

The evidence of appellants tended to show that, at the time of the injury, appellant Queen Bourland was driving her car at a slow rate of speed; that, when she reached and crossed the suburban, she looked in front and saw nothing; that she then looked back at the baby and told her boy to sit down; that she again glanced to the front and observed appellee immediately in front of her; that he had stepped in front of the car suddenly; that she did not see him at all until he stepped in front of the car; that she instantly shut off the engine, put on the brakes with both feet, and stopped the car; that the front wheel ran over appellee, but that the hind wheel stopped just as it reached him.

It is first insisted by appellant that there is no foundation in the allegations and evidence justifying the rendition of a judgment against appellant James Bourland, the husband of Queen Bourland. The verdict was returned and judgment rendered against James Bourland on the sole ground that a husband in this state is responsible for his wife's torts. At the common law, a husband was liable for the torts of his wife committed in his absence. That rule of liability is still in force in Arkansas, unless abrogated by Act 159, Acts of the Legislature of 1915, known as the Married Woman's Act. The reason existing for the rule at common law was the legal unity incident to the marriage relationship. It was reasoned that, on account of the unity, the husband could absolutely control his wife in and out of his presence. It followed that, because of this control, he could prevent his wife from committing a tort on another, even in his absence. The Married Woman's Act of 1915, as construed in the case of Fitzpatrick v. Owens, 124 Ark. 167, L.R.A.1917B, 774, 186 S. W. 832, 187 S. W. 460, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 772, had the effect of absolutely and completely destroying the legal unity founded upon the nuptial contract. The act has effectually severed the legal unity between husband and wife in this state. In holding that the emancipation of the wife was so complete that the wife might sue the husband for a tort committed by him on her person, this court said, in the case of Fitzpatrick v. Owens, supra: "These enactments [referring to the Married Woman's Acts antedating the Act of 1915] left but little in the way of restrictions upon the rights of married women, but the legislature deemed it proper to provide further legislation to completely emancipate her, and they did so by this statute [referring to the Married Woman's Act of 1915], which declares its purpose in the broadest terms, to 'remove the disabilities of married women.' An analysis of the language of the statute shows that the legislature meant to complete the work of emancipation and to give married women all the rights and remedies possessed by unmarried women. The words 'to sue and be sued,' when considered by themselves, merely enlarge the remedies of a married woman and do not enlarge her rights, but in considering the significance of those words we must do so in connection with the words which precede and which follow, and undoubtedly the use of those words serves to give a remedy for all the rights found to have been enlarged by the preceding words and those which follow. Now, the preceding words confer, in unqualified terms, the right of the married woman 'to contract and be contracted with,' and the words which follow declare in the very broadest terms her right 'in law and equity' to 'enjoy all rights and be subjected to all the laws of the state as though she were a feme sole.' If this language be given any effect at all in the light of preceding statutes enlarging the rights of the married woman, it necessarily means that a married woman is to enjoy in law and equity all the rights which she would enjoy if she still remained a single woman, and that with respect to those rights she may sue and be sued. . . . It was evidently meant to confer upon her the enjoyment of those rights and remedies, even against her husband, the same as if she were unmarried."

The legal unity, which was the reason of the rule fixing liability on the husband for his wife's torts, having been swept away by the act, the liability is swept away. The reason being dissolved, the rule cannot exist. It was therefore error to ^{Husband and wife—liability for torts of wife.} refuse to instruct the jury peremptorily to return a verdict for appellant James Bourland.

It is insisted that the court erred in giving instruction No. 4. The instruction is as follows: "Therefore, if you find from the evidence that the defendant Queen Bourland operated her car in a negligent manner at the time the plaintiff was injured, as charged in plaintiff's complaint, and that his injuries were the result of said negligence, you must find for the plaintiff, unless it affirmatively appears from the evidence that the plaintiff was at the time of his injury himself guilty of negligence contributing to the injury."

The instruction is assailed because, according to appellant's interpretation thereof, it submitted all the allegations of negligence set up in the complaint to the jury for consideration, whether supported by evidence or not. It is true evidence was not introduced in support of every allegation of negligence in the complaint. The trend of the evidence, however, limited the issues to whether the injury resulted from fast driving, failure to give a signal of warning, failure to keep a proper lookout, or whether due to appellee's own negligence; and, in the absence of specific objections to the general terms in which the allegations of negligence were submitted, it will be presumed that the jury considered only such grounds of negligence as were supported by the evidence. No specific objections were made to the instructions. Again, appellant Queen Bourland requested and obtained instructions submitting separately each allegation of negligence contained in the complaint, so said appellant is in no position to complain. The instruction is also assailed on the ground that it imposed an extraordinary degree of care upon said appellant to prevent the injury. It is contended the instruction must be read in connection with the allegation of the complaint to the effect that appellant Queen Bourland injured appellee "by her failure to keep a vigilant and constant lookout for persons lawfully upon the streets." This is only an allegation in an exaggerated form of a lack of ordinary care, and cannot be treated as an instruction imposing an extraordinary degree of care upon said appellant. No such inference could have been indulged by the jury in the face of positive instructions to the contrary. Instructions Nos. 2 and 7 necessarily enlightened the jury in this regard. The instructions referred to were as follows: " 'Negligence,' as defined and used in these instructions, is a failure to exercise ordinary care. 'Ordinary care' is such care as a reasonably prudent and careful person would be expected to exercise under the same or like circumstances."

Appeal—Instructions—general—presumption as to action of jury.

Trial—instructions—general and specific—right to complain.

—instructions—reference to complaint—incorporation of allegations.

"The rights of pedestrians and drivers of motorcars and other vehicles have equal rights to the use of the streets of the city. It is the duty of the one to use ordinary care and caution to prevent injury to another. It is likewise the duty of the other to use ordinary care and caution to avoid being injured."

It is also contended by appellant Queen Bourland that the court erred in refusing to give instruction No. 11 requested by her. That instruction exempted Queen Bourland from liability if she temporarily took her eyes off the street in front to give attention to her children while driving along. Such an act on her part might, or might not, have been negligent, dependent upon all the circumstances in the case. The instruction was properly refused.

—instruction as to liability of automobile driver.

It is also contended that the case was erroneously submitted upon the theory that appellant Queen Bourland was liable for the injury if driving on the left-hand side of the street. It was alleged in the complaint that she was driving on the left-hand side of the street, contrary to an ordinance of the city. No such proof was made, and, under our interpretation of instruction No. 4, no such issue was submitted to the jury.

The judgment is affirmed as to Queen Bourland, but is reversed and the cause dismissed as to James Bourland.

ANNOTATION.

Liability of husband for independent tort of wife.

I. Generally, 529.

II. In absence of statute:

- a. Florida, 529.
- b. Georgia, 529.
- c. Louisiana, 529.
- d. South Carolina, 530.
- e. Tennessee, 530.
- f. British Columbia, 530.
- g. Quebec, 530.

III. Under statute expressly abrogating or limiting common-law rule:

- a. Alabama, 531.
- b. Connecticut, 531.
- c. Georgia, 531.
- d. Illinois, 531.
- e. Indiana, 531.
- f. Maine, 532.
- g. Massachusetts, 532.

III.—continued.

- h. Michigan, 532.
- i. Missouri, 532.
- j. New York, 533.
- k. North Carolina, 534.
- l. Ohio, 534.
- m. Rhode Island, 535.
- n. South Carolina, 535.
- o. South Dakota, 535.
- p. Vermont, 535.
- q. Washington, 536.
- r. Ontario, 536.

IV. Under statute not expressly abrogating or limiting common-law rule:

- a. View that husband is relieved from liability:
 - 1. Arizona, 536.
 - 2. Arkansas, 536.
 - 3. Colorado, 537.

I. Generally.

At common law it was the general rule that a husband was civilly liable for the torts of his wife committed of her own volition during coverture. This liability on the part of the husband was founded mainly on the theory that, as the wife could not be sued alone, the injured person would be without redress unless the husband was held to be liable with her.

In most jurisdictions, statutes have been passed which either expressly abrogate or limit, or by implication are held to abrogate or limit, the common-law liability of the husband for the torts of his wife, committed by her without his participation. In some jurisdictions, however, statutes not expressly changing the common-law rule are strictly construed, and are held not to relieve the husband of his common-law liability.

In a few jurisdictions there has been apparently no statutory change in the common-law rule, and consequently the rule still prevails. In addition to the cases there cited, cases upholding the common-law rule in jurisdictions where a statute is now in force may be found in the subdivisions dealing with the law of those jurisdictions.

II. In absence of statute.

a. Florida.

In Florida a husband is held to be liable for the torts of his wife on the
20 A.L.R.—34.

IV. a.—continued.

- 4. Illinois, 537.
- 5. Kansas, 537.
- 6. Kentucky, 537.
- 7. Nebraska, 537.
- 8. New Hampshire, 537.
- 9. New Jersey, 538.
- 10. Pennsylvania, 538.
- 11. Utah, 539.
- b. View that husband is not relieved from liability:
 - 1. California, 539.
 - 2. Iowa, 539.
 - 3. Minnesota, 539.
 - 4. Missouri, 540.
 - 5. New York, 540.
 - 6. Ohio, 540.
 - 7. Texas, 540.
 - 8. West Virginia, 540.
 - 9. England, 541.

ground that at common law a suit cannot be maintained against the wife alone during coverture. Prentiss v. Paisley (1889) 25 Fla. 927, 7 L.R.A. 640, 7 So. 56. See also Graham v. Tucker (1908) 56 Fla. 307, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 531, 131 Am. St. Rep. 124, 47 So. 563.

b. Georgia.

In Georgia, under the common law, a husband is liable for the torts of his wife. See Smith v. Taylor (1852) 11 Ga. 20, wherein it was held that a husband was liable for slanderous words uttered by his wife. See infra, III. c, for a statute thus far apparently not construed by the courts.

c. Louisiana.

In Louisiana, it seems that a husband is not liable for the wrongful acts of his wife committed without his knowledge. See McClure v. McMartin (1901) 104 La. 496, 29 So. 227, an action for slander, wherein the court said: "There is no evidence before us upon the basis of which a judgment could be rendered against Mr. McMartin. In fact it is not shown that he is the husband of Mrs. McMartin. But, if that be conceded, it is not shown that he was cognizant of the utterances of his wife which have given rise to this suit, and we know of no law in Louisiana under which he could be held liable for the damages here claimed."

d. South Carolina.

In South Carolina, under the common law, a husband is liable for the torts of his wife. See Edwards v. Wessinger (1903) 65 S. C. 161, 95 Am. St. Rep. 789, 43 S. E. 518, wherein the court held that the husband may alone be responsible for a tort committed by his wife at his instigation, saying, with reference to the liability of the husband: "(1) If the tort is committed in the presence of the husband, and nothing more appears, it is his sole tort, as the wife is considered to have acted under his coercion. (2) If the tort is committed in his presence, but she appears to have acted deliberately and freely, it is their joint tort. (3) If the tort is committed in his presence and against his will, it is her tort, and he is liable with her. (4) If the tort is committed out of his presence but by his direction, she is jointly liable with him. (5) If the tort is committed out of his presence and without his knowledge or consent, he is liable with her."

See also Henderson v. Wendler (1893) 39 S. C. 555, 17 S. E. 851; McKeowen v. Johnson (1822) 12 S. C. L. (1 M'Cord) 578, 10 Am. Dec. 698.

The common-law rule applies to torts committed before marriage as well as to those committed by the wife during coverture. Hubble v. Fogartie (1831) 37 S. C. L. (3 Rich.) 413, 45 Am. Dec. 775. See also Bohe v. Frouner, infra, III. a, and contra, see Moffit v. Com. infra, IV. a, 10.

And where the wife, as administratrix, has committed a devastavit before marriage, the estate of the husband remains liable after his death. Knox v. Picket (1810) 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 92; Moone v. Henderson (1814) 4 S. C. Eq. (4 Desauss.) 459.

See also infra, III. n, for a statute thus far apparently not continued by the courts.

e. Tennessee.

At common law, in Tennessee, the husband is jointly liable with his wife for a personal tort committed by her. See Missio v. Williams (1914) 129 Tenn. 504, L.R.A.1915A, 500, 167 S. W. 473, holding that where a wife harbored vicious dogs on her own premises in the absence and without the knowledge of the husband, he was jointly liable with her, for injuries inflicted by them.

And in Price v. Clapp (1907) 119 Tenn. 425, 123 Am. St. Rep. 730, 105 S. W. 864, it was held that a husband was liable for a libel by his wife, but that he was liable for compensatory damages only, while she was liable for punitive damages. The court quoted with approval the language of the opinion in the case of Lee v. Atchley, an unreported decision of the same court, to the following effect: "It is well settled that the husband is not joined as defendant in such cases on the ground that the wife's misconduct is imputable to him, but for conformity's sake. His being a defendant results not from his participation in the wrong, but from the fact that the existence of the marriage relation makes it impossible for the injured party to sue the wife alone. To reach her, the husband must be joined in the action."

f. British Columbia.

In British Columbia a husband is liable in damages, under the common law, for a wrongful act, in the nature of a libel, committed by his wife. Mackenzie v. Cunningham (1901) 3 B. C. 206.

g. Quebec.

In Quebec the husband is not liable for the torts of the wife, when not commanded, authorized, or participated in, by him. Fortier v. Demers (1902) Rap. Jud. Quebec 21 C. S. 543. See also Dubuc v. Trottier (1901) Rap. Jud. Quebec 19 C. S. 202; Camiré v. Bergeron (1899) 3 Quebec Pr. Rep. 281.

Thus, it has been held, in an action for slander by a married woman, that her husband could not be held liable where it was not shown that he was present when the slander was uttered, or that he encouraged or became responsible therefor. Camiré v. Bergeron (1899) 3 Quebec Pr. Rep. 281.

And the husband is not liable for an injury received by a third person as a result of the wife's control and management of her property. Theoret v. Allen (1913) Rap. Jud. Quebec 43 C. S. 401.

III. Under statute expressly abrogating or limiting common-law rule.

a. Alabama.

In Alabama it is provided by statute that the husband shall not be liable for a tort of his wife in the commission of which he does not participate.

See Strouse v. Leipf (1893) 101 Ala. 433, 23 L.R.A. 622, 46 Am. St. Rep. 122, 14 So. 667, wherein the court said: "Our statute has changed the common law on this subject. Section 2345 of the Code declares that the husband is not liable for the torts of the wife, 'in the commission of which he does not participate; but the wife is liable . . . for her torts, and is suable therefor as if she were sole.' This has changed the entire law as to the manner of suing a married woman, and has rendered it improper to join the husband, when the charge is that the wife herself committed the tort."

But it was held in Hopper v. Crocker (1919) 17 Ala. App. 372, 85 So. 843, writ of certiorari denied in (1920) 204 Ala. 698, 85 So. 922, that notwithstanding the statute a husband who is, with his wife, the joint owner of a dog, is liable for an act of negligence in allowing the dog to run at large.

In Bobe v. Frowner (1850) 18 Ala. 89, it was held that at common law a husband was responsible for torts committed before marriage as well as for those committed by the wife during coverture.

b. Connecticut.

The Connecticut statute provides that an action may be sustained against a married woman "for any tort committed by her without the actual coercion of her husband." See Blakeslee v. Tyler (1887) 55 Conn. 397, 11 Atl. 855, holding that a husband was not liable for the act of his wife in wrongfully placing an obstruction on the public highway, in the absence of proof that she did it under his actual coercion.

c. Georgia.

The Georgia statute provides that a husband shall be liable for the torts of his wife committed "by his command or in the prosecution and within the scope of his business, whether the same be by negligence or voluntary." This statute, by declaring a liability in a limited class of cases, would seem to negative any liability in cases not falling within its scope, but it apparently has never been considered in a case dealing with the question of a husband's liability for the torts of his wife. For a case holding the common-law doctrine, see Smith v. Taylor (1852) 11 Ga. 20, see supra, II. b.

d. Illinois.

In Illinois the husband is expressly exempted from liability for his wife's torts, by a statute declaring that for civil injuries committed by a married woman her husband shall not be responsible, "except in cases where he would be jointly responsible with her, if the marriage did not exist." Christensen v. Johnston (1917) 207 Ill. App. 209.

But where the wife acts in the capacity of agent for her husband, and commits a wrongful act while engaged in the performance of her duties, thereby injuring another, her husband, despite the provisions of the statute, is responsible for the tort. McNemar v. Cohn (1904) 115 Ill. App. 31.

In Martin v. Robson (1872) 65 Ill. 129, 16 Am. Rep. 578, it was held that under a statute merely enlarging the property rights of married women, the husband is discharged from liability for her torts committed in his absence, and with which he has no connection. See to the same effect, Hagebush v. Ragland (1875) 73 Ill. 40.

In Baker v. Young (1867) 44 Ill. 42, 92 Am. Dec. 149, the common-law doctrine was declared that a husband was liable for the tortious acts of his wife, though they were committed without his consent.

e. Indiana.

In Indiana it is provided by statute as follows: "Married women, without reference to their ages, shall be liable for torts committed by them; and an action may be prosecuted against them for torts committed, as if unmarried. Husbands shall not be liable for the contracts or the torts of their wives." See McCabe v. Berge (1882) 89 Ind. 225.

A husband is not liable for the negligence of the wife in using a vehicle belonging to him. Radke v. Schlundt (1902) 30 Ind. App. 213, 65 N. E. 770.

In Ball v. Bennett (1863) 21 Ind. 427, 83 Am. Dec. 356, it was held that an action under the common law for the wife's tort should be brought against the husband and wife jointly. To the same effect, see Stockwell v. Thomas (1881) 76 Ind. 506, and McCaslin v. State (1884) 99 Ind. 423 (cases arising prior to statute). But the nonjoinder of the wife was not fatal if not objected to. Choen v. Porter (1879) 66 Ind. 194.

f. Maine.

In Maine the statute specifically provides that the husband shall not be liable for the torts of his wife in which he takes no part. See Marcus v. Rovinsky (1901) 95 Me. 106, 49 Atl. 420, wherein it was held that, under the statute, a husband may be made a nominal party defendant with his wife in an action based on her tort committed without his participation.

The common-law rule was declared in the following earlier cases: Hinds v. Jones (1861) 48 Me. 348; Ferguson v. Brooks (1877) 67 Me. 251; Atwood v. Higgins (1884) 76 Me. 423.

g. Massachusetts.

In Massachusetts the nonliability of the husband is declared, without limitation, by a statute providing that "any married woman may sue and be sued in actions of tort in the same manner as if she were sole, and her husband shall not be liable to pay the judgment against her for damages or costs in any such suit." Hill v. Duncan (1872) 110 Mass. 238; Austin v. Cox (1875) 118 Mass. 58; McCarty v. De Best (1876) 120 Mass. 89.

For cases decided under the common law, see Heckle v. Lurvey (1869) 101 Mass. 344; Tobey v. Smith (1860) 15 Gray, 535.

It was said in McCarty v. De Best (1876) 120 Mass. 89: "The statute . . . was manifestly intended to make the wife alone liable to action, judgment, and execution for torts committed by her in the future."

If the wife commits a tort by the husband's instigation, both are liable. Handy v. Foley (1876) 121 Mass. 259, 23 Am. Rep. 270. See also Heckle v. Lurvey (1869) 101 Mass. 344.

h. Michigan.

In Michigan, by legislative enactment expressly declaring that the husband shall not be liable for the torts of his wife, the common-law rule is abrogated. Burt v. McBain (1874) 29 Mich. 260; Ricci v. Mueller (1879) 41 Mich. 214, 2 N. W. 23; Weber v. Weber (1882) 47 Mich. 569, 11 N. W. 389; Scott v. Chambers (1886) 62 Mich. 532, 29 N. W. 94; Konkle v. Haven (1905) 140 Mich. 472, 103 N. W. 850; Sweezy v. Fisher (1905) 142 Mich. 258, 105 N. W. 749.

i. Missouri.

In Missouri a statute provides as follows: "For all civil injuries committed by a married woman, damages may be recovered against her alone, and her husband shall not be responsible therefor, except in cases where, under the law, he would be jointly responsible with her if the marriage did not exist." It was held in Moore v. Doerr (1918) 199 Mo. App. 428, 203 S. W. 672, that this statute "means the overthrow of the common law frequently announced in this state, viz., that the wife was not liable for torts committed in the presence of her husband, presumably under his coercion, and that the husband was liable for her torts, whether committed in or out of his presence. It substitutes for such common law, a liability of the wife for torts committed by her, whether in his presence or not, and also a non-liability of the husband in all instances where he would not have been liable had he not been her husband."

The following cases held, under a statute merely enlarging the rights of married women with respect to property, that the common-law liability of the husband for the tortious acts of the wife was unchanged: Nichols v. Nichols (1898) 147 Mo. 387, 48 S. W.

947 (obiter); Taylor v. Pullen (1899) 152 Mo. 434, 53 S. W. 1086; Miller v. Busey (1916) — Mo. —, 186 S. W. 983 (obiter); Bruce v. Bombeck (1899) 79 Mo. App. 235; Aronson v. Ricker (1915) 185 Mo. App. 528, 172 S. W. 641. But see Boutell v. Shellabarger (1915) 264 Mo. 70, L.R.A.1915D, 847, 174 S. W. 384.

But in Boutell v. Shellabarger (1915) 264 Mo. 70, L.R.A.1915D, 847, 174 S. W. 384, an action for an injury to the plaintiff due to the negligent operation of an elevator in buildings belonging to the wife's separate estate, it was held that the husband was not liable under a statute. (Rev. Stat. 1909, §§ 8304, 8309) which explicitly provides that a married woman shall be deemed feme sole with respect to her right to manage her property, to contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued. "The statutes," said the court, "wholly emancipate the wife, at least so far as her separate property is concerned, and open new fields of endeavor closed to the wife by the common law. Since the husband is left no legal right to intermeddle with the business affairs and property of the wife, it is not logical to admit him to her new sphere solely that he may pay damages for torts the wife commits therein, excluding him for all other purposes.

And in Claxton v. Pool (1917) — Mo. —, L.R.A.1918A, 512, 197 S. W. 349, affirming (1914) 182 Mo. App. 13, 167 S. W. 623, the earlier cases heretofore cited were overruled, and it was held that "according to the spirit, purpose, and general scope of recent legislation, in addition to specific statutory provisions, as well as the freedom of contract accorded to married women of later years, all indicating a complete absence of the reason which supported the old rule relating to a husband's common-law liability for his wife's torts, the rule should no longer be recognized as in existence."

In Flesh v. Lindsay (1893) 115 Mo. 1, 37 Am. St. Rep. 374, 21 S. E. 907, the common-law rule that the husband is responsible for the tortious acts of the wife was declared.

But it was held in Merrill v. St.

Louis (1882) 12 Mo. App. 476, that it was only for the torts simpliciter, or pure torts of the wife, that the husband was liable at common-law, and for torts mixed with any element of contract, committed by the wife, the husband was not liable. To the same effect is Wirt v. Dinan (1891) 44 Mo. App. 589.

It was decided in Andrews v. Ormsbee (1848) 11 Mo. 400, that if a third person, without the authority or consent of the husband, left money with the latter's wife, and she made away with it, the husband was not liable at common law.

j. New York.

In New York, under a statute providing that a husband shall not be liable for the tortious acts of his wife "unless they were done by his actual coercion or instigation; and such coercion or instigation shall not be presumed but must be proved,"—it was held in Tanzer v. Read (1914) 160 App. Div. 584, 145 N. Y. Supp. 708, that when a wife commits a tort while independently engaged in pursuing her own pleasure, the husband is protected by the statute, and is not liable for her act.

And in Strubing v. Mahar (1899) 46 App. Div. 409, 61 N. Y. Supp. 799, under a prior similar statute, the court held that a husband was not liable for the tortious act of his wife in the absence of proof that such act was the result of his actual coercion or instigation.

The following cases decided under statutes enlarging the rights of married women with respect to property, but prior to the passage of the act expressly declaring the nonliability of the husband for the torts of his wife unless directed by him, held that such acts did not abolish the liability of a husband for tortious acts of a personal nature done by the wife:

Mangam v. Peck (1888) 111 N. Y. 401, 2 L.R.A. 150, 18 N. E. 617; Fitzgerald v. Quann (1888) 109 N. Y. 441, 17 N. E. 354; Muser v. Lewis (1884) 18 Jones & S. 431; Hoffman v. Lachman (1878; Marine Ct. Sp. T.) 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 278, note; Berrien v.

Steel (1878; Sup. Sp. T.) 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 279, note; Fitzsimons v. Harrington (1881; Sup. Sp. T.) 1 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 360. See also Dean v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (1890) 119 N. Y. 547, 23 N. E. 1054.

In a number of other cases the husband was held not to be liable, under the statutes last referred to, for torts committed by the wife in the management and control of her separate property.

Rowe v. Smith (1871) 45 N. Y. 230; Baum v. Mullen (1872) 47 N. Y. 577; Fiske v. Bailey (1872) 51 N. Y. 150; Mason v. Mason (1892) 66 Hun, 386, 21 N. Y. Supp. 306; Eagle v. Swayze (1867) 2 Daly, 140.

See also Callahan v. Matthews (1895) 87 Hun, 527, 34 N. Y. Supp. 499; Noonan v. Tuttle (1879; Marine Ct. Tr. T.) 1 N. Y. City Ct. 190; Gillies v. Lent (1865; Com. Pl. Gen. T.) 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 455; Peak v. Lemon (1869) 1 Lans. 295, affirmed in (1872) 49 N. Y. 666. Thus, it was held that if an injury was sustained from the bite of a vicious dog owned by the husband, which was kept on premises owned and maintained by the wife, the husband was not liable, but the wife was liable if she permitted the dog to remain on her premises, with knowledge of its vicious propensities. Quilty v. Battie (1892) 135 N. Y. 201, 17 L.R.A. 521, 32 N. E. 47, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 177, reversing (1891) 61 Hun, 164, 15 N. Y. Supp. 765; Valentine v. Cole (1886; Buffalo Super. Ct. Gen. T.) 1 N. Y. S. R. 719. Compare Genenz v. De Forest (1888) 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 145, 2 N. Y. Supp. 152. And it was held that if the wife set fire to a house owned by her, and it was burned, the husband was not liable for loss sustained by the tenant of the property. Lansing v. Holdridge (1880) 58 How. Pr. 449.

In a number of earlier cases following the common-law rule it was held that a husband was liable for the torts of his wife (Solomon v. Waas (1858) 2 Hilt. 179; McCready's Goods (1869) 1 Tucker, 374); that an action for the wife's tort must be brought, under the common law, against the husband and wife jointly (Anderson v. Hill (1869) 53 Barb. 238; Horton v. Payne (1864) 27 How. Pr. 374; Austin v. Bacon (1888) 49 Hun, 386, 3 N. Y. Supp. 587; Kowing v. Manly (1872) 49 N. Y. 200, 10 Am. Rep. 346; Bunce v. Van Der Grift (1839) 8 Paige, 37); that if there was a recovery, judgment must be entered against both husband and wife (Flanagan v. Tinen (1868) 53 Barb. 587); and that where the wife, as administratrix, committed a devastavit before marriage, the husband could not be held liable after her death (Elliott v. Lewis (1836) 3 Edw. Ch. 40).

k. North Carolina.

In North Carolina the common-law rule has been limited by a statute providing that "every husband living with his wife shall be jointly liable with her for all damages accruing from any tort committed by her." It was held in Young v. Newsom (1920) 180 N. C. 315, 104 S. E. 660, that under this statute a husband living with his wife is responsible in damages for a tort committed by her in slandering another, notwithstanding various other acts giving her many of the rights of a feme sole.

In Presnell v. Moore (1897) 120 N. C. 390, 27 S. E. 27, the court held a husband to be liable for slanderous words spoken by his wife in his absence, without his knowledge or consent. See also Roberts v. Lisenbee (1882) 86 N. C. 136, 41 Am. Rep. 450.

Likewise, it was held in Brittingham v. Stadiem (1909) 151 N. C. 299, 66 S. E. 128, that, under the statute, a husband is liable jointly with his wife for a tort committed by their minor son in the course of his employment as clerk in the wife's shop, since the wife herself is liable.

l. Ohio.

In Ohio, the statute reads as follows: "Neither husband nor wife, as such, is answerable for the acts of the other."

See Bretzfelder v. Demaree (1921) 102 Ohio St. 105, 130 N. E. 505, where in the court said: "At common law, unquestionably, the husband was liable for acts . . . committed by his wife. This principle was then established because of the servitude of marriage, whereby the husband not only possessed control over her person and acts, but, upon coverture, became entitled to her goods and chattels, and had the absolute right to reduce her choses in action to possession during her life. The wife's existence was merged in that of her husband, and in actions against herself her husband was required to be joined. However, in the development of our statute law, this principle of liability upon the part of the husband was abrogated by the adoption in various states of certain statutes . . . providing that neither husband nor wife should be liable for the tortious acts of the other because of the marital relationship."

The following earlier cases held that under a statute concerning the rights and liabilities of married women in relation to property, the common-law rule making the husband liable for torts committed by the wife during coverture was not abrogated. Fowler v. Chichester (1874) 26 Ohio St. 9; Holtz v. Dick (1884) 42 Ohio St. 23, 51 Am. Rep. 791.

In Scheurer v. Scheurer (1878) 4 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 297, it was held that, under the common law, after a divorce had been obtained by a wife and the husband had married a second time, he might be held liable for the wrongful act of the second wife in alienating his affections from the first.

m. Rhode Island.

In Rhode Island, the statute relieves the husband of his common-law liability for the torts of his wife by declaring expressly that he shall not be liable for torts committed by his wife, unless he participates therein or coerces her thereto. McElroy v. Capron (1902) 24 R. I. 561, 54 Atl. 44. See Simmons v. Brown (1858) 5 R. I. 299, 73 Am. Dec. 66, and Ferguson v. Neilson (1890) 17 R. I. 82, 9 L.R.A. 155, 33 Am. St. Rep. 855, 20 Atl. 229, upholding the common-law rule prior to the statute.

n. South Carolina.

The South Carolina statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 163) provides that when a married woman is a party her husband must be joined with her, except that "when the action concerns her separate property she may sue or be sued alone: Provided, that neither her husband nor his property shall be liable for any recovery against her in any such suit, but judgment may be enforced by execution against her sole and separate estate as if she were sole." Apparently this statute has not yet been considered in a case dealing with the question of a husband's liability for the torts of his wife, and therefore the common-law doctrine still prevails. For cases announcing the common-law doctrine, see supra, II. d.

o. South Dakota.

A statute in South Dakota expressly relieves the husband from liability for the torts of his wife, by providing as follows: "Neither husband nor wife, as such, is answerable for the acts of the other." See Bebout v. Pense (1914) 35 S. D. 14, 150 N. W. 289, holding that while the statute is sufficient, in terms, to relieve a husband or wife, as such, of all liability for the tortious acts of the other, and that, so far as the husband's liability for the acts of his wife is concerned, it places them in the position of persons who are not related at all, it does not purport to relieve them as individuals, and they are liable jointly where the wife commits a tort at the command or instigation of her husband.

p. Vermont.

The Vermont statute provides that a husband shall not be liable for the torts of his wife unless committed by his authority or direction. See Story v. Downey (1890) 62 Vt. 243, 20 Atl. 321; Russell v. Phelps (1901) 73 Vt. 390, 50 Atl. 1101; Fadden v. McKinney (1913) 87 Vt. 316, 89 Atl. 351.

"To render a husband liable under . . . statute, for a tort committed by his wife, it must be alleged and proved that the tort was committed by his authority or direction." Story v. Downey, supra.

It was held in Fadden v. McKinney, supra, that, under the statute, a husband could not be held liable in an action for trespass for a wrong committed by another, although he knew that his wife had employed such person to commit the wrong complained of.

In Woodward v. Barnes (1873) 46 Vt. 332, 14 Am. Rep. 626, it was held that at common law the husband is responsible only for the pure torts of the wife, and was not liable for any torts connected with contract.

In Shaw v. Hallihan (1874) 46 Vt. 389, 14 Am. Rep. 628, the common-law rule was laid down.

q. Washington.

In Washington the statute in terms absolves the husband from liability for the wrongful acts of the wife, "except in case where he would be jointly responsible with her if the marriage did not exist." See Killingsworth v. Keen (1916) 89 Wash. 597, 154 Pac. 1096, wherein the court held that a husband was not liable for the tortious act of the wife in taking and damaging an automobile.

r. Ontario.

In Ontario the liability of a husband for wrongs committed by his wife, either before or after marriage, is limited by statute to the extent of property belonging to his wife acquired by him subject to certain deductions. Lee v. Hopkins (1890) 20 Ont. Rep. 666.

IV. Under statute not expressly abrogating or limiting common-law rule.

a. View that husband is relieved from liability.

1. Arizona.

In Arizona the married women's statutes, which confer on the wife the ownership and management of her own property free from the control of her husband, are held to abrogate the common-law liability of the husband for the torts of his wife connected with her separate estate, though the statutes do not expressly refer to the subject of his liability for her torts. Hageman v. Vanderdoes (1914) 15 Ariz. 312, L.R.A.1915A, 491, 138 Pac. 1053, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 1197.

But, under a statute requiring that when a married woman is a party, her husband shall be joined with her, except when the action concerns her separate property, or is between herself and her husband, the husband should be made a party defendant in an action for the wife's assault committed out of his presence, although he is not liable for the tort. Ibid.

2. Arkansas.

In Arkansas the Married Woman's Act which declares in broad terms its purpose to be "to remove the disabilities of married women" and to allow a married woman to "enjoy all rights and be subjected to all the laws of the state as though she were a feme sole," is held in the reported case (BOURLAND v. BAKER, ante, 525) to abrogate the common-law rule that the husband is liable for the torts of his wife committed in his absence; and the unity of husband and wife, which was the reason of the common-law rule, having been abolished by the statute, the husband's liability is also abolished.

Compare the following cases, holding that earlier statutes conferring certain rights and imposing certain liabilities on married women with reference to property did not operate to discharge the husband from liability for the torts of his wife committed in his absence and without his consent: Jackson v. Williams (1909) 92 Ark. 486, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 840, 123 S. W. 751; Townslley v. Yentsch (1911) 98 Ark. 312, 135 S. W. 882; Minor v. Mapes (1912) 102 Ark. 351, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 214, 144 S. W. 219; Williams v. Fulkes (1912) 108 Ark. 196, 146 S. W. 480. In Minor v. Mapes (1912) 102 Ark. 351, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 214, 144 S. W. 219, the court, holding that a husband was liable for a negligent act of his wife which was committed in his presence but not under his direction, said: "Where the tort is committed in the absence of the husband or, if in his presence, without any control or compulsion on his part, the husband and wife are jointly liable and must be joined in the action."

Compare, also, the following cases, wherein it was held, without reference to any statute, that a husband was liable, under the common-law rule, for the torts of his wife: Ferguson v. Collins (1848) 8 Ark. 241; Kosminsky v. Goldberg (1884) 44 Ark. 401; Mahoney v. Roberts (1908) 86 Ark. 130, 110 S. W. 225.

3. Colorado.

In Colorado under a statute giving the wife control and dominion over her property and person, and conferring many other rights on her, it was held in Schuler v. Henry (1908) 42 Colo. 367, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1009, 94 Pac. 360, that a husband was not liable for the tort of his wife with which he was in no way connected. The foregoing decision was followed in Murray v. Newmyer (1919) 66 Colo. 459, 182 Pac. 888.

4. Illinois.

See the cases cited supra, III. d.

5. Kansas.

Under a statute of Kansas giving to a married woman control over her property, and declaring that she may sue and be sued in the same manner as if she were unmarried, it was held in Norris v. Corkill (1884) 32 Kan. 409, 49 Am. Rep. 489, 4 Pac. 862, that a husband was not liable for slanderous words uttered by his wife out of his presence and with which he had no connection.

6. Kentucky.

In Kentucky it is provided by statute that the husband shall have no estate or interest in his wife's property, and that "during the existence of the marriage relation the wife shall hold and own all her estate to her separate and exclusive use, free from the debts, liabilities, or control of her husband." It was said in Lane v. Bryant (1896) 100 Ky. 138, 36 L.R.A. 709, 37 S. W. 584: "The liability of the husband at the common law was based on the idea of his absolute dominion over the person of his wife, with the right to all her personal and the use of her real estate; to the rents and profits of her realty; to her earnings and labor; and the power of the control of the wife by the husband was caused to such an extent as to vest in him the right to use such forcible means as would bridle her tongue or make her of good behavior. This rule is a harsh one at best, and with the progress of civilization, and the changes by wise, modern legislation, of the relation between husband and wife as to the right of property and personal control by the husband, it would seem absurd in this enlightened age to regard the wife as a mere machine, made to labor and to talk as the husband directs, and to make him liable on that ground for her torts when not committed by his direction or procurement." To the same effect, see Davidson v. Manning (1916) 168 Ky. 288, 181 S. W. 1111.

Prior to the act, the court in Phillips v. Richardson (1830) 4 J. J. Marsh. 212, laid down the common-law rule.

7. Nebraska.

In Nebraska, various statutes provide that a married woman may be sued in the same manner as if she were unmarried and may dispose of her property with like effect as a married man, and may also carry on business on her sole and separate account.

It was held in Goken v. Dallugge (1904) 72 Neb. 16, 99 N. W. 818, 103 N. W. 287, 9 Ann. Cas. 1222, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 479, without specific reference to these statutes, that the common-law rule that a husband was liable jointly with his wife for tortious acts done by her in his presence, but without his consent or direction, solely on the ground of the marriage relation, was not in force in Nebraska.

8. New Hampshire.

In New Hampshire by legislative enactment the wife is given the right to hold property to her own use, free from the interference or control of her husband. Under the statute conferring this privilege it was held in Harris v. Webster (1878) 58 N. H. 481, that in an action for slander against a married woman, the husband should not be joined as a party defendant, the court saying: "Since the wife's property is no longer her husband's nor her earnings his, by mere force of law; and since he has no more legal power of physical control over her than she has over him, no . . . reason seems to remain for holding him liable for her torts."

The following earlier cases maintained the common-law doctrine that the husband was liable for the torts of his wife, and must be joined in the suit against her: Little v. Gardner (1831) 5 N. H. 415, 22 Am. Dec. 468; Cram v. Dudley (1854) 28 N. H. 537; Carleton v. Haywood (1870) 49 N. H. 314.

9. New Jersey.

In New Jersey, by virtue of a statute permitting a married woman to hold real and personal property as a feme sole, a husband is relieved from liability for the torts of his wife committed in the management and control of her separate property. D. Wolff & Co. v. Lozier (1902) 68 N. J. L. 103, 52 Atl. 303.

That case was approved in Harrington v. Jagmetty (1912) 83 N. J. L. 548, 83 Atl. 880, wherein the court said: "Whatever may have been the consequence of the necessary joinder of husband and wife, in an action for a tort committed by the wife before the passage of the statutes relating to married women, since the passage of those acts the husband is not liable for torts of his wife, growing out of the conduct by her of her own business, or arising from the management by her of her own separate property."

The following earlier cases laid down the common-law rule. Crane v. Van Duyne (1853) 9 N. J. Eq. 259; State, Hildreth, Prosecutor, v. Camp (1879) 41 N. J. L. 306.

10. Pennsylvania.

In Pennsylvania, under the Married Women's Property Act of 1893, providing that "a married woman may be sued civilly in all respects and in any form of action with the same effect and results and consequences as an unmarried person," the husband is not liable in damages for the torts of his wife. Gustine v. Westenberger (1909) 224 Pa. 455, 73 Atl. 913. So, it was held in Smith v. Machesney (1913) 238 Pa. 538, 86 Atl. 493, that it is not only unnecessary, but improper, to join the husband as a defendant in a suit against the wife, even though the case is made against him only by reason of his supposed responsibility for the tort of his wife, and not as an actual tortfeasor. To the same effect see Crouse v. Lubin (1918) 260 Pa. 329, 103 Atl. 725.

And in Hinski v. Stein (1917) 68 Pa. Super. Ct. 441, a husband was held not to be liable in damages, under the act, for slanderous words uttered by his wife in his absence, and without his knowledge or consent.

Under the Married Persons' Property Act of 1887, repealed by the Act of 1893, it was held in Kuklence v. Vocht (1887) 4 Pa. Co. Ct. 370, affirmed (1888) 10 Sadler, 11, 21 W. N. C. 521, 18 Atl. 198, that a husband was not liable for his wife's torts, and that it was unnecessary to join the husband as defendant in a suit against the wife for her tort. Compare Quick v. Miller (1883) 103 Pa. 67.

In Ridgway v. Spellman (1898) 7 Pa. Dist. R. 290, 20 Pa. Co. Ct. 596, it was held that since the Act of 1887, declaring in express terms that a husband was not liable for damages recovered against his wife for her torts, was repealed by the Act of 1893, by which she was exempted from arrest or imprisonment for her torts, a husband was jointly liable with his wife for slanderous words spoken by her.

And, the Married Persons' Property Act of 1893 was held in Hess v. Heft (1897) 3 Pa. Super. Ct. 582, not to modify a husband's liability for the torts of his wife.

The following earlier cases announced the common-law doctrine that a husband was liable for the torts of his wife. Overholt v. Ellswell (1829, 1 Ashm. 200; Maffit v. Com. (1847) 5 Pa. 359; Keen v. Hartman (1865) 48 Pa. 497, 86 Am. Dec. 606, 88 Am. Dec. 472, affirming (1864) 5 Phila. 443; Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. v. Heil (1887) 115 Pa. 487, 2 Am. St. Rep. 575, 8 Atl. 616; Hess v. Heft, and Ridgway v. Spellman, supra.

In Overholt v. Ellswell, supra, it was held that, under the common law, nothing short of a marriage de jure can render a man responsible for torts committed by his wife before marriage.

And under the common law, the "general principle that, for the fraud or other tort of a married woman, an action may be maintained against her and her husband . . . is to be understood as applicable only to actions brought for wrongs done by the wife, which are what are sometimes denominated 'torts simpliciter,' in other words, torts the substantive basis of which is not the wife's contract." Keen v. Hartman (1865) 48 Pa. 497, 86 Am. Dec. 606, 88 Am. Dec. 472, affirming (1864) 5 Phila. 448.

But the husband of an administratrix was not liable at common law for a devastavit committed by her before marriage. Maffit v. Com. supra.

But see supra, II. d, III. a, and III. l.

11. Utah.

In Utah it is provided by statute that "all property owned by either spouse before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is the separate property of that spouse by whom the same is so owned or acquired; and separate property owned or acquired as specified above may be held, managed, controlled, transferred, and in any manner disposed of by the spouse so owning or acquiring it, without any limitation or restriction by reason of marriage;" and that "either spouse may sue or be sued, plead and be impleaded, or defend and be defended at law."

Under these statutory provisions it was held in Culmer v. Wilson (1896) 13 Utah, 129, 57 Am. St. Rep. 713, 44 Pac. 833, that a husband was not responsible for the torts of his wife, committed before marriage, and while she was the wife of another man, the court saying: "The common-law rule . . . which made the husband liable for the wife's torts, proceeded upon the ground that as the husband succeeded jure mariti, to the entire estate of the wife, real and personal, and to the right to her earnings, so that she could not respond in damages for any wrong which she might commit, it was but right that he should respond for her, so long as the coverture continued. Such being the reason of the rule, if a statute intervenes giving the wife, during coverture, the sole control of all property owned by her before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by purchase, gift, bequest, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and the same is the separate property of the wife, and the same may be held, managed, controlled, and transferred, and in any manner disposed of, by her, without any limitation or restriction by reason of marriage, with the right to use and possess the same, thus taking away entirely the reason of the common-law rule, it would seem, on principle, that the rule itself ought to cease."

b. View that husband is not relieved from liability.

1. California.

The California statute under which a married woman is given the right to manage her own separate estate has been held not to have changed the common-law rule that a husband is liable for the torts of his wife. Therefore, in an action for an assault and battery committed by the wife, the husband is liable in damages, although the act was not committed in his presence and was done without his knowledge or permission. Henley v. Wilson (1902) 137 Cal. 273, 58 L.R.A. 941, 92 Am. St. Rep. 160, 70 Pac. 21.

2. Iowa.

In Iowa the statute provides that liabilities may be incurred by a wife, "and the same enforced against her to the same extent, and in the same manner, as if she were unmarried." In McElfresh v. Kirkendall (1873) 36 Iowa, 224, it was held that the liability of the husband at common law for the torts of his wife had not been changed by the provisions of the aforesaid statute. And the decision of the court in this case was followed in Luse v. Oaks (1873) 36 Iowa, 562. Compare Enders v. Beck (1864) 18 Iowa, 86.

3. Minnesota.

In Minnesota the Married Woman's Acts have been held not to abrogate the common-law rule which holds a husband liable in damages for the torts of his wife committed without his presence and in which he did not participate in any way. Pett-Morgan v. Kennedy (1895) 62 Minn. 348, 30 L.R.A. 521, 54 Am. St. Rep. 647, 64 N. W. 912.

Prior to the act, the court in Brazil v. Moran (1863) 8 Minn. 236, Gil. 205, 83 Am. Dec. 772, laid down the common-law rule.

4. Missouri.

See the cases cited supra, III. i.

5. New York.

See the cases cited supra, III. j.

6. Ohio.

See the cases cited supra, III. l.

7. Texas.

The Texas statutes regulating marital rights do not abrogate the common-law doctrine that a husband is responsible for the torts of his wife. See McQueen v. Fulgham (1864) 27 Tex. 463, wherein it was held that in an action against the wife for slander the husband must be joined, the court saying: "The common-law rule holding the husband responsible for the wife's torts does not rest entirely upon the ground that he takes by marriage all of her personal property, and that she is presumed to have no separate estate. It rests perhaps mainly upon the supposition that her acts are the result of the superior will and influence of the husband. Owing to the intimate relation between husband and wife, and to the nature of the control given him by law and social usage, over her conduct and actions, it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the courts to determine when she had acted at her own instance and when she was guided by his dictation. While our statutes are framed with the view of securing to the wife her separate property, and of sedulously protecting her with reference to it, against the recognized and controlling influence of the husband over her conduct, it would be a stretch of judicial authority to hold that the common-law responsibility attaching to him for the acts of the wife is by mere implication abolished."

See also Whitney Hardware Co. v. McMahan (1921) — Tex. —, 231 S. W. 694, a case dealing with the liability of the wife.

So, it was held in Zeliff v. Jennings (1884) 61 Tex. 458, that while many changes from the common law have been made by statute with reference to property rights of married women, no statute has changed or altered the liability of the husband for the torts of the wife from that imposed by the common law, and "the husband is liable to the same measure of pecuniary responsibility for the torts of the wife as though the act were his own."

In Patterson v. Frazer (1906) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 93 S. W. 146, reversed on other grounds (1906) 100 Tex. 103, 94 S. W. 324, a husband was held to be liable in exemplary as well as actual damages, for slanderous words spoken by the wife.

8. West Virginia.

In West Virginia, under the married women's laws relating to the separate property of the wife and her rights and powers concerning the same, the husband is not relieved from liability for the torts of the wife. See Kellar v. James (1907) 63 W. Va. 139, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1003, 59 S. E. 939, wherein the court said: "One object of these statutes is to enable a married woman to have the absolute, free, and unrestrained control of her property.

. . . The evils intended to be suppressed, and the purposes and objects to be promoted, are all mentioned in the statutes, and the rule of liberal construction requires no more than that they shall be so interpreted and applied as to suppress the named evils and effectuate the specified purposes and objects. It does not authorize the court to add other supposed evils, purposes, and objects. By the decided weight of authority, these statutes are held not to have relieved the husband from his common-law liability for the wife's torts." See also Withrow v. Smithson (1893) 37 W. Va. 757, 19 L.R.A. 762, 17 S. E. 816; Gill v. State (1894) 39 W. Va. 479, 26 L.R.A.

655, 45 Am. St. Rep. 928, 20 S. E. 568; Poling v. Pickens (1911) 70 W. Va. 117, 73 S. E. 251, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 995.

9. England.

In England, the Married Women's Property Act provides that "a married woman shall be capable of . . . suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort, or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her . . . and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise." In Seroka v. Kattenburg (1886) L. R. 17 Q. B. Div. 177, it was held that this statute does not abolish the liability of a husband for the wrongful acts of his wife, and that he is jointly liable with her for her torts committed after marriage, the court saying: "The words of the section . . . 'need not be joined,' . . . do not discharge the husband from his old liability; they are intended to give to a plaintiff the option of suing husband and wife together or suing the wife alone; judgment may be entered against the wife, and execution issued against her separate property, if she has any; but where she has none, the plaintiff is entitled to add the husband as a codefendant."

The foregoing case was held in Earle v. Kingscote [1900] 2 Ch. 585, 69 L. J. Ch. N. S. 725, 49 Week. Rep. 3, 83 L. T. N. S. 577, 16 Times L. R. 511, to have been well decided. See also Beaumont v. Kaye [1904] 1 K. B. 292, 73 L. J. K. B. N. S. 213, 52 Week. Rep. 241, 90 L. T. N. S. 51, 20 Times L. R. 183. But compare Cuenod v. Leslie [1909] 1 K. B. 880, 16 Ann. Cas. 375, wherein the court criticizing the rule laid down in Seroka v. Kattenburg, supra, and approved in Earle v. Kingscote, supra, said: "It is still open to a plaintiff to join the husband as defendant in an action for a tort committed by the wife, . . . but, in my opinion, it is most desirable that the matter should be reviewed by the final court of appeal, because the present state of things is highly anomalous. I cannot believe that the Married Women's Property Act 1882, which drew such a clear line of separation between the husband's and wife's property and liabilities, and arranged them in other respects so fairly on the lines of separate personal responsibility, could have intended to leave such a blot on the legislation as would follow from permitting a plaintiff to recover damages from a husband in respect to torts of the wife either before or during coverture, although he was not liable for the torts or any participation in them, and was not needed as a party to the action. . . . The provision that 'any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding'—i. e., an action or proceeding taken against her—'shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise,' . . . makes it clear that the husband's property is not longer to be a source from which the damages or costs of an action of tort against the wife are to be satisfied."

In Burdett v. Horne (1911) 28 Times L. R. 83, wherein it appeared that while a husband and wife were living together, she, by fraudulent representations, made without his instigation but with his knowledge and acquiescence, obtained a large sum of money, in a part of which he shared, the husband was held to be liable for the full amount procured, despite the fact that he had been judicially separated from his wife.

A husband is not liable, however, for a tort of his wife arising out of a contract entered into by her with another. Cole v. DeTrafford [1917] 1 K. B. 911, 86 L. J. K. B. N. S. 764, 117 L. T. N. S. 224, 61 Sol. Jo. 354, 33 Times L. 249.

The following cases decided prior to the act cited held the husband to be liable under the common law for the torts of his wife: Paget v. Read (1682) 1 Vern. 143, 23 Eng. Reprint, 375; Bachelor v. Bean (1688) 2 Vern. 61, 23 Eng. Reprint, 649; Head v. Briscoe (1832) 5 Car. & P. 484; Palmer

v. Wakefield (1840) 3 Beav. 227, 49 Eng. Reprint, 88; Wainford v. Heyl (1875) L. R. 20 Eq. 321, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 567, 33 L. T. N. S. 155, 23 Week.

Rep. 848; Bahin v. Hughes (1886) L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 390, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 472, 54 L. T. N. S. 188, 34 Week. Rep. 311. L. F. C.

PETERSBURG GAS COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

CITY OF PETERSBURG et al.

Virginia Supreme Court of Appeals—February 2, 1922.

(— Va. —, 110 S. E. 533.)

Rates — pre-war prices as basis for rates.

1. The reproduction value of a gas plant for rate-making purposes cannot be based exclusively on the pre-war unit of prices.

[See note on this question beginning on page 555.]

Constitutional law — gas rate — just compensation.

2. A gas company cannot be compelled to furnish gas at less than a reasonable compensation under a constitutional requirement that property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

[See 12 R. C. L. 900; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 1505.]

Rates — foundation for.

3. The just compensation to which a gas company is entitled for gas furnished is founded upon the fair value of the property used for the purpose, and not upon the amount of stock it has issued, or the debts it may owe.

[See 12 R. C. L. 901.]

— what determines amount.

4. The rate of return which a gas company shall be allowed to receive shall be fair and just to the company, and such as will make its securities attractive to investors when the company is prudently and carefully operated.

— reproduction cost of property.

5. In fixing the value of property for rate-making purposes the reproduction cost, less observed depreciation, may be taken.

[See 12 R. C. L. 902, 903; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 1507.]

— fair valuation — failure to state facts.

6. A valuation of property by a public service commission for rate-making purposes is not shown to be fair where the facts upon which it is founded are not stated.

— presumption of reasonableness of commission's finding.

7. The court cannot presume that the findings of the public service commission fixing rates for public service are correct, if the facts on which they are based are not stated as required by the Constitution.

— how value ascertained.

8. Value for rate-making purposes must be measured by the sound judgment and common sense of impartial tribunals charged with the ascertainment of such values.

— cost of operation — necessity.

9. In any estimate of rates to be paid by a consumer for gas it is essential to ascertain the costs of operation.

[See 12 R. C. L. 901.]

— method of determining rate of commodity.

10. The cost of gas to the consumer is fixed by determining the rate of return which the producer is entitled to receive on the valuation of his property and the cost per 1,000 cubic feet of operation, and dividing the aggregate by the number of 1,000 cubic feet of gas to be sold.

— amortizing loss.

11. If a loss has been inflicted upon a gas company by a rate fixed by the commission, it should be amortized and spread over a term of years which will be fair to the producer and not too burdensome to the consumer.

— allowance for profit tax.

12: A tax imposed upon the profits of a gas company should be taken into consideration in fixing the percentage of return it is to receive on investment.

ERROR to the State Corporation Commission to review its decision fixing the rates for gas which plaintiff was allowed to charge its patrons, in a proceeding by it for an increase in gas rates. Remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Mann & Townsend, for plaintiff in error:

The commission erred in its method of determining depreciation.

Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton, P.U.R.1920F, 483, 267 Fed. 231; Passaic Rate Case, 1 N. J. P.U.R. 491; Landon v. Kansas Ct. of Industrial Relations, P.U.R.1921A, 807, 269 Fed. 433.

Rates based upon a pre-war valuation are confiscatory and unconstitutional.

Elizabethtown Gaslight Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. 95 N. J. L. 18, 111 Atl. 729; Lincoln Gas & E. L. Co. v. Lincoln, 250 U. S. 256, 63 L. ed. 968, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454; St. Joseph Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Public Service Commission, P.U.R.1921A, 540, 268 Fed. 267; Joplin & P. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission, 267 Fed. 584; United States ex rel. Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 252 U. S. 178, 64 L. ed. 517, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 187; Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton, P.U.R.1920F, 483, 267 Fed. 231; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804; Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 52, 53 L. ed. 399, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034.

Any loss suffered by applicant should be amortized and spread over a term of years.

Mr. R. Bolling Willcox, for defendant in error city:

The commission did not err in its method of arriving at the value of appellant's property for rate-making purposes.

Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 546, 42 L. ed. 849, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418; Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 53 L. ed. 382, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034; Buffalo Gas Co. 4 Comm. Leaflets, 319; Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (Md.) P.U.R.1916C, 946; Re Bay State Rate Case (Mass.) P.U.R.1916F, 221; Fuhrmann v. Cataract Power & Conduit Co. 3 P. S. C. (2d Dist. N. Y.)

656; Re Potomac Electric Power Co. (D. C.) P.U.R.1917D, 563; Re Roanoke Waterworks Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920C, 745; Re Culpeper Teleph. Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920D, 305; Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920F, 49; Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1921C, 193; Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (Ind.) P.U.R.1921A, 824; Re Central Union Teleph. Co. (Ind.) P.U.R.1920B, 824; Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 17 N. Y. Dept. R. 81, P.U.R.1918F, 335; Re Tutwiler (Tenn.) P.U.R.1920C, 315; Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (D. C.) P.U.R.1920C, 341; Tyrone v. Home Electric Light & S. Heating Co. (Pa.) P.U.R.1920C, 565; Re Milton & M. J. Teleph. Co. (Wis.) P.U.R.1920C, 110; Davis v. Pennsylvania Gas Co. (N. Y.) P.U.R.1921B, 358; Re Public Service Co. (Ill.) P.U.R.1921B, 443; Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Idaho) P.U.R.1921B, 739; Re Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. (Ark.) P.U.R. 1921B, 516; Re Two States Teleph. Co. (Ark.) P.U.R.1921B, 405; Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (Neb.) P.U.R. 1921C, 691.

The burden of proof was on the gas company to justify the rate it was asking for, and if it failed to do so it should not complain of the result.

Re Pacific Electric R. Co. (Cal.) P.U.R.1920B, 652; Re Clarence Teleph. Co. (Mo.) P.U.R.1920E, 365; Sawyer v. Mays (Ark.) P.U.R.1920D, 797; Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 452, 51 L. ed. 1563, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18.

Burks, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decision of the state corporation commission fixing rates which the Petersburg Gas Company was allowed to charge to its patrons for gas. The record is not made up in the chronological order of events as they occurred before the commission (as it should have been), and it is only after searching through the record that we are able to state the case in that order.

On February 13, 1920, the gas company filed a new schedule of rates before the corporation commission, effective March 15, 1920, by which there was an increase in the maximum rate allowed for regular meters from $1.15 per 1,000 cubic feet to $1.60 per 1,000 cubic feet. This increase was asked in view of the increased cost of labor and materials, and because the operating expenses for the year 1919 more than consumed the total income of the gas company. On June 29, 1920, the engineer of the commission filed a report, in which, among other things, he stated: "That the services rendered by the Petersburg Gas Company may be considered as a fair average compared with other cities in Virginia and in the eastern United States."

On July 21, 1920, the said engineer filed a second report, in which he gave his estimate of the net value of the plant for rate-making purposes at $209,000. The gas company was contending for a valuation of $481,000, and had no information as to the filing of this second report. On August 2, 1920, the state corporation commission delivered an opinion based upon the second report of its engineer, fixing the maximum rate for regular meters at $1.50 per 1,000 cubic feet, and criticizing the gas company for attempting to collect rates based on an excessive valuation of its property. The opinion also suggested a careful examination of the company's property by an expert engineer. Upon the filing of this opinion the gas company promptly asked for a valuation of its property for the purpose of rate making by an expert engineer, and furnished the names of a number of such experts, stating that it was perfectly willing to have the valuation made by any one of those named, or any other competent expert that might be selected by the commission. The commission selected from the list thus furnished the firm of Forstall & Robison, of New York city, engineers of wide experience and very decided ability. On August 23, 1920, the commission addressed a communication to Forstall & Robison, in the following language:

"In view of your employment by the Petersburg Gas Company, with the approval of the commission, for the purpose of making an inventory and appraisal of its property so as to ascertain its fair value, this is written for the purpose of outlining the commission's views.

"It is desired to ascertain the value of the company's property on the 1st day of January, 1917, based on the average unit price of the preceding five years. This does not, of course, prevent the company from advancing any other basis of arriving at the value that it desires to present in connection with this case. In arriving at depreciation the commission wishes, in addition to any basis used by you in determining this element, to be advised as nearly as you can do so of the age and wear of the various elements composing the property and ascertainable as far as possible from the records, and the probable age of any property that may have been bought secondhand.

"To the value as of January 1, 1917, there is, of course, to be added the purchases at cost since that date to the most recent available date, July the 1st, if practicable.

"The commission also desires the financial history of the company, in the main, as outlined on pages 4 and 5 of the paper filed to-day by the Young Men's Business Club and the Gas Consumers' League of Petersburg.

"We assume that report will include, as usual, a statement as to the general condition of the plant in its relation to its public service, and such suggestions as may occur to you for improvement and efficiency."

Pursuant to the foregoing instruction, Mr. Forstall, of the firm of Forstall & Robison, made the valuation based on the average unit price for the five years 1912-1916, and ascertained the net fair valuation of the property on the pre-war basis for rate-making purposes at $405,130. At the request of the gas company Mr. Forstall filed a second report on December 11, 1920, using the average unit price for the five years 1915-1919, inclusive, and arrived at the depreciated value of the property with intangibles of $620,880. He testified that the value of the property based on the average price for the year 1920 would be 25 to 30 per cent higher than the figures stated in the last-mentioned report. On December 29, 1920, he filed a third report, fixing the value based on the financial history of the company in accordance with the letter of instructions of August 23, 1920, of the commission, in which he ascertained the value of the plant as of June 30, 1920, to be $453,700. Hearings were had by the commission on these various reports on January 13, 14, 27, and February 21, 1921. Pending these hearings the gas company filed a new schedule of rates, in which they asked that the rate for regular meters be raised to $2.35 per 1,000 cubic feet. After these hearings and argument by counsel, the commission rendered its opinion on March 24, 1921, in which it fixed the value of the property for rate-making purposes at $318,350, and the rate allowed to be charged for regular meters at $1.75 per 1,000 cubic feet. It is from this decision that the present appeal is allowed.

The chief objections to the decision are (1) that the commission, in valuing the property of the gas company, fixed the value entirely with reference to the average pre-war unit price for the years 1912-1916, inclusive, and (2) that the commission erred in applying the depreciation of 26½ per cent to the valuation of the gas property based upon the age of the various component parts of the plant. The commission fixed the value of the plant at $318,350, but the opinion does not show how this valuation was arrived at. There was conflict of testimony as to what portions of the real estate of the company were used, or useful, for the business of the company, and, while the opinion shows that it had not accepted Mr. Forstall's report and testimony on the subject, it failed to show what portion of said real estate was not so used, or useful, or the value thereof. It also fails to state what rate of return it allowed upon the valuations fixed by it, or the rate of annual depreciation, or the fair cost of operation—facts which, if found and stated, would be helpful to an intelligent review of its holding. The opinion does not show, and we are unable to ascertain from it, the reasons which justified the commission in fixing $1.75 as a fair rate to be charged per 1,000 cubic feet.

20 A.L.R.—35.

The Constitution, § 156 (f), requires the chairman of the commission to "certify to the appellate court all the facts upon which the action appealed from was based and which may be essential for the proper decision of the appeal, together with such of the evidence introduced before, or considered by, the commission as may be selected, specified and required to be certified, by any party in interest, as well as such other evidence, so introduced or considered, as the commission may deem proper to certify."

It will be observed from this quotation from the Constitution that the commission is required to certify the facts above mentioned, and not merely all the evidence that was introduced before it. It was never intended that the appellate court should have to examine a large amount of conflicting testimony, and ascertain therefrom the facts upon which the commission based its conclusions. The gas company insists that it applied time and again for this certificate of facts, but without avail.

Both the state and Federal Constitutions forbid the taking of private property for public use without making just compensation therefor, and the common law forbids the taking of private property of one person and giving it to another with or without just compensation. If, therefore, the gas company is compelled to furnish its customers gas at less than "reasonable compensation," the requirement is illegal.

Constitutional law—gas rate—just compensation.

The subject of rate making should be approached by commissions and courts with a view to doing what is fair and just between the parties under all the circumstances of the particular case. That for which the utility company is entitled to "just compensation" is the use of its property appropriated to the public benefit, and the value of that use is founded upon the fair value of the property so used, and not upon the amount of stock it has issued or the debts it may owe. The rate of return on such "fair value" which the utility company should be allowed to receive should be fair and just to the company, and such as will make its securities attractive to investors when the company is prudently and carefully operated.

Rates—foundation for.

—what determines amount.

"The utility is entitled to ask a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience, but, on the other hand, the public is entitled to demand that no more be exacted from it than the services rendered are reasonably worth." State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. 291 Ill. 209, P.U.R.1920C, 640, 125 N. E. 895, and cases cited.

In Re Potomac Electric Power Co. (D. C.) P.U.R.1917D, 563, it is said that the return allowed should be one "which will be fair to the investor, who has directed his energies and devoted his substance to the creation of this instrumentality, and fair and just likewise to the consumer, who, under modern conditions, is compelled to use the product of the utility in his daily business and social and domestic life."

While the utility enjoys a monopoly which it should not be permitted to use to the public detriment, at the same time it has invested its skill and capital in an enterprise that is essential to the comfort and convenience of life, and which requires large sums of money for the payment of operating charges, repairs, replacements, improvements, interest charges, taxes, sinking fund, and other purposes connected with the necessary and proper operation of its plant. These sums are to be obtained from the lending public on the faith of the security offered by the utility company. In fixing a rate, therefore, which will be just and reasonable, it must be borne in mind that the utility shall be allowed to realize such a net income upon the value or amount of its investment as will, when prudently managed, render its securities attractive to the investing public. Otherwise, there will result inferior service to the public, and ultimately bankruptcy of the utility, and disaster as well to the public as the utility.

In Elizabethtown Gaslight Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. 95 N. J. L. 18, P.U.R.1920F, 1001, 111 Atl. 729, in referring to an undervaluation of a gas plant, it was said: "This suffices to show that the amount of return allowed to the companies would probably be insufficient, under present circumstances, to attract capital to the business, and this was one of the important tests of the justice and reasonableness of the rate as decided in the Passaic Case." (Italics supplied.)

See also State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. supra; Passaic Rate Case (Public Service Gas Co. v. Public Utility Comrs.) 84 N. J. L. 463, L.R.A.1918A, 421, 87 Atl. 651. The disastrous effect of failure to allow just and reasonable compensation to public service companies is well summed up by the Supreme Court of the United States in Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 212 U. S. 1, 18, 53 L. ed. 371, 382, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 154, as follows: "Our social system rests largely upon the sanctity of private property, and that state or community which seeks to invade it will soon discover the error in the disaster which follows. The slight gain to the consumer, which he would obtain from a reduction in the rates charged by public service corporations, is as nothing compared with his share in the ruin which would be brought about by denying to private property its just reward, thus unsettling values and destroying confidence."

If the plant was much larger than necessary, a different question would arise as to the valuation, but it is not claimed that the plant was any larger than was necessary for the purpose for which it was used, and the duties devolved upon the state corporation commission in the case in judgment were: (1) The ascertainment of the fair value for rate-making purposes of the property of the gas company, used or useful in furnishing gas to its patrons; (2) the fixing of the rate or per cent the gas company should receive on said fair valuation, after deducting costs of operation and any other legitimate expenses; and (3) the amount per 1,000 cubic feet to be paid by consumers in order to raise the necessary funds to pay all costs and expenses and the compensation to be received by the gas company. Compare State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. supra.

Several methods have been suggested as helpful in ascertaining the value of property for rate-making purposes. One of these is to take the reproduction cost, less observed depreciation. As a general rule, and where the utility has not been allowed to earn in the past a depreciation reserve greater than the observed depreciation, this seems to be the fairest method and the one best supported by authority, and as the state corporation commission attempted no other, and apparently adopted this method,—in part, at least,—it is unnecessary to make further reference to other methods. The costs of labor and materials were greatly inflated by the World War; and have not yet receded to pre-war rates, nor is it probable that they will so recede in the near future, if ever. The result is that it has been found difficult to determine as of what date the unit of prices shall be fixed. In the letter of instructions to the engineers the commission directed them to take the average unit price for the five years preceding January 1, 1917. Its reason therefor finds expression in the case of Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920F, 49, cited in its opinion in this case, where it was said: "It seems to the commission that a reproduction value as of normal times at pre-war prices, plus the actual sums necessarily expended during the period of inflation, less the deductions discussed above, . . . is a fair and reasonable basis."

And so far as we can gather from the opinion of the commission, this is the basis upon which it fixed the value of the property of the gas company for the purpose of fixing the rate. It apparently refused to consider values as of any other time, on the ground that they were not normal. Referring to the contention of the gas company that the value of the property should be ascertained by "using unit prices as of the time when the valuation was made," the commission said:

"This commission has time and time again pointed out the essential unfairness and impracticability of such a proposition. References may be made to the opinions of this commission in Re Roanoke Waterworks Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920C, 745; Re Culpeper Teleph. Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1920D, 305; Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. supra; Re Rosslyn Co. (not reported); Re Bristol Gas & E. Co. (not reported); Re Virginia

—reproduction cost of property.

R. & Power Co. (Va.) P.U.R.1921C, 193, decided March 18, 1921.

"Unquestionably some recent court decisions tend to unhold the view advanced by the Petersburg Gas Company."

After repudiating these "recent court decisions," and making lengthy quotations from the Indiana public service commission in the La-porte Case, P.U.R.1921A, 824, hereinafter mentioned, the commission says:

"We stand by the method of valuation outlined in our instructions to Forstall & Robison, believing it conforms to the standard laid down by the United States Supreme Court in the Consolidated Gas Case—"the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public."

"The commission knows, and knew when it authorized the Petersburg Gas Company to employ any one of the list of engineers submitted by it, that the firm of Forstall & Robison is entirely reputable and reliable. Any student of public utilities reports also knows that, in addition to the entirely trustworthy reports of physical values made by engineering firms, the engineers invariably advance theories as to additional values. Such student also knows that in most cases the engineering theories are materially reduced by commissions in accordance with their conception of reasonable values, taking into consideration, as laid down in the master case of Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 418, 'all the elements.'

"There is also room for exercise of judgment in the degree of accrued depreciation to be deducted from the rate base.

"Under the circumstances, the commission adheres to its opinion that the reproduction cost theory, applied at the time the property is being used in the public service, does not reasonably mean that unit prices as of that date must be accepted. A valuation made to-day would show lower figures than the valuation made June 30 last. However much it might suit the engineers, it would be destructive of every theory of regulation if the utilities, the public, and commissions were forced to keep on having new reproduction cost valuations with each change in unit prices.

"So we say that, if the present trend of court decisions is to be taken as requiring the ascertainment of reproduction costs as of the particular date on which the calculation is made, the entire reproduction theory must go into the discard and be succeeded by the historical method with all of its obvious defects.

"It is evident that in this case there should be some deduction from Forstall's figures of land values covering property in use or useful to the public; further, that paving over street mains must be deducted, and also value of property turned over to the Interstate Appliance Corporation, together with most of the value of the trestle. Under all the circumstances surrounding the history of this company, 10 per cent of the construction value is sufficient allowance for overheads, including engineering, supervision, legal expenses during construction, taxes, interest, and insurance during construction. Materials and supplies with working capital must, of course, be allowed in accordance with the experience of the company. A fair deduction for accrued depreciation on the physical property would, it seems to the commission, with all the light before it, be 26.5 per cent. Going value is given its due weight.

"We thus arrive at a fair valuation of the property of the Petersburg Gas Company for rate-making purposes, as of June 30, 1920, at $318,350."

Even if we concede the premises, we are unable to draw the conclusion stated in the last paragraph. The value of the real estate used or useful in the operation of the plant is universally conceded to be not subject to any reductions, but the value thereof is not stated. The amount estimated for paving over streets and the value of the property turned over to the Interstate Appliance Company had already been deducted from Forstall's statement, and the depreciation on the different portions of the physical property was most probably not the same, and we have no means of knowing on what sum the 26.5 per cent of depreciation was calculated.

-fair valuation
-failure to state facts.

The opinion does not state the facts upon which its calculation is based. Hence it does not thus appear that $318,350 is a fair valuation. The commission apparently adopted substantially Forstall's pre-war unit valuation of $504,130, except as to the real estate, but it differed from him, as did its engineer, Dickerman, as to the amount to be deducted for depreciation. If, however, we take 26½ per cent off of Forstall's valuation ($132,594), we would have left $371,536, and not $318,350 fixed by the commission. It is impossible to tell from the record how the commission arrived at its valuation. In the absence of the facts required by the Constitution to be stated, we cannot presume, prima facie, that the findings of the Commission are correct. As said in the Springfield Case, supra: "Where it appears from the finding of the commission that only a certain proportion of the actual value of the whole, or any considerable part of the property of the utility, is to be taken into consideration, then such value must be stated by the commission, or the proportion considered must be stated; otherwise, this court will be helpless in an effort to review the reasonableness of the commission's findings and order."

-presumption of reasonableness of commission's finding.

But there is fundamental error in taking the pre-war unit of prices as practically the sole basis for ascertaining the reproduction value of the property of the gas company for rate-making purposes. What is said in the opinion of the commission with reference to the costs of producing gas is equally applicable to the costs of reproducing the plant. It is there said: "In any event, there seems little possibility of a return to a general pre-war level. The natural resources of the country are approaching depletion, and when it costs more to mine a ton of coal because it is farther back in the mountain, and where there is less lumber in the country every year, and when the oil supply will inevitably decrease, and when the general level of labor will likely be above that of pre-war years, evidently the prices of the past cannot be realized."

-pre-war prices as basis for rates.

These seem to be good reasons why pre-war prices of reproduction should not be adopted.

We have no case from the Supreme Court of the United States involving rate making as affected by the inflated prices of the war period, but there are several cases involving a variation of prices from other causes.

In San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 43 L. ed. 1154, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804, it is said: "What the company is entitled to demand, in order that it may have just compensation, is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public." (Italics supplied.)

The commission emphasized the word "reasonable" in the foregoing quotation, and claimed to follow that holding, but departed from it by holding that a value based on a pre-war unit price gave the "reasonable value," although it admitted that there was "little possibility of a return to a general pre-war level."

In Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 52, 53 L. ed. 399, 48 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034, it is said: "And we concur with the court below in holding that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the rates." (Italics supplied.)

Three years have elapsed since the close of the war, and neither labor nor materials have declined to anything like the pre-war prices. When, if ever, they will, no one can foretell. It would seem that time enough had elapsed to furnish a basis for calculating reproduction costs.

In Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton (Southern Dist. New York) P.U.R.1920F, 483, 267 Fed. 236, Judge Hand said that, so far as he had found in the books, a test of two years was enough, and cited Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 57 L. ed. 1511, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18, and Municipal Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 225 N. Y. 89, P.U.R.1919C, 364, 121 N. E. 772. On the same subject he further said: "The master has taken complete evidence over a period of twenty months, from January 1, 1918, to August 31, 1919. Since that time eleven more months have passed, during which there has been no fall in price levels. The record has some evidence of this down to a later day, but, of course, not down to the date of this opinion. But evidence is not necessary in the face of so patent and obtrusive a fact of daily life, and it is quite fair to say that the condition which the master found as of August 31, 1919, has been aggravated during the succeeding year. The period, despite its unusual character, I find to be a sufficient basis for the calculation of the cost of production and the 'rate base' for a future time long enough to call for some judicial action."

On the subject of the computation of the "rate base," the same distinguished judge said: "The rule of the present reproduction cost, which is a necessary consequence of the foregoing argument, appears to me to have been either expressly or implicitly recognized in all the cases in which the Supreme Court has passed on these matters. Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. 212 U. S. 19, 41, 53 L. ed. 382, 395, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034; Des Moines Gas

Co. v. Des Moines, 238 U. S. 153, 59 L. ed. 1244, P.U.R.1915D, 577, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811; Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co. 212 U. S. 1, 10, 53 L. ed. 371, 378, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 148; Minnesota Rate Cases (Simpson v. Shepard) 230 U. S. 352, 434, 454, 455, 57 L. ed. 1511, 1555, 1563, 1564, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1151, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 729, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 18; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 757, 43 L. ed. 1154, 1161, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Jasper, 189 U. S. 439, 442, 47 L. ed. 892, 894, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571; Darnell v. Edwards, 244 U. S. 564, 568, 61 L. ed. 1317, 1320, P.U.R.1917F, 64, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 701. It is true that its application has not distinctly arisen since the recent rise in prices, but it is not possible that it should have general application, and yet not cover this its most glaring illustration."

In St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Public Service Commission (Dist. Ct. W. D. Mo. C. D.) P.U.R. 1920A, 540, 268 Fed. 267, it is said: "The commission took the original cost when obtainable, and, when not obtainable, average prices for a fixed period of five years before war prices prevailed, going back approximately to the year 1910. . . . It is my judgment that the great weight of authority is against the adoption of a standard of original cost as a controlling basis for determining present value. The present fair value is the object to be attained. Nor do I think it permissible substantially to restrict the inquiry to a period antedating present cost prices." (Italics supplied.)

In Elizabethtown Gaslight Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. 95 N. J. L. 18, 111 Atl. 729, the commission adopted as a standard of value the average prices prevailing for five years preceding January 1, 1916. Swayze, J., speaking for the supreme court of New Jersey, said: "I think it entirely clear that the failure to allow for prices at the time to which the rates apply—July 1, 1919—was an error. It is not denied that prices were very much higher in 1919, and are very much higher now, than the average for the years 1911 to 1916. So notorious is this that the Supreme Court of the United States has referred to it in an opinion as a matter of common knowledge. Lincoln Gas & E. L. Co. v. Lincoln, 250 U. S. 256, at page 268, 63 L. ed. 968, 976, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454. In that case, on its own responsibility, the court suggested that in its opinion the decree ought to be modified to permit the complainant to make another application to the courts for relief. It would be manifestly unjust to apply to a gas company a standard of value different from that applied to others. To what extent the increase in prices may be due to an inflation of the currency, or to any other particular cause, we do not know. What we do know is that the dollar of 1919 and the dollar of 1920 are worth less than the dollar of 1916, and still less compared with the dollar of the average year from 1911 to 1916. If it were proposed to value the property of the gas company in 100-cent dollars, and allow them a return only on that, while other values were on the basis of 50-cent dollars and just double in number, everyone would see the injustice; so far as the increase in prices is due to inflation of the currency, the illustration is a perfect one."

In Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 546, 42 L. ed. 849, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 433, Mr. Justice Harlan, speaking for the court on the subject of railroad rates, said:

"The corporation may not be required to use its property for the benefit of the public without receiving just compensation for the services rendered by it. How such compensation may be ascertained, and what are the necessary elements in such an inquiry, will always be an embarrassing question. . . .

"What the company is entitled to ask is a fair return upon the value of that which it employs for the public convenience. On the other hand, what the public is entitled to demand is that no more be exacted from it for the use of a public highway than the services rendered by it are reasonably worth."

The word "value" has a peculiar meaning when applied to rate making. In Re Potomac Electric Power Co. (D. C.) P.U.R.1917D, 563, 694, it is said: "The use by the courts and commissions in rate cases of the expressions that public service corporations are entitled to 'a reasonable return upon the fair value of their property,' or 'a reasonable return upon the reasonable value of their property,' and similar pronouncements, and the methods adopted by the different commissions and courts in arriving at this fair or reasonable value, clearly indicate that the object and purpose of every valuation upon which rates are to be based is an ascertainment of but one thing—not what the property is worth as an income-producing instrumentality, not for what it would sell or could be bought, not its worth because of its being a monopoly or the holder of rights, easements, franchises, privileges, and benefits accorded it over others, to enable it to perform its public duty, but 'a determined amount, an ascertained and fixed sum, upon which the owners may earn a fair and reasonable return. The sum so arrived at should be one upon which a return may be allowed which will be fair to the investor, who has directed his energies and devoted his substance to the creation of this instrumentality, and fair and just likewise to the consumer, who, under modern conditions, is compelled to use the product of the utility in his daily business and social and domestic life.

"If the word 'amount' is substituted in place of the word 'value,' in § 7 of the Public Utilities Law, and, in the judgment of the commission, such a substitution not only does no violence to the word 'value,' but gives to it a meaning which Congress intended it should convey, it would follow that it is the duty of this commission to ascertain the fair amount which should represent a just basis for rates of this particular utility, as of the time so determined.

"If this view is taken, the determination of fair value becomes the determination of that just and equitable amount upon which, under all the facts, circumstances, and conditions of the utility's construction up to the time of valuation, the return allowed to the utility should be computed."

In Re Central Union Teleph. Co. (Ind.) P.U.R.1920B, at page 825, it is said: "Moreover, even assuming normal costs and usual and ordinary conditions, cost of reproduction is not necessarily controlling, for consideration and weight must be given to all other elements entering into the fair value of the property."

The subject of rate making, especially as applied to a gas company, is discussed with marked ability and a very full citation of authority by the supreme court of Illinois in State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. 291 Ill. 209, P.U.R. 1920C, 640, 125 N. E. 891. It is there said:

"The difficulty is that which is always present—to ascertain a standard by which this justice and reasonableness shall be gauged. The necessity of public regulation of rates arises out of the monopoly of the public service company. The unregulated price of the service ceases, except so far as some substitute for the particular service may be found, to be determined by competition, and the individual consumer is unable to contract on equal terms. Fixing rates by public authority may secure to each individual the advantage of collective bargaining by or in behalf of the whole body of consumers, and result in such a rate as might properly be supposed to result from free competition if free competition were possible. A just and reasonable rate, therefore, is necessarily a question of sound business judgment rather than one of legal formula, and must often be tentative, since exact results cannot be foretold. Public Service Gas Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. 84 N. J. L. 463, 87 Atl. 651. Like so many other questions in the law that involve reasonableness of conduct, it is a question of fact to be settled by the good sense of the tribunal it may come before. That it is not a question of legal formula is shown by a decision of the United States Supreme Court in San Diego Land & Town Co. v. Jasper, 189 U. S. 439, 442, 47 L. ed. 892, 894, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571, that a rate may be reasonable although it fails to produce an adequate return to the public service company, owing to the fact that the business had not developed sufficiently to be remunerative, or to the fact that the plant is on a larger scale than is justified by the present demand. The real test of the justice and reasonableness of any rate seems to be that it should be as low as possible, and yet sufficient to induce the investment of capital in the business and its continuance therein. This, also, is a business question, and depends on the opportunities that may be offered for more profitable investments and the risk involved. In determining the justice and reasonableness of rates, perhaps no better test can ordinarily be found than the rates customarily charged in localities similarly situated. And yet this test is not by any means infallible. What is a reasonable return is a question of fact, the solution of which calls for the exercise of sound judgment and common sense. Duluth Street R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, 161 Wis. 245, P.U.R.1915D, 192, 152 N. W. 887.

"Appellee contends that the only equitable basis for determining value for rate-making purposes is the cost of reproduction new, less depreciation. This contention cannot be sustained. The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates to be charged by a corporation maintaining a public utility under legislative sanction must be the fair value of the property being used by it for the convenience of the public, and in order to ascertain that value the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the present cost of construction, the probable earning capacity of the property under the particular rates prescribed by statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses, are all matters for consideration, and are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. Smyth v. Ames, supra; San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 174 U. S. 739, 757, 43 L. ed. 1154, 1161, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 804; Stanislaus County v. San Joaquin & K. River Canal & Irrig. Co. 192 U. S. 201, 48 L. ed. 406, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 241; Chicago Union Traction Co. v. Chicago, 199 Ill. 579, 65 N. E. 470; Duluth Street R. Co. v. Railroad Commission, supra."

The subject is beset with difficulties, and no hard and fast rule can be safely laid down for fixing values for rate-making purposes. Many of the items which enter into the determination of values are mentioned in the cases we have cited, and the commission seems to have given the subject careful consideration. It has, however, emphasized the pre-war unit of valuation, but the reasoning of the opinion seems to indicate that it has not given due weight to the present costs of reproduction and the probable costs thereof during the near future, or for the time during which the rate fixed will probably be in force; and hence we cannot presume that it has. These are important items to be considered, and it should not be left in doubt whether or not they have been taken into consideration.

It may be said of valuation what has been said of the return to be allowed: "What is a reasonable return is a question of fact, the solution of which calls for the exercise of sound judgment and common sense."

We are constantly measuring ordinary care by the conduct of the "ordinarily careful man," and so, here, after hearing all that is said affecting value, we must measure value by the "sound judgment and common sense" of impartial tribunals charged with the ascertainment of such value.

—how value
ascertained.

The Laporte Case, so largely relied on by the commission and by counsel for the appellee in their brief, loses much of its force by reason of the fact that the opinion was concurred in by only three out of five of the commissioners. The opinion of Commissioner Haynes is an able one, but Commissioner Johnson only concurred in the order to be made in that case, "but not in the opinion," and Van Auken, commissioner, dissented. The case furthermore does not accord with the cases we have cited.

Counsel for the appellee also rely upon the finding of Mr. Justice Hughes, as referee, in Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission, 17 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 81, P.U.R.1918F, 335, but the facts of that case are entirely different from those in the case in judgment. In the Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. Case there were three different valuations: One based on the original costs or investment; another upon reproduction upon the average unit prices prevailing from 1912 to 1916, inclusive; and the third upon an official valuation made in 1914 and acquiesced in by the company. The third valuation was selected. As the official valuation had been so recently made, it seems manifest that it was the proper valuation to be adopted.

The opinion of the commission does not state what amount was allowed for operating expenses, nor what per cent on the value fixed it considered a fair and reasonable return on the ascertained valuation. It simply fixed the price of gas per 1,000 cubic feet to be paid by the consumer. Operating expenses are accruing from day to day, and are determined by the prices of to-day, and not of some future date. In any estimate of rates to be paid by the consumer of gas, it is essential to ascertain the costs of operation, for the gross receipts, less the costs of operation, is what the gas company gets for its service.

"The actual cost of its operation must always be taken into consideration in determining whether or not it receives a fair compensation above that cost." Brooklyn Borough Gas Case, supra; State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. 291 Ill. 209, P.U.R.1920C, 640, 125 N. E. 891.

In 1920 the actual operating expenses of the gas company were $1.668 per 1,000 cubic feet, and this amount was not called in question by the commission. The highest rate to the consumer was fixed at $1.75 per 1,000 cubic feet, and the probable average rate at $1.70. This would leave to the gas company only from 4 to 9 cents per 1,000 cubic feet, which, upon a consumption of 100,000,000 cubic feet per year, is not a fair compensation for the service furnished. The gas plant was not larger than necessary, and the commission, after fixing the value thereof for rate-making purposes, should have determined the rate of return the company should receive on such valuation, and the costs per 1,000 cubic feet of operation. The aggregate of these two sums divided by the number of thousand cubic feet of gas to be sold would give the price to be charged to the consumer. For example, assuming the plant to be valued at $300,000, the return to the company to be 10 per cent, and the amount of gas sold to be 100,000,000 cubic feet:

—method of determining rate of commodity.

Ten per cent on $300,000	$ 30,000 .
Cost of producing 100,000,000 cubic feet at $1.66	166,000
	<hr/>
	$196,000
Cost to consumer per 1,000 cubic feet	$1.96

These figures are given merely by way of illustration and are not intended to intimate any opinion upon either valuation or percentage. It is manifest that the commission either did not take into consideration the costs of operation, or did not accept the company's estimate of such costs. No suggestion of the latter is found in the opinion of the commission.

For reasons stated by the commission we do not think that the losses sustained by the gas company prior to its application for an increase of rates should be amortized, but if, upon further investigation, it is ascertained that a loss has been sustained since that date, in consequence of the rate fixed by the commission, such loss —amortizing loss.

should be amortized and spread over such a term of years as will be fair to the gas company and not too burdensome to the consumers.

If in any rate fixed the gas company should make a profit upon which a tax is imposed, that should be taken into consideration in fixing the per cent of return it is to receive on its investment. —allowance for profit tax.

There was evidence before the commission that the service furnished to many customers was of a very inferior character and of no practical value. The regulation of the character of service to be furnished to customers is fully within the powers of the commission, and we shall assume, until the contrary is made to appear, that the commission will exercise that power whenever a proper case is made before it.

In the absence of any statement of facts found by the commission or any tabulation of figures, we are unable to say what rate of charge to the consumer would be fair and reasonable to both the consumer and the gas company, and this case will therefore be remanded to the State Corporation Commission, with directions to reconsider the same upon the evidence already before it, and such additional evidence, if any, as it shall permit to be introduced, and to conform its findings to the views hereinbefore expressed, and, in the event of another appeal to this court, to state the facts found by it, and to tabulate the figures so as to show clearly how it arrived at its conclusion, so far as dependent upon such figures.

ANNOTATION.

Public utility rate valuations as affected by advance in price conditions due to World War.

I. Scope and introduction, 555.

II. Rules in general:

- a. War or post-war prices not necessarily the controlling factor, 556.
- b. Higher price levels due to war conditions not to be ignored, 559.

I. Scope and introduction.

As indicated in the above title, the annotation includes, in general, only cases involving valuations for rate-making purposes. Several cases are referred to where the valuation was for other purposes, which are indicated in connection with the citation of the case. But in order to avoid confusion it is desirable to confine the scope of the annotation, in general, to rate valuations.

Reproduction cost has, of course, long been regarded by the courts and commissions in many states as a factor in determining present fair value for rate-making purposes. Average unit prices for a period of years have been frequently taken in computing this cost, even before war conditions prevailed. The annotation does not treat the specific question whether prices should be computed as of the particular time of the valuation, or over a series of years; but is, in the main, limited somewhat strictly to consideration of the effect of the recent abnormal advance in prices brought about by the World War. The cases in which this particular

II.—continued.

- c. Additions and betterments constructed at war or post-war prices, 560.

III. Particular holdings and applications:

- a. General statement, 560.
- b. Decisions of the courts, 561.
- c. Decisions of utility commissions, 568.

element has been considered begin to appear about 1916.

The subject under annotation should not be confused with the question whether abnormally high operating costs, due to war conditions, should be considered in determining the return to which the utility is entitled. It is obvious that, even though a public utility is allowed its actual increased operating expenses in the abnormal times during which the country has recently been passing, this does not mean that, after paying operating expenses, it is necessarily entitled to a return on the increased value of its property based on higher unit costs of labor and materials arising from conditions brought about by the late war. The importance of keeping in mind this distinction is pointed out by former Justice Charles E. Hughes, as referee, in Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1918) 17 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 81, P.U.R.1918, 335, infra, III.

The present annotation should not be regarded as an attempt to set forth the rules or factors to be considered in valuing utility property.

In fact, it has been frequently pointed out that there are no fixed rules or formulas by which courts of commissions are to be guided, but that the matter of determining a rate-base valuation is one calling for judgment and discretion, with due consideration of all the circumstances of the particular case; and many elements enter as factors into the calculations. There are various theories, of course, of valuation, as the original cost or investment theory, the present "fair value" theory, and the cost of reproduction theory. It is not the purpose of the annotation to go into these various theories or fundamental principles of valuation. Of course, if a court or commission should adopt the actual cost or investment theory as its exclusive guide in valuation, and the plant was constructed prior to the late war, the distinctive question under annotation does not arise, provided its conclusion was not affected by the recent abnormal increase in prices of labor and commodities. Usually, however, even where the actual cost theory has been given controlling consideration, attention has been called to this method as fairer, in view of the prevailing abnormal war prices, and such cases are in point in the annotation. Where the "fair value" theory is adopted, cost of reproduction is considered as one of the elements or factors, and in such cases the question arises whether unit prices should be taken as at the time of the valuation, representing, often, many times the original cost, or whether pre-war prices should be accepted, or a medium view taken; and the same is true, of course, in those states where cost of reproduction is regarded as controlling in fixing valuation.

The recent abnormally high prices have served to emphasize the desirability of some more permanent basis of valuation than the cost of reproduction, and it may be stated generally that a number of the commissions have called attention to the necessity of finding some more satisfactory basis of valuation, even if this method, in times past, was equitable. See, for example: Re York County Water Co. (1920; Me.) P.U.R.1921A, 439; Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1920; Me.) P.U.R.1921A, 561; Re United R. & E. Co. (1919; Md.) P.U.R.1920A, 1; Maires v. Flatbush Gas Co. (1918; N. Y.) P.U.R.1920E, 931; and Re Longporte Gas & E. Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1921A, 824, under III. c, infra. The original cost or investment theory has sometimes been regarded as affording a more satisfactory, because a more permanent, basis—at least, so as to entitle it to the major consideration.

II. Rules in general.

a. War or post-war prices not necessarily the controlling factor.

While the decisions, both of the courts and of the various utility commissions, generally recognize the doctrine that in determining rate valuations there should be taken into consideration the fact that a higher level of prices and materials has been brought about by conditions due to the World War, and that this higher level will probably continue for an indefinite period, yet it is held in almost all the cases that, with respect to plants constructed at pre-war prices, the prevailing abnormally high prices of labor and materials, due to war conditions, should not be taken as the sole criterion or controlling element in fixing valuations of a public utility for rate-making purposes. This view is supported by the following court decisions: Houston Electric Co. v. Houston (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 328, 265 Fed. 360; Galveston Electric Co. v. Galveston (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147, affirmed in (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921-22, p. 382) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 351; Winona v. Wisconsin (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147, affirmed in (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921-22, p. 382) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 351; Winona v. Wisconsin (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147, affirmed in (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921-22, p. 382) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 351; Minnesota Light & P. Co. (1921) 272 Fed. 996; State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. (1919) 291 Ill. 209; Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1920; D. C.) P.U.R.1920C, 326; State ex rel. Southern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) — Mo. —

233 S. W. 425; New York Interurban Water Co. v. Mt. Vernon (1920) 110 Misc. 281, P.U.R.1920D, 515, 180 N. Y. Supp. 304; Kings County Lighting Co. v. Lewis (1920) 110 Misc. 204, P.U.R.1920D, 145, 180 N. Y. Supp. 570; Municipal Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1920) 113 Misc. 748, 186 N. Y. Supp. 541; People ex rel. Iroquois Natural Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) 194 App. Div. 578, P.U.R.1921B, 485, 186 N. Y. Supp. 177; People ex rel. Adirondack Power & L. Corp. v. Public Service Commission (1922) 200 App. Div. 268, 193 N. Y. Supp. 186.

Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 483, 267 Fed. 231, cited under III. a, infra, does not appear entirely in accord with the above cases.

The rule above indicated that prevailing prices of labor and materials, which are abnormally high because of conditions brought about by the late war, should not be taken as the sole criterion or controlling element in determining valuation of the property of a public utility for rate-making purposes, where the plant has been constructed at pre-war prices, is supported, also, by numerous decisions of the various utility commissions.

Arkansas.—Re Rogers Light & Water Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 311; Re Two States Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921B, 405; Re Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921B, 516.

California.—Sherman v. California-Michigan Land & Water Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918D, 93; Re Moore Park Water, Light & P. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919B, 679; Re Southern Sierras Power Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921C, 218 (abstract); Re Southern California Edison Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 65.

Colorado.—Re Mountain State Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1917) P.U.R.1917B, 198; Re Denver Tramway Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract).

Connecticut.—Danbury v. Danbury & B. Gas & E. L. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 193; Stamford v. Stamford Gas & E. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 303.

District of Columbia.—Re Potomac Electric R. Co. (1917) P.U.R.1917D, 563; Re Capital Traction Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919F, 779.

Georgia.—Re Georgia R. & P. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921A, 165.

Idaho.—Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921B, 739.

Illinois.—Re Union Gas & E. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918C, 248 (abstract); Re Southern Illinois Light & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919D, 489; Re Springfield Gas & E. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920A, 446; Re Springfield Consol. R. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 474; Re Illinois Northern Utilities Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 908; Re Public Service Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921B, 438; Re Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921B, 229.

Indiana.—Princeton v. Princeton Light & P. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918E, 300; Re United Public Service Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918F, 316; Re Home Teleph. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919C, 209; Re Central Union Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920B, 813; Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 586; Re Mt. Vernon Waterworks Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921C, 219 (abstract); Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 824; Re Kokomo Gas & Fuel Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 390; East Chicago v. East Chicago & I. Harbor Water Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 193.

Maine.—Re Guilford Water Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918C, 916; Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919B, 423 (abstract); Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 561; Re New York County Water Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 439.

Maryland.—Salisbury v. Salisbury Light, Heat & P. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918E, 331; Westminster v. Consolidated Public Utilities Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 506; Re United R. & E. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920A, 1; Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 417.

Michigan.—Holland v. McGuire (1919) P.U.R.1920B, 149; Re Cole (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 385; Re Lansing Fuel & Gas Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 465; Re Lansing Fuel & Gas Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 387; Re Sault Ste. Marie (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 149.

Missouri.—Re Kansas City Electric

Light Co. (1917) P.U.R.1917C, 728; Re Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919B, 422 (abstract); Re Joplin & P. R. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919B, 366; Springfield City Water Co. v. Springfield (1919) P.U.R.1919D, 853; Re Missouri Gas & E. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 210 (abstract); Re St. Joseph Water Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract); Re Lead Bell Teleph. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract); Re St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920A, 542; Re Kansas City Gas Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 41; Re Memphis Teleph. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 145 (abstract).

Nebraska.—Re Omaha & C. B. Street R. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919A, 845; Re Central Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921B, 461; Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 678; Re Stanton Independent Teleph. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 240.

New Hampshire.—Re Grafton County Electric Light & P. Co. (1916) P.U.R.1916E, 879; Re Concord Gaslight Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 169; Re Franklin Light & P. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 506.

New Jersey.—Re Public Service R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 593.

New York.—Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1918) 17 N. Y. Dept. R. 81, P.U.R.1918F, 335; Re Westchester Electric R. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920B, 250; Whitehead v. Niagara Falls Gas & E. L. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 264; Maires v. Flatbush Gas Co. (1918) P.U.R.1920E, 931; Re Sea Cliff & G. C. Gas Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 211; Davis v. Pennsylvania Gas Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921B, 342; Hoffman v. Elmira Water, Light & R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 409; Re New York State R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 496; Buck v. New York Teleph. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 798; Re Long Island Lighting Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 2; Re New York State R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 75.

North Dakota.—Fargo v. Union Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920A, 764; Patterson v. Hughes Electric Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 1.

Ohio.—Re Union Gas & E. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1918E, 934.

Oregon.—Re Douglas County Light & Water Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 667.

Pennsylvania.—Fox v. Pine Grove Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920B, 380; Tyrone v. Home Electric Light & Steam Heating Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 562; Verona v. Verona Suburban Water Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 942; Frackville v. Mountain City Water Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 820.

South Dakota.—Re Salem Teleph. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919B, 734.

Tennessee.—Re Ramier (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 121.

Utah.—Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919D, 645; Re Utah Light & Traction Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920B, 262; Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 854; Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 145 (abstract); Re Utah Power & Light Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 436; Re Telluride Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 168.

Vermont.—Re Colonial Power & Light Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920A, 215; Milne v. Montpelier & B. Light & P. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 558.

Virginia.—Re Roanoke Waterworks Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 745; Re Culpeper Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920D, 305; Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 49; Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 193; Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 268; Re Lynchburg Traction & Light Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 87.

Washington.—Public Service Commission v. Spokane Falls Gaslight Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 519; Spokane v. Washington Water Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 762.

West Virginia.—Re Light, Fuel, & P. Co. (1917) P.U.R.1918C, 248 (abstract); Re Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 655; Re Moundsville Water Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 28.

Wisconsin.—Racine Water Co. v. Railroad Commission (1918) P.U.R.1919A, 913; Re Wisconsin Traction, Light, Heat & P. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919B, 224; Re Milton & M. J. Teleph. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1920C, 110.

b. Higher price levels due to war conditions not to be ignored.

According to the weight of authority, the higher prices of labor and materials which have prevailed during and since the World War are not to be entirely ignored in determining the valuation of the property of a public utility for rate-making purposes, since it is generally recognized that a higher general level of prices is likely to prevail for an indefinite time; and, while it would be unfair to the public to fix a valuation based merely on consideration of abnormally high war prices, which are already to some extent receding, yet it would be equally unfair to the utility entirely to disregard the general higher level of prices existing since the war, and consider merely pre-war prices. This view is supported by the following decisions of the courts: Houston Electric Co. v. Houston (1920) P.U.R. 1920F, 328, 265 Fed. 360; Joplin & P. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1919) 267 Fed. 584; Landon v. Kansas Ct. of Industrial Relations (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 807, 269 Fed. 433; Winona v. Wisconsin-Minnesota Light & P. Co. (1920; Fed.) P.U.R. 1921A, 146 (on motion for temporary injunction); Galveston Electric Co. v. Galveston (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147; Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1921) — App. D. C. —, 276 Fed. 327; Winona v. Wisconsin-Minnesota Light & P. Co. (1921) 276 Fed. 996 (on exceptions to master's report); State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. (1919) 291 Ill. 209, P.U.R.1920C, 640, 125 N. E. 891; State ex rel. Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) — Mo. —, 233 S. W. 425; Elizabethtown Gaslight Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. (1920) 95 N. J. L. 18, P.U.R.1920F, 1001, 111 Atl. 729; People ex rel. Iroquois Natural Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) 194 App. Div. 578, P.U.R. 1921B, 485, 186 N. Y. Supp. 177; PETERSBURG GAS CO. v. PETERSBURG (reported herewith) ante, 542.

And the doctrine above indicated, that war and post-war prices should be considered in determining valuation for rate-making purposes, is supported by the decisions of various utility commissions.

Connecticut.—Stamford v. Stamford Gas & E. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 303.

Georgia.—Re Georgia R. & Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921A, 165.

Illinois.—Re Springfield Consol. R. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 474; Re Illinois Northern Utilities Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 908; Re Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. (1921) P.U.R. 1921B, 229.

Indiana.—Re Central U. Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920B, 813; Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 824; East Chicago v. East Chicago & I. Harbor Water Co. (1921) P.U.R. 1922A, 193.

Maine.—Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 561.

Michigan.—Re Houghton County Traction Co. (1919) P.U.R.1920E, 350; Re Cole (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 385; Re Lansing Fuel & Gas Co. (1921) P.U.R. 1921C, 465; Re Sault Ste Marie (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 149.

Missouri.—Re Kansas City Electric Light Co. (1917) P.U.R.1917C, 728.

Nebraska.—Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 678; Re Central Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R. 1921B, 461.

New Hampshire. — Re Franklin Light & P. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 506; Re Concord Gaslight Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 169.

New Jersey.—Re Public Service R. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 593.

New York.—Buck v. New York Teleph. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 798; Re Long Island Lighting Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 2.

Oregon.—Re Douglas County Light & Water Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 667.

Utah.—Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 145 (abstract).

Vermont.—Milne v. Montpelier & B. Light & P. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920E, 558.

Virginia.—Re Lynchburg Traction & Light Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 87.

c. Additions and betterments constructed at war or post-war prices.

The rules above laid down, that valuation of a public utility for rate-making purposes is not to be determined solely by taking unit prices which have arisen to an abnormally high point due to war conditions, but that the higher war and post-war level of prices should be given consideration, and not entirely ignored, have been somewhat modified with respect to necessary extensions and additions to the physical property of the utility, made during or since the war at the prevailing high prices. The courts and commissions have held that such betterments or additions do not stand in the same class as construction made at pre-war figures, and have given greater consideration to actual costs, even though unit prices were abnormally high. Generally, the actual cost of such war or post-war improvements, where reasonable and necessary, has been allowed. Of course, owing to the small amount of construction of utility property during the past few years, this point has been a minor one, and has been little discussed. As supporting the views above indicated, see the following cases:

California.—Re Southern California Edison Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 65.

District of Columbia.—Re Capital Traction Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919F, 779.

Georgia.—Re Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 833.

Idaho.—Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921B, 739.

Illinois.—Re Southern Illinois Light & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919D, 489 (recognizing rule).

Indiana.—East Chicago v. East Chicago & I. H. Water Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 193.

Maryland.—Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 417.

Missouri.—State ex rel. Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) — Mo. —, 233 S. W. 425; Re Missouri Gas & E. Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 210 (abstract); Re St. Joseph Water Co. (1919) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract); Re St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919) P.U.R.

1920A, 542; Re Kansas City Gas Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 41.

Nebraska.—Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 678.

New Hampshire.—Re Franklin Light & P. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922A, 506. And see Re Concord Gaslight Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 169.

New York.—Municipal Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1920) 113 Misc. 748, 186 N. Y. Supp. 541; Re Long Island Lighting Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 1.

Ohio.—Re Alliance Gas & P. Co. (1918) P.U.R.1919B, 423 (abstract).

Utah.—See Re Tulluride Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 163.

Virginia.—Re Roanoke Waterworks Co. (1920) P.U.R.1920C, 745; Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 193; Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 268; Re Lynchburg Traction & Light Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 87.

Washington.—Public Service Commission v. Spokane Falls Gaslight Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921C, 519; Spokane v. Washington Water Power Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 762.

West Virginia.—Re Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. (1921) P.U.R.1921E, 655. And see Re Moundsville Water Co. (1921) P.U.R.1922B, 28.

III. Particular holdings and applications.

a. General statement.

The statements already made in the annotation regarding the effect of war and post-war prices in rate valuation, to the general effect that, as to pre-war construction, valuation should not be determined solely by the abnormally high unit costs during or since the war, but that the prevailing higher level of prices should be given consideration, leave the matter somewhat indefinite. This has been felt, and sometimes expressed, by the courts and commissions. It should be kept in mind, however, as already indicated, that valuation is a matter of judgment, in view of all the circumstances in the particular case and the necessity of doing justice, as far as possible, both to consumers and to the utility, and that fixed rules cannot, and should not, be laid down. For practical purposes it is desirable to show how the courts and commissions have treated the higher prices resulting from the war in determining valuation, and to indicate some of the various other elements they have considered, and methods they have used. But the point of view should be kept in mind that the annotation does not deal with methods or theories of valuation in general, but merely with the question of the effect and place of the war and post-war prices in a utility rate valuation.

The most practical, and it is believed the most helpful, method, is to arrange the decisions according to jurisdictions, giving first the decisions of the courts on the matter.

b. Decisions of the courts.

The United States Supreme Court, while holding that a public utility is entitled to earn a fair return upon the value of its property, determined as of the time of the inquiry, has not indicated that such value is to be determined at abnormally high post-war costs of labor and material. Its decisions point rather to the acceptance of the majority rule that, while higher post-war levels of prices are to be considered in determining present value, prevailing prices are not necessarily controlling.

In Lincoln Gas & E. L. Co. v. Lincoln (1918) 250 U.S. 256, 63 L. ed. 968, 39 Sup. Ct. Rep. 454, the court, in holding that a complaint against a gas-rate ordinance should be dismissed without prejudice to the bringing of a new action, if the rate proved confiscatory, said that it is a matter of common knowledge that, owing principally to the World War, the costs of labor and supplies of every kind have greatly advanced since the ordinance was adopted, and that annual returns upon capital and enterprise have materially increased.

In a suit attacking a street railway rate ordinance as confiscatory, the Federal Supreme Court, in Galveston Electric Co. v. Galveston (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921-22, p. 382) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 351, affirmed 20 A.L.R.—36.

ing (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147, appears, in effect, to have given approval to the doctrine that prices prevailing at the time of the hearing are not necessarily controlling as a basis in determining reproduction costs. In this case both the master and the court refused to adopt as a basis the prices prevailing at the time of the hearing, which had risen to 110 per cent above those of 1913; and the calculation of reproduction costs was based on prophecy as to the future general price level of commodities and labor, which the company contended should be 60 to 70 per cent above 1913 prices, but which the master found—and this finding the court accepted—would be 33½ per cent above the pre-war level. The Supreme Court held that it could not say that it was erroneous, in fixing the base value, to assume the lower percentage of increase above historical reproduction value, instead of the percentage claimed by the utility.

The Federal district court, in the last case, said that, in determining the present value for the purpose of a rate base, the reproduction method should be applied reasonably, and, as applied to the inflated values which have arisen since and because of the war, it must appear that the level of prices is not transitory; that there can be no doubt that the criterion is the present value of the plant; but that there can be equally no doubt that the legislature cannot, in periods of acute depression, reduce rates on the theory that a valuation of land has been fixed thereby, and, on the other hand, that it cannot be compelled to raise rates in periods of enormous and temporary inflation, on the theory that the value of the plant, for rate-making purposes, has been thereby increased.

The Federal Supreme Court, in a case decided previously to the beginning of the late war, held that the valuation of the property of a gas company, upon which it was entitled to a fair return, must, as a general rule, be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the reasonableness of rates fixed by statute, giving the company the benefit of any increase in the value of the property since it was acquired. Willcox v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1909) 212 U. S. 19, 53 L. ed. 382, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1134, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, 15 Ann. Cas. 1034. It was said: "And we concur with the court below in holding that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding the rates. If the property which legally enters into the consideration of the question of rates has increased in value since it was acquired, the company is entitled to the benefit of such increase. This is, at any rate, the general rule. We do not say there may not possibly be an exception to it where the property may have increased so enormously in value as to render a rate permitting a reasonable return upon such increased value unjust to the public. How such facts should be treated is not a question now before us, as this case does not present it. We refer to the matter only for the purpose of stating that the decision herein does not prevent an inquiry into the question, when, if ever, it should be necessarily presented."

The above case has been often referred to in the class of cases under consideration, but the ruling that the value of the property is to be determined as of the time when the inquiry is made regarding rates has not been construed as requiring a valuation based on unit prices, abnormally high since the war. Rather, the courts and commissions have followed the suggestion in the above quotation regarding a possible exception in cases where there has been such an enormous increase in value that a return based upon it would be unfair to the public.

Thus, in Winona v. Wisconsin-Minnesota Light & P. Co. (1921) 276 Fed. 996, the Federal district court, after citing the above and other Federal cases, stated that the ruling of those decisions was that the utility was entitled to a fair return on the reasonable value of the property used and useful in rendering the service; but that this did not mean that the reasonable value was necessarily the same as the cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, estimated as of the time of the inquiry, with additions for overheads, etc., nor did it mean that the reasonable value was necessarily the same as the original cost of construction, less depreciation, with similar additions; also, that it did not mean that cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, based on average prices for any series of years, was necessarily controlling; but that it did mean that all of these methods, and others, might be resorted to as aids in forming a judgment as to what is the present reasonable value. And the court took the view that, in determining reasonable value, it was not confined in the inquiry to unit prices prevailing on any given date, but might include consideration of unit prices of the past as well of those of the present, and the trend of unit prices, with the probability or improbability of a change of trend, as well as the financial history of the utility, the original cost of the property, and the invested capital.

And in Winona v. Wisconsin-Minnesota Light & P. Co. (Fed.) supra, it was held that the master, in taking as his basic figures for valuation of the physical property of the company an estimate representing the cost of reproduction new, based on prices prevailing May 1, 1919, less depreciation, plus various additions, as for overheads, cost of financing, etc., had arrived at a final valuation higher than could be considered reasonable, in view of all the facts. It was said that apparently the master went upon the theory that cost of reproduction new should be the controlling factor, whereas this was only one of the elements which should be considered with all the relevant facts in determining reasonable present values. The court was of the opinion that the high prices since 1914, should be considered, but also that the more recent decline in prices, even since the hearing before the master, should be noted, this decline being so continuous and marked that the court would take judicial notice of the same.

It was held, also, in Winona v. Wisconsin-Minnesota Light & P. Co. (Fed.) supra, that a valuation by the municipality of the physical property as of May 1, 1919, based on so-called "normal pre-war construction costs depreciated," adding to this estimate 25 per cent in order to obtain present value, with further additions for actual items purchased subsequent to that time, and for land and working capital, was not a fair and reasonable valuation. The court said the inherent vice in this method was the assumption that there was such a thing as a "normal construction cost;" that this term was misleading; that it meant construction at normal prices of labor and materials, whereas a study of prices extending over a long period of years was convincing that there was not now and never had been such a thing as normal prices in this sense; and that such a valuation represented neither the average prices for a certain period nor prices at a particular date, but simply an opinion as to what should have been "normal" prices during the selected period.

Original cost, less theoretical accrued depreciation, was held in Landon v. Kansas Ct. of Industrial Relations (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 807, 269 Fed. 433, not to be a proper standard to adopt as the "controlling basis" of valuation. The court said that cost of reproduction new, at the present time, and at prevailing prices, should not be rejected, but carefully considered, together with the other elements, in reaching a reasonable adjustment having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts.

And original cost of construction and present cost of reconstruction were both considered in Houston Electric Co. v. Houston (1920) P.U.R. 1920F, 328, 265 Fed. 360, in fixing valuations for rate-making purposes. As to the cost of reproduction, it was said that the evidence showed that prevailing prices were approximately 100 per cent above the pre-war level, but that present prices were not used, on the supposition that the existing level would be gradually lowered, and for that reason percentages of present prices varying from 60 to 70 per cent were taken. It was said that it seemed to be a fair assumption that, as concerns a public utility for rate-making purposes, the price level would remain 50 per cent above that obtaining at the beginning of the war, and would do so for an indefinite period of time; but that it would be manifestly unfair to the public to require it to pay upon a valuation based upon the existing prices under the unsettled conditions.

That consideration must be given to the advanced war prices was the view expressed in Joplin & P. R. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1919) 267 Fed. 584, where the court said that it appeared that great, if not undue, emphasis was laid upon the original cost of the property at a period greatly antedating that of the investigation; that the court could not say that the present period of high prices was so temporary or abnormal that it might be disregarded in arriving at the value of the property; that no one could say what degree of depression might ultimately come, but that it was reasonably certain that the cost of the property under consideration would never again approximate figures prevailing in the year before the World War.

And it was held in St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 540, 268 Fed. 267, that the method of valuation adopted by the Missouri commission, in taking the original cost, when obtainable, and, when not obtainable, the average prices for a period of five years before war prices prevailed, going back approximately to the year 1910, was erroneous, reducing the valuation so substantially that rates based thereon would be inadequate and practically confiscatory. The court said that the great weight of authority was against the adoption of a standard of original cost as a controlling basis for determining present values, which was the object to be attained; and that it was not permissible substantially to restrict the inquiry to a period antedating present cost prices.

There can be no doubt, it was said in Galveston Electric Co. v. Galveston (1921) P.U.R.1921D, 547, 272 Fed. 147, that the legislature cannot, in periods of acute depression, reduce rates on the theory that a valuation of the plant has been fixed thereby, and, on the other hand, that it cannot be compelled to raise rates in periods of enormous and temporary inflation, on the theory that the value of the plant for rate-making purposes has been thereby increased. And it was held that in fixing the present value of the property of a street railway company for rate-making purposes, the reproduction method should be applied reasonably, and, as applied to the inflated values which have arisen since and because of the war, it must appear that the level of prices is not transitory; and that the finding of the master in this case that the prices obtaining at the time of the valuation in 1920 were transitory, and not likely to continue thereafter, and that a price level of 33½ per cent above the pre-war cost is a fair estimate in arriving at the rate base, should be approved.

It must appear that the valuation in prices is not merely transitory; but once it appears that the new price levels since the war are not transitory, they may serve as a basis for valuation in rate making, and it is no objection that at some future time prices may fall, since when that time comes the property must again be revalued. Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton (1920) P.U.R.1920F, 483, 267 Fed. 231.

And it was held in Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton (Fed.) supra, that a period of two years following the World War was, despite its unusual character as to enhanced prices, sufficient, in view of the probability of a continuance, for some time at least, of a higher price level, to furnish a basis for the calculation of a rate base for a future time long enough to entitle a utility to call for judicial action. The court recognized the doctrine that constant readjustment as prices varied was impracticable, and temporary variations in price did not warrant relief, but said that in this instance the utility was faced with a condition which permitted it to receive much less than the return contemplated by statute, and that this condition, though probably not permanent—at least, in its present exaggerated form—was bound to exist over a period of some years.

And in Consolidated Gas Co. v. Newton (Fed.) supra, the court held that in determining the rate base the utility was entitled to profit by the general rise in prices and to obtain a proportionate increase in profit based upon the enhanced value of the capital, the return not, in fact, being greater, because of the reduced value of the dollar. In other words, the court, contrary, apparently, to what appears to be the weight of authority, took the view that the present reproduction cost was the controlling factor, and criticized as an abandonment of any attempt to deal intelligibly with the question the doctrine that cost of reproduction and the original cost were each elements to be considered. It is said that this doctrine could mean nothing unless it was accompanied by a rule which would establish some standard; that it would be understandable to say that the two estimates should be averaged, but that the latter view could obviously command no support; and that merely to leave the question with a caution that several elements were to be considered was to abandon any effort to solve it.

It was said, regarding the above case, by the Nebraska commission in Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (Neb.) P.U.R.1921C, 678, that the court held specifically that reproduction new at the time of the inquiry, properly depreciated to represent the condition of the property, is the basis on which to compute rates, and declared that such conclusion was entirely justified by the consideration of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; that the decision was rendered in August, 1920, at which time there appeared to be no promise of change in the high-price levels then in effect.

The court in New York & Q. Gas Co. v. Newton (1920) P.U.R.1921A, 530, 269 Fed. 277, held that the year 1919 was "a sufficient basis for the calculation of the cost of production and the 'rate base' for a future long enough to call for some judicial action."

It may be observed, however, that the annotation does not deal with the question of costs of operation during abnormal times, and excludes such holdings as that in Kings County Lighting Co. v. Nixon (1920) P.U.R. 1921A, 737, 268 Fed. 143, to the effect that the eighteen-month period following the World War, though conditions were abnormal, was not too short a period to enable a court to pass judgment as to the confiscatory nature of a statutory public utility rate.

In Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (1921) — App. D. C. —, 276 Fed. 327, the court of appeals of the District of Columbia held that the public utilities commission of the District of Columbia had erred in ignoring the increase in value of utility property between 1914 and December 31, 1916, the time of the valuation, and in taking as a basis the fair value of the property as of July 1, 1914, with allowance for net additional expenditures on the property subsequent to that date. The commission had stated that prices had so advanced under the artificial stimulus produced by the European War, with such rapidity and to such an extent, as to prevent the formation of a reliable opinion as to their permanency of future effect, and, the court said, had declined to find the present value of the property, because not satisfied as to how long existing conditions would continue. It was said that, in assuming this position, the commission overlooked the provision of the statute authorizing it at any time, of its own initiative, to make a revaluation of the property of any public utility; that it was the duty of the commission to consider and give due weight to evidence as to the existing value of the property, and, as conditions changed and values were substantially affected, it would have been its further duty to exercise its discretion and revalue the property; that while existing conditions were world wide, and their duration and future effect were problematical, there was no immediate prospect of a return to normal conditions; and that there was sufficient substantial evidence before the commission as to the rise in values so that its action could not be justified on the ground that there would be practical difficulty in attempting to ascertain the increase in value of the property between 1914 and 1916. The court said that the principal object of valuation was to provide a rate base, and that the statute clearly contemplated that the commission should ascertain the value as of "the time of said valuation, and not as of some anterior date;" and that it has been ruled many times that there must be a fair return to the utility "upon the reasonable value of the property, at the time it is being used for the purpose."

However, the court in Potomac Electric Power Co. v. Public Utilities Commission (D. C.) supra, pointed out that there was a very substantial difference between considering the present cost of reproduction as one of the essential and important elements in the determination of present value, and the acceptance, as conclusive evidence of such value, of mere expert evidence of present cost of reproduction. And the case appears to be authority for the view that the increase in cost should be considered, but not necessarily for the proposition that such increase is a controlling element, it being said that the present cost of reproduction is one of the necessary elements for consideration, along with other relevant facts, in fixing the fair and reasonable value of the property.

The Illinois supreme court in State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. (1919) 291 Ill. 209, P.U.R.1920C, 640, 125 N. E. 891, held that, in determining value for rate-making purposes, the existing cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, did not furnish an equitable basis, and that the doctrine that the valuation is to be determined as of the time the inquiry is made, and that the utility is entitled to the benefit of increases in value of the property since it was acquired, could not be applied where the property had increased so enormously in value as to render a rate permitting a reasonable return upon such increased value unjust to the public. It was said that, in order to ascertain the fair value of the property, there must be taken into consideration the original cost of construction, the amount expended in permanent improvements, the present cost of construction, probable earning capacity, and the sum required to meet operating expenses.

The court in State Public Utility Commission ex rel. Springfield v. Springfield Gas & E. Co. (Ill.) supra, took the view, which is apparently supported by the weight of authority, that the increased cost of reproduction at the time of the valuation should be taken into consideration, but that this is only one of many elements, and that fixed rules cannot be laid down. It was said: "It would be equally as unfair to the consumer to fix the rate at a figure which would produce a reasonable income on a value determined by the cost of reproduction new at a time when cost of construction was abnormally inflated, as it would be unfair to the public utility to compel it to serve the public for a rate that would produce a reasonable income on a value determined by cost of reproduction new at a time when the cost of construction was abnormally low. Therefore it cannot be laid down as a rule without qualifications that cost of reproduction new, less depreciation, is the only basis of valuation for rate-making purposes. It is equally true that the original cost of construction, less depreciation, cannot be held to be the only proper basis for determination of valuation for rate-making purposes. As we have pointed out heretofore in this opinion, the weight of authority is that every element having any bearing on the situation must be considered in the investigation, and then sound business judgment applied to the determination of a valuation that is fair and just to the consumer and the utility. Each case must be considered on its own merits, and such result of value arrived at as may be just and right in each case. It is not a matter of formulas, but there must be a reasonable judgment, having its basis in a proper consideration of all relevant facts. We consider any value a fair value which fair and reasonable men would say ought to be attached to the property, under all the circumstances of the particular case, for the purpose of measuring a return which the public should pay to the owner."

In Detroit v. Michigan R. Commission (1920) 209 Mich. 395, P.U.R. 1920D, 867, 177 N. W. 306, the court held that, in determining the valuation of utility property for rate-making purposes, it was proper to take the present market value of the land, with reproduction costs, less depreciation, but does not discuss the matter of abnormally high unit prices since the war, and was apparently intended merely to overrule the contention that the original cost to the utility should control.

In State ex rel. Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) — Mo. —, 233 S. W. 425, the court, in holding that rates should not be based upon reproduction cost new, less depreciation, estimated at a time when prices were abnormally high and rapidly fluctuating, but that the valuation should be based on a consideration of various elements, including original cost, cost of reproduction, working capital, etc., said that in determining reproduction cost as a factor in valuation for rate-making purposes, commissions had uniformly used normal pre-war prices in estimating the cost of labor and material; that money actually spent and materials purchased at war-time prices had been allowed, as was done in the present case; but that a valuation based upon war-time or abnormal prices had been considered as grossly unjust, and had not been followed.

It was held in Elizabethtown Gas-light Co. v. Public Utility Comrs. (1920) 95 N. J. L. 18, P.U.R.1920F, 1001, 111 Atl. 729, that, in determining the value of the property of a gas company for rate-making purposes, the commission had erroneously adopted as the standard of value the average prices prevailing for five years preceding January 1, 1916, and did not allow for the increased prices in 1919. See quotation from this decision in the reported case (PETERSBURG GAS CO. v. PETERSBURG, ante, 542).

In the recent case of People ex rel. Adirondack Power & L. Corp. v. Public Service Commission (1922) 200 App. Div. 268, 193 N. Y. Supp. 186, it was held that the utility commission could not be charged with acting arbitrarily, in entire disregard of reproduction cost new, less depreciation, in determining a fair value for rate-making purposes, although it had not, in the particular case, adopted this basis as the controlling element in fixing a temporary price for gas. It was said: "The legislature did not contemplate that there should be constant fluctuations in rates, based upon the constant fluctuations in costs. It did not contemplate that during a period of high prices the company should struggle for increased rates, and during the succeeding period of low prices the public should, in turn, struggle for low rates. The statute intends an average rate. Except where there has been an actual, considerable, and more than temporary, increase in values and in costs, the actual investment shown upon the books of the corporation, fully, fairly, and honestly kept, is a more certain and more true guide to that 'reasonable return upon the capital expended' which the statute contemplated, than is the fluctuating uncertainty which attends upon the attempt to apply the reproduction cost, less depreciation, as the sole or the controlling element in determining fair value. The years 1919 and 1920 were a period of abnormally high prices, as the result of war conditions—high prices not only of new construction, but also in the expense of operations in producing gas. We do not find in the record evidence, which the commission was bound to accept, showing that there had been an actual, considerable appreciation above the capital expended, in value of the plant of the relator."

In New York Interurban Water Co. v. Mt. Vernon (1920) 110 Misc. 281, P.U.R.1920D, 515, 180 N. Y. Supp. 304, the court, in determining the present fair value of waterworks property for rate-making purposes, said there were many elements to be taken into account; that the cost of reproduction, less accrued depreciation, could not alone control in fixing such present value, because reproduction costs at prevailing high prices would not be fair to the public, and the question of the permanency or duration of present high prices was so problematical that present cost of reproduction could not be taken as the principal or controlling element; but resort must be had to some fairer method of determining the present value of the property.

So, in a proceeding to determine the alleged confiscatory character of a statutory gas rate, the court in Municipal Gas. Co. v. Public Service Commission (1920) 113 Misc. 748, 186 N. Y. Supp. 541, although stating that the value of the property of a gas company is the value at the time when the inquiry is being made regarding the reasonableness of the rates fixed by statute, and that the corporation should be given the benefit of any increase in the value of the property since it was acquired, took into consideration various elements or factors in determining valuation, and, as it appears, rejected current reproduction costs as a proper standard. It was said: "In making these calculations, I have made no allowance for the enormous increase in cost for new construction, as I do not believe that that is the proper basis in arriving at the rate base in this action. This is not an exchange price. The plaintiff is not suing to be permitted to sell its property to the highest bidder. It has a monopoly of the gas business in the city of Albany, and the figures I have placed upon its property represent, in my view, the real value thereof, for the purposes for which it was constructed, at the time of this litigation, realizing, of course, that for all new construction the gas-operating capital will be increased by the amount of the expenses thereof, and for which the company should be allowed.

And it was held in Kings County Lighting Co. v. Lewis (1920) 110 Misc. 204, P.U.R.1920D, 145, 180 N. Y. Supp. 570, that a valuation of a utility for rate-making purposes based upon the abnormal war prices of 1917 was wholly untenable; and that leases executed during this period for war purposes were not a fair criteria of value of the utility's real estate.

It was held in People ex rel. Iroquois Natural Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1921) 194 App. Div. 578, P.U.R.1921B, 485, 186 N. Y. Supp. 177, that determination of values as of the time the property was acquired in 1912, without reference to possible appreciation in value at the present time, would be unjust to the utility, but that in determining the rate base various elements must be considered, as original cost, permanent improvements, depreciation, present economic conditions, and evidence as to present value.

In the reported case (PETERSBURG GAS CO. v. PETERSBURG, ante, 542), the decision of the state corporation commission fixing rates of a gas utility was reversed by the Virginia court, on the ground that, in determining the "fair value" of the company's property, it did not appear that the commission had given proper consideration to the present reproduction costs, and had apparently based its decision upon the pre-war unit valuation of the property. The decision does not hold necessarily that the pre-war valuation is not to be taken into consideration, but holds that the pre-war unit of prices should not be taken as practically the sole basis for ascertaining the reproduction value of the property for rate-making purposes. In other words, the present unit of prices furnishes a standard of value entering into the basis of valuation in fixing the rates.

c. Decisions of utility commissions.

As would naturally be expected in a matter governed not by fixed rules or formulas, but resting in the exercise of sound judgment and discretion in view of all the circumstances of the particular case, the commissions, while adhering in general to the principles, already stated, that the new higher level of prices during and since the war should be considered in determining valuation for rate-making purposes, but should not be the sole criterion or the necessarily determining element, have varied greatly in the methods used to determine what was just in the particular case. And the decisions are not all harmonious from a theoretical point of view, especially in sometimes apparently ignoring the recent advance in prices.

In Re Central Arizona Light & P. Co. (1921; Ariz.) P.U.R.1921D, 164, the commission adopted a valuation of gas and electric utilities made in 1914, with book additions to date. But the question of the effect of war prices is not discussed.

The Arkansas commission in Re Arkansas Light & P. Co. (1920; Ark.) P.U.R.1921A, 461, adopted as a reasonable basis in arriving at the value of the property, unit prices averaging over a five-year period previous to 1920.

And the commission in Re Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. (1920; Ark.) P.U.R.1921B, 516, held that it is not fair to the consumer to fix the rate on present-day cost unit prices; and that the spreading of unit costs over a five-year period, and obtaining the average, is more nearly just than the using of abnormal cost unit prices of the preceding year.

To a similar effect is Re Two States Teleph. Co. (1920; Ark.) P.U.R.1921B, 405, where it is said: "This commission has adopted the policy of finding the reproduction new, less depreciation value, by using the five-year average unit costs, and it is further of the opinion that value ascertained in this manner closer reflects that fair value that the utility is entitled to have a return upon, than any other method yet used."

The Arkansas commission in Re Rogers Light & Water Co. (1920; Ark.) P.U.R.1920E, 311, held that a proper method of valuation of a light and water company was to take the average cost of the various units entering into the plants over a period of ten years previous to 1920, it being said that the commission deemed this fairer and more equitable than to take the present prices of the units, which, under prevailing economic conditions, were conceded to be abnormally high.

The California commission in Re Southern California Edison Co. (1921; Cal.) P.U.R.1921D, 65, held that reproduction costs based upon price conditions existing during the years 1919 to 1921 was not a reasonable basis for rate-fixing purposes, except in so far as applied to those portions of the property as were, of necessity, constructed during this period of high prices.

It was held in Monahan v. Pacific Gas & E. Co. (1915; Cal.) P.U.R.1916B, 609, that, in determining reproduction cost as a factor in a rate valuation, it would be unfair and unreasonable to use present-day wages in fixing the cost of reproducing property that was built by cheap convict labor.

And it was held in Re Moore Park Water, Light & P. Co. (1918; Cal.) P.U.R.1919B, 679, that valuation of land of a water company, for the purpose of rate making, should not be based upon war prices, it being held that in this instance consumers should not be required to pay upon a larger valuation than the cost of the land.

So, the California commission, in Sherman v. California-Michigan Land & Water Co. (1918; Cal.) P.U.R.1918D, 93, said that the present condition has resulted in abnormally high prices, making the use of present prices in a reproduction-new method of valuation manifestly unfair to the consumer. And in this case the commission used prices averaged over a period of years, thus compensating for periods of abnormally high or low prices.

The California commission in Re Southern Sierras Power Co. (1920; Cal.) P.U.R.1921C, 218 (abstract), in approving the "reasonable historical cost" rather than the "present value" theory in determining a rate base, apparently considered the latter term as referring to value at the existing prices; and the commission rejected the contention that rates should be based upon estimated reproduction cost depreciated, or so-called "present value" of the properties.

That to use present-day prices in determining the cost of reproduction of the property as a factor in valuation for rate-making purposes would bring about an improper result, as would the use of prices during a period of financial depression, was held in Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1917; Colo.) P.U.R.1917B, 198. The commission said that in arriving at the value by the cost of reproducing method, as understood by the commission and its engineers, the term was not used in a strict sense, but was so modified as to bring before the commission the cost of reproducing the property under normal or average conditions, due regard being given to the conditions under which the property had been actually constructed, and the prices paid for labor and materials.

And the Colorado Commission in Re Denver Tramway Co. (1918; Colo.) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract), stated that its findings as to the value of property for purposes of rate-making would be based entirely upon the cost of reproducing the property under normal or average conditions; that whether or not the property of the company had actually enhanced in value on account of conditions brought about by the war would depend to a large extent upon the period of time that labor and material costs remained at their present level, and was a matter which could not be determined at that time.

It was held in Stamford v. Stamford Gas & E. Co. (1921; Conn.) P.U.R.1922A, 303, that current prices at the time of the valuation, in December, 1920, while evidence of value, were not of controlling influence, and should not be adopted as a basis of valuation. The commission held, also, that a basis obtained by taking the average between the cost of reproduction at current prices and the approximate weighted average of historical costs and prices, while more nearly correct than the former alone, was not conclusive as a rate basis.

And in Danbury v. Danbury & B. Gas & E. L. Co. (1921; Conn.) P.U.R.1921D, 193, the Connecticut commission refused to accept the figures submitted as the present fair value of the utility's property, where the valuation was made on peak unit prices, and included municipally paid-for improvements and maximum percentages on theoretical values, representing a valuation between 300 and 400 per cent more than the invested capital or the conceded original costs. It was said that while there were many court and commission decisions holding that a utility company was entitled to a fair return on the value of its property, based upon prevailing prices at the time of the inquiry, yet the inequality of considering reproduction new, less depreciation, under recent high and inflated war production prices, as the fair value, was being more and more recognized, and the principle modified in conformity with sound business judgment.

While recognizing the fact that war prices would be slow in receding, and that the pre-war level would not be reached for many years, if ever, the commission in Re Capital Traction Co. (1919; D. C.) P.U.R.1919F, 779, took the view that these higher prices should not control in ascertaining the fair value of the property of the public utility as a basis for rates, as applied to plants constructed at pre-war prices, it being said: "Can it be logical to hold that the users of the service of a public utility, at the very time when called upon to make great sacrifices because of a world-wide war, should also be required to pay higher rates merely to enable such a utility, without the corresponding expenditure of a single dollar by way of increase of its pre-war investment, to reap a profit from the high level of prices which the very conflict has brought about?" And in this case the commission held that in ascertaining the fair value as of July 1, 1914, the date agreed upon at the beginning of the valuation, and in allowing the utility the full benefit of all added costs actually incurred at higher prices since that day, full justice would be rendered.

And it was held in Re Potomac Electric Power Co. (1917; D. C.) P.U.R.1917D, 563, that an estimate of the cost of reproduction of utility property should be based on normal costs representative of average past conditions, rather than on prices which a competent contractor, asked to bid on construction, would use at a time of highly abnormal world-wide war conditions, in making his estimate of cost.

In Re Georgia R. & P. Co. (1921; Ga.) P.U.R.1921A, 165, the commission said it was satisfied that it would be unfair to the public to prescribe rates exclusively upon a basis of value determined by the cost of reproduction new at a time when such cost is abnormally inflated; but that consideration of reproduction cost, it was true, should be had, just as should the original cost of acquisition and construction; that the weight of authority is that every element having any bearing on the situation must be considered in the inquiry, and then sound business judgment applied in the determination of a valuation that is fair and just to the public and to the utility.

The amount expended in additions to telephone property during 1920 was added by the Georgia commission in Re Southern Bell Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921; Ga.) P.U.R.1921C, 833, in determining the physical value of the property. The commission does not, however, discuss the question of war prices.

The Idaho commission in Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921; Idaho) P.U.R.1921B, 739, in finding the physical factor as an element of valuation, considered the pre-war period of prices as fair and just for that portion of the plant installed prior to 1917.

As to replacements, betterments, and extensions of the plant during the years 1917 to 1919, a period of abnormally high prices, the Idaho commission in Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (Idaho) supra, stated that it believed it was fair and just to add to the value of the physical property as it existed on January 1, 1917, the actual capital additions to the system from that date to August 31, 1919, at the prices prevailing when such additions and betterments were made.

The Illinois commission in Lincoln v. Lincoln Water & Light Co. (1916; Ill.) P.U.R.1917B, 1, held that in a rate valuation failure to take as a criterion the appreciated value of the property is not necessarily confiscation, reproduction cost new, or less depreciation, being only one of the elements to be considered in fixing value for rate-making purposes.

And in Re Union Gas & E. Co. (1918; Ill.) P.U.R.1918C, 248 (abstract), it was said: "At this time it is not conceived, or conceded, to be the duty of the commission to calculate a fair return to the company on theoretical values of properties which are invariably inflated on account of war conditions, where appraised according to almost any of the theories of the cost to reproduce them new, less accruing depreciation."

In determining the value of real estate for rate-making purposes, the Illinois commission in Re Tri-City R. Co. (1919; Ill.) P.U.R.1919E, 836, held that it would give consideration not only to original costs, but to the present value of the land, and the value of adjacent lands of like character. Appreciation by reason of war prices is not, however, referred to.

The Illinois commission in Re

Southern Illinois Light & P. Co. (1919; Ill.) P.U.R.1919D, 489, said that it could not subscribe to a valuation based upon war-time prices in a case where substantially no investment had been made under war-time conditions; that to do so would result in burdening a public, already carrying a heavy load of war-time prices, with increased costs of service received from plant and equipment which had experienced no added usefulness because of the war-time situation.

Re Public Service Co. (1920; Ill.) P.U.R.1921B, 438, is also to the effect that it would be unfair to the consumer to fix a rate at a figure which would produce a reasonable income on a value determined by the cost of reproduction new at a time when the cost of construction was abnormally inflated, where the plant under consideration was constructed many years before the war, when the cost of labor and material was much lower.

And it was held in Re Springfield Gas & E. Co. (1919; Ill.) P.U.R.1920A, 446, that the average unit prices during a series of years prior to 1917 should be taken, to compute the cost of reproduction new of the utility, rather than the subsequent abnormally high war prices.

So, in Re Springfield Consol. R. Co. (1920; Ill.) P.U.R.1920E, 474, the Illinois commission, in considering the valuation of street railway property for rate-making purposes, said that the main question was to determine the extent to which the pre-war values of plants and equipment constructed before the war are to be modified by giving effect to the scale of values resulting from the war. The commission said it was clear that some effect must be given to the latter element, but that it was equally clear that a rate base for future rates, to have any degree of durability, could not be obtained by using valuations based solely upon abnormal war prices; that it was manifestly to the interest of both the public and the utility that the rate base should not fluctuate violently; and that the commission must apply business judgment, and endeavor to reach a conclusion in the light of past experience as to the extent to which the upheaval in prices resulting from the war will persist, and will operate in producing a permanent advance in the scale of values. To the same effect is Re Illinois Northern Utilities Co. (1920; Ill.) P.U.R.1920E, 908.

Viewing the present situation in the light of the history of the period following the Napoleonic Wars and the Civil War, the Illinois commission in Re Springfield Consol. R. Co. and Re Illinois Northern Utilities Co. (Ill.) supra, in determining the probable permanence of increased prices which should be considered for valuation purposes, said that it had no reasonable doubt that the great loss of life and property in the late war would have an effect upon prices for many years to come, and that a substantial part of the shock would persist probably, with diminishing effect, for a decade or more.

The commission in Re Metropolitan West Side Elev. R. Co. (1921; Ill.) P.U.R.1921B, 229, held that it could not adopt as a rate base a valuation determined by applying to the physical property, other than land, the average of the unit prices in the ten-year period ending June 30, 1916, since there were various elements to be considered in determining the valuation, as the original cost of the property and the present value, including depreciated reproduction cost and going value.

The Indiana Commission in East Chicago v. East Chicago & I. H. Water Co. (1921; Ind.) P.U.R.1922A, 193, took the view that a utility is not entitled to earn necessarily in the future on a cost of reproduction as of the time of the inquiry, when that cost at such time is abnormally high or abnormally low; that the value of the property should be fixed on the basis of the level of prices which would probably prevail for three or four years in the future. And it was held that a valuation based on the level or average of prices and wages prevailing during the five-year period which ended December 31, 1919, could not be approved on the theory that such level fairly reflected the wages and prices which would probably prevail for a period of several years in the future, but that there should be a reduction from such prices of 12 per cent in making the valuation. The commission said it was not inclined to agree that the average level of wages and prices made for the next five years would be as high as the average level for the five years ending December, 1919.

Certain necessary additions, however, made during the war period, it was held in East Chicago v. East Chicago & I. H. Water Co. (Ind.) supra, should be valued at cost price, without deduction for probably reduced future prices.

And the commission in Re Kokomo Gas & Fuel Co. (1921; Ind.) P.U.R.1921E, 390, said that it did not believe the law authorized a valuation for rate-making purposes based upon the abnormal and extravagant prices of 1920; and that an excessive claim of value of that kind was of little or no assistance to the commission.

Present-day extreme prices, it was said in Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1920F, 586, should not be given undue weight as applied to property installed and constructed before such prices became prevalent.

The Indiana commission in Re Central U. Teleph. Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1920B, 813, reached the following conclusion: "This commission is of the opinion that, until sufficient time has elapsed to demonstrate conclusively that a new and fairly permanent higher price level has been reached, normal cost of reproduction should be determined by costs prevailing immediately before the outbreak of the European War, with a consideration, perhaps, of what may reasonably be calculated to be a natural trend of prices had the war and other abnormal conditions not occurred." The commission said, also, that, generally speaking, it would appear that in determining the fair value of the utility property, the weight to be given to cost of reproduction should depend in large measure upon whether it is calculated upon what ought to be considered normal prices and usual or ordinary conditions; and that the weight given to the cost of reproduction new should vary with the degree of departure of cost of reproduction from normal costs,—the greater the departure, the less weight.

In Re United Public Service Co. (1918; Ind.) P.U.R.1918F, 316, the Indiana commission used a five-year average of prices, instead of the unit prices submitted by the utility for a shorter period, which, the commission said, unduly reflected the present abnormal cost of materials and equipment.

A cost of reproduction less depreciation of a utility plant, of $180,434, based upon average unit prices unduly reflecting abnormally high war costs, was reduced by the Indiana commission in Re Home Teleph. Co. (1919; Ind.) P.U.R.1919C, 209, to $160,000, in a tentative valuation for emergency rate making, where the plant had been constructed at a prior period of lower investment costs and values.

It was held in Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1921A, 824, that, in determining the value of utility property for rate-making purposes, the commission would not accept the theoretical cost of reproducing the property under prevailing excessive prices as the principal factor; that it would not be disregarded, but its weight would not be decisive. It was said: "Considering the present chaos and uncertainty of prices, the commission believes that the apparent tendency of the courts to accept the present cost of reproduction as the controlling or important factor tends to subject the great agencies of public service to hazardous speculation, extreme financial uncertainty, and obvious inequities—inequities which bid fair to react in a manner fully as hurtful to the utilities themselves as to the public."

It does not logically follow that, because the value of a public utility for rate-making purposes must be ascertained at the time of the inquiry, such value is determined by the cost of reproduction of the prices prevailing at that time, although it does follow that a present inventory must be used. Ibid.

And the Indiana commission in Re Laporte Gas & E. Co. (Ind.) supra, said that the surest and most equitable method of insuring stability of values is to consider prudent investment as the primary factor of value; that, facing, as the country does, a period of economic uncertainty, there is dire need for stabilization of utility values; and that the investment principle insures the utility against the evil effects of recurrent fits of economic fortune, which under any other theory of valuation must, in varying degrees, be suffered by public service companies.

And in Re Mt. Vernon Waterworks Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1921C, 219 (abstract), the Indiana commission stated that it could not adopt a policy which would permit values based upon the present high peak cost of production; that the evidence showed that most of the construction was in years of low cost, and it would be unfair to patrons, and ultimately detrimental to the utility, to accept a "reproduction to-day" theory. It was further said: "Not only would rates be set skyrocketing, but, with falling prices of materials and supplies, the assault by patrons would bring distress to the utility. Such a course ultimately must produce a chaotic condition for utilities, many of which, should regulatory bodies permit such practice, would be loaded down with obligations issued on the basis of inflated valuations which none expect to be maintained. Such a course, also, would make valuations of utilities as valuable as prices of pipe, meters, pumps, and other materials." Public utility regulation does not contemplate such instability. Neither utilities nor patrons could survive the complications and bad relations that would attend the adoption of reproduction as of to-day."

In Ft. Wayne v. Home Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1920; Ind.) P.U.R.1920D, 83, the commission said that the application of an average of construction costs for the ten-year period ending January 1, 1919, resulted in the attachment of enhanced values by reason of the inclusion in the average of the exceedingly high war prices of 1917 and 1918; and, bearing in mind the fact that only about 10 to 15 per cent of the plant was constructed in those years, the commission was of the opinion that the application of the average prices for the ten-year period indicated would result in values at least 10 to 20 per cent higher than the actual cost of the property.

The Indiana commission in Re Indianapolis Water Co. (1917; Ind.) P.U.R.1917E, 556, held that the unit cost per ton of cast-iron water mains should be determined by taking an average of prices per ton for a period of ten years.

The Maine commission in Re York County Water Co. (1920; Me.) P.U.R. 1921A, 439, took the view that the amount of money actually invested in an honest and prudent manner by the utility in its property was entitled to much consideration in determining its fair value for rate-making purposes, and that such investment affords, in nearly all instances, a better basis for the ascertainment of fair value than an attempt to apply the reproduction less depreciation theory, in view of the present era of high costs. In this instance, however, the commission adhered to the reproduction less depreciation theory, in view of the fact that the valuation resulting from taking average unit prices, during the five-year period selected, yielded a result almost exactly the same as the result obtained by applying the investment theory.

To the same effect is Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1920; Me.) P.U.R.1921A, 561, where the commission said: "For some years commissions and courts have been pretty generally committed to the reproduction less depreciation method of arriving at fair value. This method is now very generally understood and, as practised, involves the assumption that a particular public utility plant is wiped out of existence, and that it has to be reproduced exactly as it has existed, and in the exact condition in which the several units constituting the plant had existed. In order to determine the cost of reproduction new engineers at first applied the prices prevailing in the particular year when the valuation was to be made. This was found to be inaccurate, and engineers then sought and obtained as a unit price the cost of reproduction new averaged over a period of five years immediately preceding the valuation. This method was fairly accurate until the very high costs of the last four or five years. It was then recognized that to base reproduction cost upon an average for the five years immediately preceding 1920 would result in a ridiculously high figure, and engineers sought to somewhat equalize this error by going back to 1911 and 1912, and coming forward five years from that time. This was thought to embrace some period of low cost as well as some period of high cost, and would constitute as nearly an average figure as possible. This method of valuation has never been entirely satisfactory, and is becoming more and more unsatisfactory as we progress through this period of exceedingly high prices."

And in Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (Me.) supra, the valuation fixed by the commission in 1916, with allowances for capital additions after that time and increased value of the company's property in present use, was included in determining the present fair value. The commission said that there must be something added to the 1916 valuation which would represent the difference in the value of the property in use in 1916, and the property in use in 1920, although it realized that this amount was not possible of exact ascertainment, and that a variety of circumstances must be considered, and, finally, judgment and discretion used. And the commission in this case declined to adopt, as a method of determining present fair value, the reproduction cost at prices prevailing October 1, 1921, or the average of prices for five years ending on that date, with allowance for depreciation.

And the Maine commission in Re Lewiston Gaslight Co. (1918; Me.) P.U.R.1919B, 423 (abstract), said, in reply to the suggestion that the plant was entitled to a very much greater valuation because of increased cost of materials and labor, that it would not adopt present unit prices; that no one would undertake to build a plant under present conditions, and no one would purchase a completed plant on the basis of what it would cost to construct it to-day, although present conditions and reasonable predictions as to the future might justify some consideration.

And in Re Guilford Water Co. (1918; Me.) P.U.R.1918C, 916, the Maine commission said that the reproduction less depreciation was one of the ways by which the commission sought to inform itself as to the probable present fair value of the property; that if the amount so ascertained was manifestly greater than a fair value, it must be reduced to a proper amount; that the ultimate question was one addressed to the sound judgment of the tribunal charged with the duty of fixing fair value, and no hard and fast rules could be laid down; but that in the present case it could not lose sight of the fact that the high prices prevailing during 1916 and 1917 very materially inflated the average of a five-year period including those two years. And, taking into account the probable original cost of the property and the probable cost of reproducing the plant under existing abnormally high prices, the commission fixed a valuation considerably below that based on reproduction costs less depreciation determined by average prices during the preceding five years.

The Maryland commission in Westminster v. Consolidated Public Utilities Co. (1919; Md.) P.U.R.1919E, 506, used the normal pre-war prices obtaining over an average of five years for construction preceding 1916, with increase of 20 per cent in determining the cost of construction during that year, and 70 per cent in appraising the work done in 1918. It was said that the practice of using normal prices in an appraisal of property such as the one in question had ample support in precedence and in justice; that it was true that the construction at the present time could be accomplished only at the abnormal prices now obtaining, but that the major portion of the plants under consideration was built under normal conditions, and at normal prices; and that if a valuation were made at a time when, due to a panic or other financial disaster, prices had fallen to a point far below normal, and lower than the existing value of the particular materials or services, no one could seriously contend that the valuation should be predicated upon the depressed prices then prevailing.

And the Maryland commission in Salisbury v. Salisbury Light, Heat & P. Co. (1918; Md.) P.U.R.1918E, 331, in determining reproduction costs new, less depreciation as of January 1, 1917, used unit costs based on a fair average of costs obtaining for four or five years prior to that date, and not of the relatively high costs obtaining at that time.

The commission in Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (1920; Md.) P.U.R.1920F, 417, in computing reproduction cost new of a telephone company, used in its calculations, not the existing high prices, but the value as of June 30, 1914, with additions at their actual cost.

And the suggestion that, in view of the present abnormal prices, some other basis or rule than the reproduction cost method should be adopted in determining valuation for rate-making purposes, is found in Re United R. & E. Co. (1919; Md.) P.U.R.1920A, 1, in which the Maryland commission said that, if rates are to be based upon value, they must be based upon "fair present value," but that conditions are so far from normal that it would be unwise, for the present, to revert to the former method of fixing rates solely upon the basis of valuation; that rates for service of public utilities, being ordinarily fixed in the hope that they will continue in force without change for long periods of time, and present costs being abnormal, the commission should, in the interim of unrest and uncertainty, find some more satisfactory basis of fixing rates than either war emergencies or valuations.

The Michigan commission in Re Lansing Fuel & Gas Co. (1921; Mich.) P.U.R.1921D, 387, said that, while a utility was entitled to a fair return upon a fair value of the property devoted to public use, yet the commission was not ready to follow the few who contended that the utility was at all times entitled to a fair return upon a valuation representing the cost of reproduction new, less depreciation; and that a rate base should not be built upon reproduction costs during abnormal times, or upon the lowest possible amount of money which may have been expended on the property, but rather upon a fair and honest reflection based upon the cost of labor, materials, and other items entering into the physical property of the utility at a time which best reflected a conservative and normal cost.

In Holland v. McGuire (1919; Mich.) P.U.R.1920B, 149, where a gas company claimed that a 20 per cent increase should be allowed in the cost of reproduction because of the rise in commodity and labor prices since 1915, the commission, admitting that the great rise in commodity and labor costs caused by the late war were not materially receding, would be slow to recede, and doubtless would never fall to the pre-war level, but that a new normal of price level on a higher plane would exist, nevertheless expressed the opinion that it was not logical that consumers of a public utility should be required to pay higher rates merely to enable the utility, without the corresponding expenditure of a single dollar toward an increase in capital investments, to profit from a high level of prices. The commission, however, appears in this case, in reaching a conclusion as to the fair valuation of the property, to have given consideration to reproduction costs depreciated, with various other items, such as original costs, going value, and working capital.

And in Re Sault Ste. Marie (1921; Mich.) P.U.R.1922B, 149, where objection was raised by a municipality that the commission, in fixing the value of gas and electric property for rate-making purposes, was guided largely by reproduction costs during 1920, when the prices of materials and labor were at their highest peak, the commission said that, if this were true, there would be merit in the objection; but that the fact was that the commission considered the cost of reproducing the property in 1920, as the law required it to do, but that such cost of reproduction was not a guiding or controlling factor in fixing the value; that the courts had uniformly held that the commission must consider reproduction costs, original costs, and all other evidence of value, in arriving at a fair value of the property for rate-making purposes.

In Re Cole (1921; Mich.) P.U.R.1921C, 385, the commission held that the property of a telephone utility should be valued on the basis, as near as possible, of original costs, with consideration, also, of the present cost of reproduction, less depreciation.

In Re Lansing Fuel & Gas Co. (1921; Mich.) P.U.R.1921C, 465, the Michigan commission, in fixing the value of the physical property of a gas company, took into consideration various factors, including book values, original costs, reproduction costs based on past prices, prices current at the time of the 1920 reproduction cost new appraisal, the present trend of prices, and the existing condition of the property.

In Muskegon Traction & Lighting Co. v. Grand Rapids, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1921; Mich.) P.U.R.1921E, 548, the Michigan commission adopted a valuation somewhat below the average between the original cost and the prevailing cost of reproduction new of the property. But the commission does not discuss the question of war prices.

We believe, said the Missouri commission in Re Kansas City Electric Light Co. (1917; Mo.) P.U.R.1917C, 728, that some consideration should be given to the recent increases in prices in arriving at value from consideration of the estimate of the cost of reproduction, though not to the extent of using abnormal recent prices.

And the Missouri commission in Springfield City Water Co. v. Springfield (1919; Mo.) P.U.R.1919D, 853, held that an appraisal based upon unit prices obtained by taking an average of prices for ten years preceding the period of present high war costs, and approximating the level of prices prevailing when the utility in question was actually constructed, was a better guide to a fair value for rate-making purposes than an appraisal at average unit prices for the three-year period from 1915 to 1917, which reflected the abnormal prices brought about by the World War. The commission called attention to the statute in that state, providing that in determining the price to be charged the commission might consider all relevant facts, with due regard "to a reasonable average return upon capital actually expended," and said that it was certain that the method approved tended more accurately to show the capital actually expended in constructing the plant in question.

In Re Joplin & P. R. Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1919B, 366, the commission said that, rate making being an attempt to make an equitable adjustment between producer and consumer, it certainly was not equitable to adopt an appraisal for rate-making purposes built on unit prices 100 to 250 per cent in excess of the costs actually incurred; and that commissions in general had adopted the average of normal prices, rather than current prices, in appraising property for rate-making purposes. The contention was accordingly overruled that war prices as of May, 1917, were a proper basis for an appraisal, it being said that if average normal unit prices prior to the war were adopted, and such excessive war-time costs as were actually incurred were used in making an appraisal, the commission could see no good ground for complaint by the company.

20 A.L.R.—37.

In Re Missouri Gas & E. Co. (1919; Mo.) P.U.R.1919E, 210 (abstract), the Missouri commission said that it had never appraised utility property on war unit prices, except for additions actually made at such prices.

And in Re St. Joseph Water Co. (1919; Mo.) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract), it is said that rate making should be an attempt to make an equitable adjustment between producer and consumer; that there is no foundation in equity or law for using abnormally high current prices, or using the same to the extent of creating abnormally high average prices in fixing the value for rate-making purposes; that present high costs should be considered in fixing the plant value only to the extent that they were actually incurred. And in this case, where the company's appraisal was based upon five-year average prices, beginning with 1914, the commission called attention to the fact that, during at least 50 per cent of this five-year period, there were used as a basis for computing average prices abnormally high prices due to the war; and that an examination of this appraisal showed that the average prices used were unreasonably excessive.

Also, in Re Lead Bell Teleph. Co. (1919; Mo.) P.U.R.1919E, 211 (abstract), the Missouri commission said that the increase in prices, due to the war, of materials similar to those purchased and placed in its plants by the company under normal price conditions, did not entitle the company to add such percentage of higher prices to its investment costs, or to earn a return thereon by increasing its rates solely for that purpose; that theoretical reproduction costs under war prices are not a proper standard for a valuation for rate making.

The Missouri commission in Re Missouri & K. Teleph. Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1919B, 423 (abstract), in determining the cost new of a utility plant, took what it regarded as "the trend average" as the price of copper, and for other materials used an average of three to five year prices.

In Re Southwestern Bell Teleph. Co. (1918; Mo.) P.U.R.1919B, 422 (abstract), where, on an application for an increase in telephone rates, the company based its appraisal upon present war costs, the commission found that these costs were 25 per cent higher than pre-war prices, and reduced the company's figures of reproduction costs less depreciation, by that per cent.

And the Missouri commission in Re Memphis Teleph. Co. (1921; Mo.) P.U.R.1921E, 145 (abstract), refused to accept unit values taken at the peak of high prices incident to the World War economic conditions, as a basis for valuation by the reproduction cost method.

The commission in Re St. Joseph R. Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919; Mo.) P.U.R.1920A, 542, reaffirmed its position that the public should only be required to contribute an investment return upon the value of the utility based upon an average unit price covering normal periods of from one to ten years preceding the abnormal economic conditions covered by the war, subsequent construction being valued at unit prices prevailing at date of construction. The increased value due to the war was regarded as unearned increment upon which consumers should not be required to pay a return.

In Re Kansas City Gas Co. (1920; Mo.) P.U.R.1920C, 41, it is said that the allowance of abnormally high prices in the valuation should be limited to the amount actually expended during the period of such high prices.

The Nebraska commission in Re Omaha & C. B. Street R. Co. (1918; Neb.) P.U.R.1919A, 845, rejected a valuation based entirely on existing war prices, stating that it could not use this as a proper basis of valuation, it being conceded that prices were extraordinarily high. The commission, it was said, was committed to the doctrine that unit prices could not be fixed by taking prices at the time of the investigation, and being governed solely by them.

And the commission in Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (1921; Neb.) P.U.R.1921C, 678, said that "if rates were fixed to-day on a valuation arrived at by the use of reproduction as of the present time, and at present abnormal prices, those rates would soon be unreasonable and require further attention; and that, with so many industries involved, the regulating body could not handle matters on such a basis, nor was it to the best interest of the utility, or of the public, to have rapidly fluctuating scales of rates. The commission said further that in so far as it recognized the measure of physical property as an important element in arriving at fair value, it would consider that trend prices more nearly represented sound judgment in arriving at fair value; that conclusions arrived at in this manner reflected the highest measure of ultimate advantage to the utility, and at the same time approximated equity to the public.

And it was held in Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (Neb.) supra, that the commission should add 12½ per cent to all items, except land, which were in existence before the outbreak of the World War, and that, in order that in matters of doubt a solution might be in the interests of the higher levels, it would include in that computation all construction completed before 1918; that land should be included at actual value as measured by the present value of surrounding lands. In reaching this percentage, the commission took into view the fact that commodity prices of 1900 to 1915 advanced less than one point per year as an average; that if the upward trend were projected through the war period, without the intervening factor of the war, it was reasonable to expect that the price trend would not have exceeded 5 per cent above pre-war construction costs; but that past experience indicated that the price level during the next decade would hardly reach the same plane as if projected pre-war prices were extended.

But the commission in Re Southern Nebraska Power Co. (Neb.) supra, allowed the actual cost of property.

built during the period from 1918 to 1920, inclusive.

In computing the valuation of a telephone company, the commission in Re Stanton Independent Teleph. Co. (1921; Neb.) P.U.R.1921D, 240, took the price level which would presumably have existed in July, 1920, had the abnormal situation brought about by the World War not occurred, by taking the average commodity price line from 1900 to 1914, and projecting it on the same proximate plane, thereby cutting off the high peak of the war-time prices.

In Re Central Teleph. Co. (1920; Neb.) P.U.R.1921B, 461, the Nebraska commission held that the relevant facts which it was its duty to take into consideration in determining a fair value of telephone property for earning purposes obviously included, not only the original construction cost and present condition of the property, but a reasonable consideration of advanced levels of property values. And in this case the commission added to the actual value, based on original cost less depreciation, an amount approximately one third of the increased present construction costs.

Although the valuation was being determined for security issue purposes, attention is called, also, to Re Monroe Independent Teleph. Co. (1917; Neb.) P.U.R.1917E, 471, in which the Nebraska commission held that the prices of labor and materials covering a period of years should be used as a basis for valuation, rather than the prevailing high prices, where the properties were bought during the period of normal prices, and the prices were very low during a portion of their history.

The value of public utilities, upon which rates are based, cannot be regarded as in a state of constant fluctuation, keeping pace with speculative changes in the price of materials. Re Grafton County Electric Light & P. Co. (1916; N. H.) P.U.R.1916E, 879. And in this case it was held that, in ascertaining the unit price for materials in a valuation proceeding, the average price for a reasonable period and not the prevailing price, should be used.

And the New Hampshire commission in Re Twin State Gas & E. Co. (1917; N. H.) P.U.R.1917F, 435, held that it would not approve the sale price of public utilities property on a valuation based on current unit prices, which are abnormally high, but would make its appraisal on prices covering a period of years.

In Re Concord Gaslight Co. (1921; N. H.) P.U.R.1921C, 169, the commission said that, in fixing the value of utility property, current prices or the appreciated value must be considered; that how much weight should be attached to present-day prices is a question that cannot be determined by any hard and fast rule; that certainly sufficient consideration must be given them to indicate that they have not been ignored, but, on the other hand, it would manifestly be unjust to make them the test of fair value; that a value found in this way would be obviously unfair, unless the property was actually constructed during the prevalence of present prices; and that, while present-day prices must be considered as evidence in fixing the value, it is also proper to consider the cost of reproduction new on pre-war prices, as well as the original costs.

And the New Hampshire commission in Re Franklin Light & P. Co. (1921; N. H.) P.U.R.1922A, 506, said that, taking the pre-war cost as a basis, proper allowance must be made for the enhancement of values at present and in the near future. But it was said, also, that it would seem unreasonable to mark up or down the valuation of all electric and other plants to correspond to the fluctuation in the cost of materials and labor, especially in such abnormal times as the present, although a permanent change in values might fairly be considered.

It is only fair, said the commission in Re Franklin Light & P. Co. (N. H.) supra, where additions and extensions have been made to meet urgent public needs, to allow the actual cost as a capital investment, even though the expenditures were made at a time when labor and materials were abnormally high.

A case from which the commissions and courts frequently quote, because of the high authority of the writer of the opinion, former Supreme Court Justice Charles E. Hughes, who was referee, is Brooklyn Borough Gas Co. v. Public Service Commission (1918) 17 N. Y. Off. Dept. R. 81, P.U.R.1918F, 335, in which, in determining the valuation of the property of a gas company for rate-making purposes, the position was taken that actual cost of reproduction at the present time, or within a year or so, could not be taken, because it would be an abnormal cost, and that the appraisal made by the public service commission in 1918, based on reproduction costs before the outbreak of the European War, with proper consideration of actual investments since that time, afforded a fairer basis than a valuation based upon average unit costs over a period of five years ending December 31, 1916. The statement of former Justice Hughes, which is set out below, has been referred to as authority in many decisions. It was said: "While it is important to consider the cost of reproduction in determining the fair value of a plant for rate-making purposes, it cannot be said that there is a constitutional right to have the rates of a public service corporation based upon the estimated cost of the reproduction of its property at a particular time, regardless of circumstances. To base rates upon a plant valuation simply representing a hypothetical cost of reproduction at a time of abnormally high prices, due to exceptional conditions, would be manifestly unfair to the public; and likewise, to base rates upon an estimated cost of reproduction far lower than the actual bona fide and prudent investment, because of abnormally low prices, would be unfair to the company. This question of taking the hypothetical reproduction cost under abnormal conditions as a rate base should, of course, not be confused with the necessity of recognizing actual costs of operation, even though abnormal. A public service corporation is entitled to be reasonably compensated for its service, and the actual cost of its operations must always be taken into consideration in determining whether or not it receives a fair compensation above that cost. But it is a different thing, after cost has been defrayed, and the question is as to the compensation to be allowed in excess of cost, to take as the basis for a compensatory return an asserted plant value, far above the actual investment, which is reached merely by expert estimates of a cost of reproduction under abnormal conditions. This would result in allowing a public service corporation to take advantage of a public calamity by increasing its rates above what would be a liberal return, not only on actual investment, but upon a normal reproduction cost, in the view that unless it could make an essentially exorbitant demand upon the public it would be deprived of its property without due process of law. The enforcement of the constitutional guaranty does not require the application of any artificial formula. It has constantly been pointed out that the rate base must be what is called 'the fair value of the property,' and that, as to this, there must be a reasonable judgment based on a proper consideration of all relevant facts."

In Maires v. Flatbush Gas Co. (1918; N. Y.) P.U.R.1920E, 931, the New York commission said that to fix a valuation based on the cost of reproduction at present-day prices would lead to startling consequences; that without a dollar of additional investment, in the face of adversity and suffering, the value of the utility's property would be deemed to have vastly increased, and the amount taken from consumers greatly increased merely because the World War had demoralized market conditions; and that upon the restoration of normal conditions investments made at war-time market prices would shrink in value; that the present and prospective situations of property values emphasized the unreliability, unfairness, and fiscal dangers of computing return on estimates of reproduction costs, less depreciation; that a standard so oscillating and fluctuating could not offer any permanency or security, either to the patronizing public or to the investors, and was unjust.

The New York commission in Re Sea Cliff & G. C. Gas Co. (1920; N. Y.) P.U.R.1921A, 211, in considering the valuation of a gas plant for rate-making purposes, denied an allowance of 25 per cent claimed on account of present higher construction costs, stating that the return which the company was entitled to was upon the capital actually expended, under the statute providing that "in determining the price to be charged for gas or electricity the commission may consider all facts which, in its judgment, have any bearing upon a proper determination of the question . . . with due regard, among other things, to a reasonable average return upon capital actually expended." The commission said that, even if not prohibited by statute, it would hardly be just to charge the ratepayer for an increase in the cost of construction which would come under the present high prices, but which was not incurred by the company in question.

And the New York commission in Whitehead v. Niagara Falls Gas & E. L. Co. (1920; N. Y.) P.U.R.1920C, 264, took the view that claims for increased investment, within the meaning of the New York statute, based on advanced costs of present-day reconstruction, had not been sustained. It was said that if the utility were able to show that it could, if so desired, secure for its property the alleged increased value, either by selling it as a going concern, or by disorganizing the plant and selling it piece-meal, then it might be claimed with some force that by leaving the property in the public service a sacrifice of the realizable values was being made which should be the just measure of present value for rate-making purposes; but that, when such was not the case, it was difficult to see where the claimed enhancement in value had any existence in fact.

In Re Long Island Lighting Co.

(1921; N. Y.) P.U.R.1922B, 2, the commission said that, in determining the fair value of property for rate-making purposes, it was its duty to consider carefully reproduction costs new, less depreciation; but that the cost of reproducing the entire physical property new, at war figures, was not necessarily a controlling element in the present valuation of the property, unless it was made to appear that such a property would be planned and constructed at the present time, under present conditions, and at present prices, by reasonably prudent investors; that otherwise the valuation was wholly theoretical and supposititious, changing as prices changed, from day to day and from month to month. The commission, in fixing valuations, considered book costs, securities outstanding, previous valuations by the commission on which securities had been allowed and issued, the additions to such valuations from year to year, and the cost of reproducing the property in 1921, as compared with pre-war costs of 1914. The valuations, the commission said, were made not as of pre-war costs, but as of an intermediate period between 1914 and 1920, and contained a recognition to a very considerable extent of the increase in costs which had resulted during the war period.

However, it was said in Re Long Island Lighting Co. (N. Y.) supra, that the high prices for material and labor must be allowed for current construction of additions in the physical property, made since the war conditions began to prevail.

It would be grossly unfair to the public to use the extraordinary dislocation in prices due to the World War as the groundwork for the fixation of a proper rate basis. Re New York State R. Co. (1921; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1922B, 75. It was said that the courts have repeatedly ruled that the estimated cost of reproduction is merely one method of reaching just decisions; that it cannot be used without reason; and that its use in a period when prices have been subject to such violent fluctuations as have characterized the past five years would leave little of fairness in the term "fair value," which means, essentially, the just amount on which a public utility is entitled to earn a return.

That reproduction cost new as a factor in valuation for rate-making purposes should not be based on prevailing abnormal, excessive prices, was held, also, in Davis v. Pennsylvania Gas Co. (1920; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1921B, 342, where there was evidence that the cost of reproduction was approximately $1,400,000, but the commission reduced this to $1,000,000, as ample to cover fully present value for rate-making purposes, as regards tangible property.

In Hoffman v. Elmira Water, Light & R. Co. (1921; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1921C, 409, the commission, while taking the view that the utility was entitled to a return upon the present value of its property, said that it was not claimed, nor could it be reasonably claimed, that the property was worth its present cost of reproduction new; that, although costs of building had arisen enormously in war time, the value of the utility property had not risen in proportion, the securities and stocks having actually depreciated. But, in view of the increase in value over original costs, it was held that a fair value to be taken as a rate base would be held to be, as contended for by the utility, its cost, without depreciation.

In Re New York State R. Co. (1921; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1921C, 496, the commission, in determining the rate base of street railway property, said that a marked distinction exists between the cost of reproduction new at the present time, and the present-day value; that the property in this instance was not worth by any means what it would cost to reproduce it new at the present time, even with a substantial depreciation. In this instance it was held that the tangible property of the company should be valued, for rate-making purposes, at its actual original cost, without deduction for depreciation.

That consideration should be given to the reproduction cost new, but that it is only one element to be considered in fixing the valuation, was held in Buck v. New York Teleph. Co. (1921; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1921E, 798. The commission said that, while the high prices of the present period may or may not continue, yet, until a general period of average costs can be checked by the figures of experience, all elements of valuation, actual individual cost, replacement value, and reproduction cost, less depreciation, must be considered, in order that, on the one hand, the utility may not, without a dollar of additional investment, but because of economic upheaval, claim vastly increased valuations upon which to base its return, and that, on the other hand, the valuations and returns may not be so restricted as to keep capital and enterprise out of the public utilities field, and so deprive consumers of service. In other words, the commission said, rates should be based upon the reasonable fair value of the property existing at the time of the hearing, and neither original costs nor reproduction costs new, considered separately, are determinative; but consideration must be given these with all the other facts and circumstances, in arriving at a fair present value; and each case must be considered on its own merits, controlled by its own circumstances, and such results as to value arrived at as may be just and right.

The New York commission in Re Westchester Electric R. Co. (1919; N. Y.) P.U.R. 1920B, 250, held that a valuation based on an assumed average of prices for the succeeding ten years, which were placed at about 40 per cent above pre-war prices, with a deduction for depreciation, could be given no recognition, and must be entirely rejected as a basis for rate making.

The North Dakota commission in Patterson v. Hughes Electric Co. (1920; N. D.) P.U.R. 1921A, 1, in determining the valuation of an electric utility, used as a basis the original cost, with a consideration of the attendant circumstances and conditions in the building up of the plant and property, rather than the company's valuation based on a scale of unit prices, including the peak period of prices during the war years since 1915.

And it was held in Re Public Service R. Co. (1921; N. J.) P.U.R.1921D, 593, that, in determining the "fair value" upon which the utility was entitled to a reasonable return, abnormal present-day prices should not be taken as the standard, or given the greater weight, these being regarded, however, as elements to be considered in fixing the value for rate-making purposes.

In Fargo v. Union Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919; N. D.) P.U.R.1920A, 764, the contention was overruled that the unit price fixed by the city's engineer in computing the valuation of a gas utility did not properly show a fair range of increase covering existing high prices, it being said that it appeared from the record that a five-year period with 1916 as the index had been used, and this, in the opinion of the commission, included a fair consideration of the existing high prices, and the increase claimed by the company should not be allowed.

The Ohio commission in Re Union Gas & E. Co. (1918; Ohio) P.U.R.1918E, 934, said: "It is a mistake to assume that, when the value of the investment has once been obtained, it should continually rise and fall, following the waves of fluctuation in the market prices of labor and material. Once fixed, it should remain constant, only as it is added to by capital charges, or reduced by withdrawals, in the future; for it is the value of the investment upon which the company should receive and the consumer should pay a return, whether in times of prosperity or in times of adversity. The value having been once determined, there is no more reason for changing it from time to time, following the rise and fall of the cost of labor and material, than there would be for changing the face value of a bond issued to construct a plant, or for changing the face value of a promissory note given in the ordinary course of business, causing their face value, as a basis for earning interest, to fluctuate with the fluctuations in the purchasing power of a dollar."

Unit prices were taken as of August 1, 1916, in fixing the permanent value of a public utility plant for rate-making purposes, in Re Alliance Gas & P. Co. (1918; Ohio) P.U.R.1919B, 423 (abstract), with allowance for additions since that date at actual cost.

In ascertaining the reproduction cost of the physical value of a public utility, the Oregon commission, in Re Portland R. Light & P. Co. (1916; Or.) P.U.R.1916D, 976, held that normal average prices should be used, rather than momentary prices which were abnormally high or low, and, with respect to additions made between 1912 and 1915, applied actual construction costs as deduced from vouchers, which were assumed to represent reproduction costs as well.

And in Re Douglas County Light & Water Co. (1920; Or.) P.U.R.1920E, 667, the Oregon commission held that the use of a valuation of the property of a light and water company, based upon present-day prices, for rate-making purposes, was not in conformity with the generally accepted theory of public utility operation and regulation. It was said: "Every public utility is delegated the duty and right of performing a particular public service. As compensation for the service performed, the utility is entitled to a reasonable return upon the amount of money prudently invested in the public service. The utility should thus be assured against the uncertainty that confronts a private concern, and speculative features should be almost entirely eliminated. The public reaps the benefit from this arrangement in the form of constant and continuous service at more stable and lower rates. Under the theory advanced by the applicant, when construction material and construction labor prices rise, the rate-base value must also increase correspondingly; when these prices decrease, the rate-base value must fall. The return to the utility thus becomes speculative, the compensation demanded by the investor increases correspondingly, and the utility is placed on the plane of a private speculative enterprise. While the figures presented by the applicant are of importance in this proceeding, and merit the consideration of the commission, yet they are but an element in the determination of a rate base."

The Pennsylvania commission in Fox v. Pine Grove Electric Light, Heat & P. Co. (1919; Pa.) P.U.R. 1920B, 380, said that a valuation based solely upon unit prices of 1918, without other supporting data, furnished a comparatively limited measure of value for rate-making purposes.

And in Tyrone v. Home Electric Light & Steam Heating Co. (1920; Pa.) P.U.R. 1920C, 562, it was said that the high unit prices now prevailing in the market of labor and materials warranted the conclusion that the fair value of a property, for rate-making purposes, would generally fall below a reproduction estimate based upon such prices, on a fair inventory and appraisal, where due regard is paid to all the interests and economies concerned.

And in determining the basis for interest during the construction period of a plant, 90 per cent of which was built prior to 1914, the commission in Frackville v. Mountain City Water Co. (1921; Pa.) P.U.R. 1921C, 820, held that it would be improper to take the cost of reproduction at current prices, since that would unduly inflate the amount which should be allowed. In determining the valuation, the commission held that unit prices during the ten-year period ending December 31, 1918, as applied to the inventory of property as of January 1, 1919, would be a more accurate and equitable measure of the reproduction cost of the property, and should be adopted in preference to the average unit prices for labor and material prevailing during the five-year period ending on that date.

In Verona v. Suburban Water Co. (1920; Pa.) P.U.R. 1920F, 942, the commission said that reproduction costs based upon a fair average price of materials, property, and labor was one of the elements which the Public Service Company Law set forth as an element to be given due consideration by the commission in reaching fair values; and that, if the intent and purpose of the act was to be carried out, such cost should be arrived at as therein provided, based upon the fair average price of materials, property, and labor; that by this was meant a price fair to the company as well as to patrons, and not an abnormally high price resulting from unusual conditions; neither did it contemplate the use of low prices depressed on account of stringency in financial affairs, or for other reasons; and that the commission was not prepared to state that the basis on which the reproduction cost of the property in this instance was arrived at, to wit, an average of five years ending April 1, 1917, during a part of which period there were reflected the advanced prices resulting from war conditions, was either unfair to the public or to the company.

The South Dakota commission in Re Salem Teleph. Co. (1919; S. D.) P.U.R. 1919B, 734, held that, in valuing telephone property for rate-making purposes, the adoption of the company's method of basing value upon current prices as applied to labor and materials, reflecting prices and abnormal conditions brought about by the war, which, at best, must be considered as temporary, would be unfair to consumers; and that a more equitable method was to adopt, as unit costs, the average costs as determined from a study of prices actually paid during a period of years.

The reproduction cost of the existing properties, upon the basis of the average prices of the five-year period ending December 31, 1919, less depreciation, as one of the elements considered by the Tennessee commission in Re Ramier (1921; Tenn.) P.U.R. 1921C, 121, in determining the rate-making value of the property, the historical cost, earnings, and operating expenses, outstanding stock and bonds, and other elements, also being considered.

The Utah commission in Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (1919; Utah) P.U.R.

1919D, 645, held that an appraisal based on average unit prices during the five-year period from 1913 to 1917, inclusive, unduly reflected the rise in prices on certain items caused by the World War, and that the normal reproduction cost of such items was less, due regard also being given to the condition under which the plant was actually constructed, and reduced the appraisal accordingly.

And the commission, in Re Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. (1921; Utah) P.U.R.1921E, 145 (abstract), in valuing a telephone utility, allowed a value somewhat higher than that of the pre-war level, but lower than that of the war level.

So, the commission in Re Telluride Power Co. (1921; Utah) P.U.R.1922B, 168, said that it was not inclined to accept as controlling a value based upon the maximum of war and post-war prices, applied to property that was constructed and placed in operation before radically increased prices became effective; but that this view was not intended to exclude consideration of such prices applied to property constructed during the war period.

And in Re Utah Power & Light Co. (1921; Utah) P.U.R.1922A, 436, the commission said that while it had considered reproduction cost new, based upon present prices, in finding the fair value of the utility, it could not accept such prices as controlling in finding such value. And in this case the court approved actual unit costs, where available and shown to be reasonable, and selected unit prices for the remainder of the inventory to reflect average prices as of the period preceding the World War.

That reproduction cost new based upon prices obtaining during a period of unusual inflation, does not reflect actual present worth for rate-making purposes, was held, also, in Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (1920; Utah) P.U.R.1920C, 854, where the contention was overruled that the valuation of the property of a gas company should be obtained by the application of current prices for labor and material during an assumed construction period of 1918-1919, to the units of physical property shown by the inventory; or, in other words, that the present value was the reproduction cost new, less depreciation of the property. It was said that the authority conferred by statute upon the commission to make a revaluation of the property of the utility did not contemplate a disturbing of valuations theretofore fixed every time a change occurred in unit prices, particularly during times when violent fluctuations take place.

It was said in Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (Utah) supra, that if the property was constructed during a period of unusual prices, whether above or below the normal, the actual or book costs would not necessarily govern.

In Re Utah Gas & Coke Co. (Utah) supra, the Utah commission accepted the average price level of the period of 1913-1917, as reflecting the increment of value justly accruing to the property by reason of the upward trend of prices to present levels.

And it was held in Re Utah Light & Traction Co. (1920; Utah) P.U.R.1920B, 262, that the normal cost new, in fixing the valuation of a utility for rate-making purposes, should be based on the cost of reproduction under conditions prevailing during and prior to April, 1917, and not on the cost new of reproducing the property at prices prevailing in 1918. It was said that whether or not the property of the company had permanently enhanced in value on account of conditions brought about by the World War, could only be determined after a lapse of time, and therefore could not be intelligently passed upon by the commission.

In Milne v. Montpelier & B. Light & P. Co. (1920; Vt.) P.U.R.1920E, 558, the Vermont commission held that, in determining valuation for rate-making purposes, reproduction new with unit costs as of the present time would not be an equitable method; neither would it be fair to consider reproduction new based upon prices current in the pre-war period. But it was held that, assuming that existing prices were approximately at the peak, and that future decline was likely to be in some degree comparable to the past rise in prices, a valuation based upon average prices for a period of ten years, including the war period, ought to produce as fair results as possible. The commission, therefore, determined the cost of reproducing new the property devoted to public use according to unit prices which should be an average of those prices for a period of ten years ending December 31, 1919, as one of the elements in arriving at the valuation of the property.

The commission in Milne v. Montpelier & B. Light & P. Co. (Vt.) supra, took the view that, in determining present value for rate-making purposes, there should be taken into consideration the fact that the price fixed was not strictly for present-day application, but for the future, and that it would not be just to fix rates upon present-day values which were either abnormally high or low; because, if rates were based on inflated values, the public in the future, as long as such rates remained in force, would pay a return on such values, whereas, if based upon unusually depressed values, the corporation would not be likely in the future to receive a just return upon the fair value of its property. And the commission took the view that it was fair to assume that existing prices were abnormally high, and that before the lapse of any great length of time there would be a substantial reduction in such prices.

That unit prices for material which are abnormally high during war times are not a proper standard for valuation of the property is held, also, in Re Colonial Power & Light Co. (1919; Vt.) P.U.R.1920A, 215.

In Re Roanoke Waterworks Co. (1920; Va.) P.U.R.1920C, 745, the Virginia commission said that however fair and equitable may have been the reproduction cost basis calculated in years just prior to the World War, especially when account was taken of average unit prices for a period of from three to five years preceding the date of valuation, the commission was not willing to agree to a valuation based, on present reproduction costs at the greatly inflated prices brought about by reason of war conditions; that a return based upon any such value would be grossly unfair to the public, and that the utility was by no process of reasoning entitled to a return on the same. And the commission took the appraisal made in 1913, adding thereto the probable actual cost of additions to the plant since that time at war prices, less depreciation, in reaching what it considered the fair value of the property for rate-making purposes.

And the Virginia commission in Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921; Va.) P.U.R.1921C, 193, stated that it would not recognize valuations made on unit prices of the years 1918 and 1920, which prices it considered as inflated and as affording no reasonable basis for valuation for rate-making purposes. The commission in this case took the 1914 reproduction value, adding a normal appreciation for the succeeding years,—since, had there been no war, there would have been, presumably, a gradual rise in prices due to increasing costs of production,—with allowance for actual additions made at war prices.

The Virginia commission in Re Chesapeake & P. Teleph. Co. (1920; Va.) P.U.R.1920F, 49, reaffirmed its position, declining to arrive at a fair valuation based on reproduction at inflated war values.

And, while stating that it saw no reason why the utility should not profit by increasing property values in normal times, the same as other property owners, the commission in Re Culpeper Teleph. Co. (1920; Va.) P.U.R.1920D, 305, said that it would not have accepted as a rate base a valuation on the basis of reproduction at inflated war costs, had the utility attempted such a valuation. In this case, however, the utility had adopted the unit price of 1916 and prior years.

In Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (1921; Va.) P.U.R.1921D, 268, the commission took the 1914 unit prices and allowed for normal appreciation of property values based on the average advance in prices between 1896 and 1914, rejecting the abnormal appreciation as reflected in 1920 unit prices.

In Re Virginia R. & Power Co. (Va.) supra, it was held, also, that the utility was entitled to earn a return on the amount actually necessarily expended at war prices in making additions to the property during the period from 1914 to 1920.

Where average unit prices during a series of years preceding the war were taken in valuing the property, the commission in Re Lynchburg Traction & Light Co. (1921; Va.) P.U.R.1921E, 87, held that there should be added thereto, as a basis for fixing rates, a normal appreciation in value, in order to comply with the rule that utilities are entitled to earn a return upon the reasonable fair value of their property at the time it is being used by the public. But it was said that, rather than calculate the fair value upon inflated costs represented by war-time prices, the commission attempted to estimate what might have been a normal appreciation in the value of the property had there been no war. And the commission allowed 10.8 per cent of normal depreciation from 1916 to 1921, the valuation having been made as of the former date, subsequent actual costs of additions to the property being added. In this case the unit prices used were the average prices of material and labor during the years 1912 to 1916. The company realized, it was said, that the commission would not recognize reproduction costs using unit prices as of the inflated cost period.

The Washington commission in Public Service Commission v. Spokane Falls Gaslight Co. (1921; Wash.) P.U.R.1921C, 519, held that a valuation once made of a utility's property did not change as prices fluctuated, but should be adhered to as a rate base unless it later appeared that culpable error had been committed, with allowance for additions and betterments at their cost to the utility. It was said that if a plant unit was actually and necessarily purchased at war prices, such cost was added to, and became a part of, the rate base; but that ordinarily there was no sounder method of fixing a valuation upon which to base rates than to arrive as nearly as possible at the prudent investment of the utility in property devoted to public use; that the commission was aware of the fact that a number of courts had recently held that rates should be based chiefly upon the cost of reproducing the property at prices prevailing at the time of the hearing; but that the commission would not accept the theory unless compelled to do so by the courts of that state. The commission regarded the theory of a fluctuating rate base as dangerous and unsound, and likely to result in insolvency and bankruptcy in case of a decline in prices. And, accordingly, the commission overruled the contention that the former valuation of the property as of 1917 should be disregarded and that it should be revalued as of 1920 prices.

And the Washington commission in Spokane v. Washington Water Power Co. (1921; Wash.) P.U.R.1921D, 762, said that, during the period of high prices, it would not consider or allow prevailing prices as a basis for arriving at the rate base, but had in all instances taken prices which prevailed over a series of years preceding the war, except that expenditures or additions for betterment actually made during that period are allowed at the prices paid for them.

The West Virginia commission in Re Moundsville Water Co. (1921; W. Va.) P.U.R.1922B, 28, said that for the purpose of ascertaining present fair value little weight should be given to reproduction costs based upon average prices prevailing during the war period, except in cases where a substantial part of the construction work was done during that period.

In Re Bluefield Waterworks & Improv. Co. (1921; W. Va.) P.U.R.1921E, 655, the commission in valuing a water utility's property, on an application for increase in rates, said that the applicant's plant was originally constructed more than twenty years ago, and had been added to from time to time as the development of the community required; that it would, therefore, be unfair to consumers to use as a basis for present fair valuation the abnormal prices prevailing during the recent war period, but that when, as in this case, a part of the plant had been constructed or added to during that period, in fairness to the utility, consideration must be given to the cost of such expenditures made to meet the demands of the public.

In Re Light, Fuel & P. Co. (1917; W. Va.) P.U.R.1918C, 248 (abstract), it was held that reproduction value of a utility plant, based upon prevailing abnormal high prices of labor and material, should not be regarded in arriving at the value of the plant for rate-making purposes.

In Re West Virginia Water & E. Co. (1920; W. Va.) P.U.R.1920D, 409, the West Virginia commission accepted a valuation of the property as of January 1, 1914, as the present fair value for rate-making purposes as of that date, stating that in the absence of the books of a public utility showing the true investment in and costs of the plant or property, the reproduction cost new, less depreciation, is the most equitable method of arriving at present fair value, especially if made under normal conditions when the prices of material and labor are not inflated, as was true with respect to this valuation.

The Wisconsin commission in Re Milton & M. J. Teleph. Co. (1920; Wis.) P.U.R.1920C, 110, held that the term "reproduction costs," as a factor in determining valuation for purposes of rate making, meant the approximate cost of reproducing or rebuilding the plant at average prices prevailing for some time prior to the appraisal date, and not the amount which it would cost to reproduce it under prevailing high prices. In this case it was contended that to reconstruct the plant under prevailing prices would result in a valuation of at least 75 per cent greater than the book value; but the commission said that, when such capital expenditures had been incurred, rates should be sufficient to pay fixed charges upon them, but that at the present time rates should not be established at such a level.

In Re Racine Water Co. (1917; Wis.) P.U.R.1917D, 277, the commission took the view that in fixing unit costs of materials, especially in the case of those liable to violent fluctuations, it cannot be said that there is any particular number of years that should be invariably selected to obtain an average price, since the period should be chosen to throw light on prices normally to be expected; that an average price for ten years, rather than for five years, should be taken in fixing a unit cost for cast-iron water mains, the price being subject to violent fluctuations; and that, in fixing a unit cost for laying such mains, allowance must be made for the trend of higher labor costs.

And the commission in Racine Water Co. v. Railroad Commission (1918; Wis.) P.U.R.1919A, 913, said that in arriving at reproduction cost new, less depreciation, as an element in determining ultimate value, it took unit costs considering a series of years and also considering certain trends, especially in labor costs, which it regarded as fair; and that certain estimates as to reproduction costs based on unit prices arrived at by consideration of two eighteen-month periods—the one period ending in December, 1918, and the other in April, 1917—were not, especially under the circumstances of this case, of any material weight.

In Re Wisconsin Traction, Light, Heat & P. Co. (1918; Wis.) P.U.R. 1919B, 224, where the utility contended that the valuation should at least be based upon the average cost of materials and labor during the preceding five years, it was said that the commission's engineers, during the present period of abnormally high prices, adopted a ten-year average in determining unit costs, in order to smooth out the price curve in those instances where the investment cost basis could not be used, due to lack of adequate and reliable records.

In Milwaukee v. Railroad Commis- sion (1920; Wis. Cir. Ct.) P.U.R. 1920B, 976, the Wisconsin commission held that appreciation in the value of land devoted to the purposes of the utility was proper for recognition in the appraisal; but the increase in value, it appears, was for a period preceding the war.

Although the valuation was for the purpose of municipal purchase, attention is called to Re Bloomer Electric Light & P. Co. (1918; Wis.) P.U.R.

1919B, 481, in which it was held that an appraisal based on unit costs on a ten-year average preceding 1914 did not fully reflect the value of the property, where it appeared that considerable construction had taken place since 1914. It was said that under any circumstances the actual increased costs of actual construction during the period following 1914 should be recognized, if equity was to be done,
R. E. H.

R. L. ABLES et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.

STATE OF OKLAHOMA EX REL. BEN F. SAYE.

Oklahoma Supreme Court — October 12, 1920.

(79 Okla. 282, 193 Pac. 969.)

Bail — termination of appearance bond.

1. Where the principal on a criminal appearance bond, requiring the defendant to appear before the district court on the first day of the next term and there remain from day to day, and term to term, until discharged by due course of law, appears for trial, and is found guilty of the charge preferred against him, he does not, by virtue of § 5931, Rev. Laws 1910, immediately pass into the custody of the law, and thereby discharge the sureties on his bond, unless he is committed into the custody of the proper officer to await the judgment of the court.

[See note on this question beginning on page 594.]

Officer — power — duty.

2. Where power is granted in permissive language to public officers for the benefit of the public or of individuals, it is generally held that the intent of the legislature, which is the true test, was not to devolve a mere discretion, but to impose a positive and absolute duty.

[See 22 R. C. L. 457.]

Bail — declaration of forfeiture — effect.

3. Where the court forfeiting an appearance bond has jurisdiction to declare a forfeiture, such forfeiture is conclusive evidence of its breach, and cannot be impeached by extrinsic evidence.

Trial — questions not available.

4. Record examined, and held, that the remaining propositions presented for review were not available to defendant in an action on the bond under the rule announced by this court in Andrews v. State, 80 Okla. 20, and other cases cited in the opinion.

Headnotes by KANE, J.

ERROR to the District Court for Jefferson County (Jones, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action on an appearance bond. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Green & Pruet and Bridges & Vertrees, for plaintiffs in error:

The judgment of the trial court in forfeiting the appearance bond was void, for the reason that the liability of the sureties terminated with the conviction of the accused.

3 R. C. L. 42; Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 75 Okla. 232, 182 Pac. 522; State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine, 47 Okla. 138, 148 Pac. 79; Miller v. State, 158 Ala. 73, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 861, 48 So. 360; Fortenberry v. State, 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 84, 79 S. W. 538; State v. Charles, 207 Mo. 40, 105 S. W. 609, 13 Ann. Cas. 565; State v. Dorr, 59 W. Va. 188, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 402, 115 Am. St. Rep. 915, 53 S. E. 120, 8 Ann. Cas. 1016; Suggs v. State, 129 Tenn. 498, 167 S. W. 122; 3 R. C. L. 42; 6 C. J. 1031; United States v. Cerecedo, 6 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 622.

If sentence is postponed the sureties are discharged.

6 C. J. 1031; State v. Charles, 207 Mo. 40, 105 S. W. 609, 13 Ann. Cas. 565; People v. Kennedy, 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318.

The testimony excluded by the court was competent and material.

State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine, 47 Okla. 138, 148 Pac. 79; State v. Rosseau, 39 Tex. 614; 6 C. J. 1032; 23 Cyc. 784; Walters v. American Bridge Co. 234 Pa. 7, 82 Atl. 1103; Chambers v. Mesta Mach. Co. 251 Pa. 618, 97 Atl. 101; Mercer v. Natchez, B. & S. R. Co. 136 La. 187, 66 So. 74; Parker v. Hamilton, 49 Okla. 693, 154 Pac. 65.

Mr. Ben F. Saye in propria persona.

Kane, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action upon an appearance bond, commenced by the defendant in error, plaintiff below, against the plaintiffs in error, defendants below. The action was prosecuted in the name of the state of Oklahoma ex rel. Ben F. Saye, county attorney, against R. L. Ables and the principals and sureties on said bond. Hereafter, for convenience, the parties will be designated "plaintiff" and "defendant," respectively, as they appeared in the trial court. Upon trial the court judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, to reverse which this proceeding in error was commenced.

Counsel for defendant present their grounds for reversal under three propositions as follows:

"First Proposition.—The judgment of the court in forfeiting the appearance bond in the case of the State of Oklahoma v. R. L. Ables was void, for the reason that the liability of the sureties terminated with the conviction of the accused. Upon conviction the defendant (R. L. Ables), being present in court, was directly in the custody of the court; and, even if there was no direct order to the sheriff to take the prisoner into custody, there is always an implied order that the sheriff shall do so, and the defendant was therefore as legally in the custody of the sheriff as if the bail had delivered him. If the sheriff failed under such circumstances to take the defendant into custody, the bail was discharged by operation of law.

"Second Proposition.—The court was without jurisdiction to order a forfeiture of a bond for failure of R. L. Ables to appear before the court for sentence on a day the court was not in session and on a day when the court could not have sentenced the said R. L. Ables had he appeared. The record discloses that the defendant R. L. Ables was ordered to appear on the 30th day of March, 1917, for sentence, and the minutes of the court disclose that the court was not in session on that day. No day was ever set subsequent to the 30th day of March, 1917, for the passing of sentence, nor was the matter continued to any later date. On the 9th day of June an order is made forfeiting the bail in this cause for failure of the said R. L. Ables to appear on the 30th day of March, 1917, a day the court was not in session. It would be as reasonable for the court to set the first Monday in March as the first day of the term, and later, and before the first Monday of March, make an order continuing the first day of the term till the third Monday, and then make an order forfeiting all bonds for failure of the defendants to appear on the first Monday. Can the court even say that the defendant, R. L. Ables, failed to appear before the court on a day when the court was not in session?

"Third Proposition.—The court excluded competent and material testimony. The offer to prove that motion for new trial had not been disposed of at the time sentence was passed, the offer to prove from the minutes of the court that an attempt was made to forfeit this bond when the court was not in session, the testimony offered to the effect that R. L. Ables left the court with the sanction and consent of the district judge and the county attorney, was admissible to show that the court was without jurisdiction to render the order of forfeiture. Such testimony was not open to the objection that such evidence was a collateral attack. Such testimony, if admitted, would have shown that the court was without jurisdiction to render the judgment forfeiting said bail, and that the judgment upon which this suit is predicated is void. Such testimony tended to establish that the court was without jurisdiction to forfeit said bond at the time and in the manner herein, and such proof would have been a complete defense to the suit."

The first proposition is based upon the assumption that when the principal upon the bond appeared for trial, and was convicted, he immediately passed into the custody of the law, and therefore his failure to appear for judgment and sentence did not constitute a breach of his appearance bond, by the terms of which he was required to appear before the district court "on the first day of the next term, and there remain from day to day and term to term until discharged by due course of law."

The statute (Rev. Laws 1910, § 5931) which provides that by virtue of which it is claimed the principal passed into the custody of the law immediately upon conviction provides: "If a general verdict is rendered against the defendant he must be remanded if in custody, or if on bail he may be committed to the proper officer of the county to await the judgment of the court upon the verdict."

It is contended that the word "may," as used in the second line of this section, should be construed to mean "shall," and that, when thus construed, the case at bar falls within the rule announced in State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine, 47 Okla. 138, 148 Pac. 79, wherein it was held that, "upon judgment being rendered and sentence passed, the custody of the defendant under the law passed from his bail to the proper officer, and the court was not at liberty to vary or enlarge the terms of their undertaking."

We are unable to agree with this contention. It is quite true that, where power is granted in permissive language to public officers for the benefit of the public or of individuals, it is generally held that the intent of the legislature, which is the true test, was not to devolve a mere discretion, but to impose a positive and absolute duty. Rock Island County v. United States, 4 Wall. 435, 18 L. ed. 419. But in the statute now under consideration the permissive word "may" was undoubtedly used for the benefit of defendants, who are on bail at the time of their conviction, and to give it the construction contended for would clearly militate against their interest. The statute contemplates that when a general verdict is rendered against the defendant he must be remanded if in custody. Here, it will be observed, the peremptory "must" is used. But if he is on bail he "may" be committed, etc. If the legislature intended the words "must" and "may" to be peremptory under the two circumstances stated in the statute, surely they would have used mandatory language in both instances; or they would have omitted the latter entirely, and merely provided that, if a general verdict is rendered against the defendant, he must be committed to the custody of the proper officer to await the judgment of the court on the verdict.

Officer—power
—duty.

In State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine, supra, the principal on the appearance bond disappeared after conviction and judgment, and the statute under consideration (Rev. Laws 1910, § 5963) provides: "If the judgment be imprisonment, or fine and imprisonment, . . . the defendant must forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer and by him detained until the judgment be complied with."

When these differences between the two cases and the statutes construed are considered, the distinction between the principal case and the case at bar becomes quite apparent.

The case of Glasgow v. State, 41 Kan. 333, 21 Pac. 253, is more nearly in point. That was an action upon an appearance bond conditioned that said defendant shall appear before the district court on the first day of the next term thereof, to answer the complaint in said cause alleged against him, and not depart the same without leave. The defendant appeared at the next term of said district court and entered a plea of not guilty. A jury was impaneled, a trial had, and the jury returned a verdict of guilty. Afterwards, and before sentence or judgment was pronounced, the defendant disappeared, and did not appear for judgment and sentence. The trial court rendered judgment against the sureties upon the bond for the full amount thereof. The sureties took an appeal to the supreme court, where they claimed that, under the statutes of Kansas, an examining magistrate was authorized to take bail only in such cases as in the opinion of the magistrate will secure the appearance of the person charged with the offense, at the court where such person is to be tried. The magistrate in the preliminary examination made an order, and entered it upon his docket, requiring the defendant to give bond to appear and answer the charge made against him at the next term of the district court. The bond itself provided that he shall appear at said court and answer to the charge, and not depart therefrom without leave.

The contention of the sureties was that the statute only authorized the examining magistrate to take bail for the appearance of the defendant, and because the bond provided not only for the appearance, but that he was to answer the charge made against him, and not depart from the court without leave, it was more onerous than the provisions of the statute, and for that reason was a nullity, and could not support the judgment based upon it. It was also contended, as in the case at bar, that the conditions of such bond, even if it had been authorized by the statute, were fully complied with by the defendant McGuire; that he did appear at the term of court, and therefore his sureties on the bond were released from all liability. The court, in discussing the proposition of law presented, says: "We think, when a party is required to appear at the district court after a preliminary examination has been had or waived, that the use of the word 'appear' implies that he is to appear for the purposes of a trial of the charges made against him. . . .

It is not enough for the party to be there for the first day, and then slip off without leave, in order to comply with the conditions of the bond; the very fact of the condition of his appearance is that he shall appear for a certain purpose; he appears for the trial of the charges made against him, and if he departs before the trial and judgment are had, without leave of the court, his bond is forfeited. He appeared for trial, he departed before judgment. The statute provides that, if without sufficient excuse he neglect to appear for trial or judgment, the court must direct the fact to be entered upon its minutes, and declare the forfeiture of the bond."

The Glasgow Case seems to pass on the identical question involved in the case at bar, and, as the Kansas statutes construed are identical with our own statutes on the same subject, we are constrained to follow the rule announced by the Kansas court. Our statute nowhere prescribes the form of the bond, but the form in this case follows the customary form, and requires the principal to appear on the first day of the next term, and there remain from day to day and term to term of said court, until discharged by due course of law.

In Shriver v. State, 32 Okla. 507, 122 Pac. 160, the court held that: "The condition in a bond that the principal will appear before the district court to answer a charge is not fulfilled by appearing for arraignment and moving to set aside the indictment, demurring, or pleading thereto. He must stay until the case is disposed of and he is discharged by the court."

In State ex rel. Buckley v. Drake, 40 Okla. 538, 139 Pac. 976, it was held that the authorities do not sustain the proposition that the appearance of an accused for trial, where a conviction results, releases his sureties from further liability on his bond. Since he has not complied with the condition of his bond requiring his attendance "until discharged by due course of law," that condition of the bond requires his attendance upon and presence before the court as much as the provision "that he will not depart without leave," or that "he will abide the judgment of the court."

In Shriver v. State, supra, it was contended by the defendant that it was the duty of the court to place the defendant in custody when the indictment or information was filed in the district court, even though he may have already given bail, but the court held that such contention could not be upheld, but that it was a matter left solely to the discretion of the court. In both of these Okla.

20 A.L.R.—38.

homa cases the rule announced in Glasgow v. State, supra, was approved. We think that these authorities conclusively show that the first contention of counsel for the defendant is without merit.

Bail—termination of appearance bond.

Moreover, we are unable to perceive, although counsel does not urge it in his brief, why this and the remaining propositions presented for review were not foreclosed as defenses by the rule announced by this court in the following cases: Andrews v. State, 80 Okla. 20, 193 Pac. 873, recently decided; State v. Hines, 37 Okla. 198, 131 Pac. 688, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 431; Hines v. State, 39 Okla. 638, 136 Pac. 592; Edwards v. State, 39 Okla. 605, 136 Pac. 577.

Trial—questions not available.

It is conceded that the order of forfeiture was made by the court while in session, upon the ground that the principal had absconded before judgment and was a fugitive from justice, and that the forfeiture has not been set aside by the court in which it was entered.

The rule is well established that, where the court forfeiting an appearance bond has jurisdiction to declare a forfeiture, such forfeiture is conclusive evidence of its breach, and cannot be impeached by extrinsic evidence. 5 Cyc. 149; State ex rel. Voyles v. Pierce, — Okla. —, 166 Pac. 132; Melton v. State, 46 Okla. 487, 149 Pac. 154.

Bail—declaration of forfeiture—effect.

In the case at bar the principal was required by the terms of the bond itself to appear from term to term and day to day, etc., and the order of the court, requiring him to appear on some special day fixed by the court, in or out of term time, did not excuse him from appearing in accordance with the terms of the bond. The finding by the court in term time that the principal was a fugitive from justice conclusively showed a breach of the terms of the bond, which justified the forfeiture.

In Andrews v. State, supra, the defendants Andrews and Tucker offered to prove by witnesses that Andrews was taken into custody by the sheriff of Jefferson county, and placed in the county jail of said county sometime in the month of June, 1916, by virtue of a commitment issued out of the county court of said county on the judgment in the case in which said bond was given, and that said defendant was kept in the jail five or six days, and was permitted to depart therefrom by the sheriff's force of said county, or that they turned him out. The court excluded this evidence, and its action in this respect is the principal assignment of error.

In passing upon this question, the chief justice, who delivered the opinion for the court, said: "This evidence would doubtless have authorized the court in which the forfeiture was taken to discharge the forfeiture, but such a defense was not available in an action on the bond, for it has been repeatedly held in this jurisdiction that the final order of the trial court, declaring a forfeiture of a bail bond, cannot be collaterally attacked in a subsequent action against the principal and sureties on the bond."

In Edwards v. State, supra, the sureties offered to prove by parol testimony that the principal voluntarily surrendered himself to the sheriff of Okfuskee county prior to the entry of the default of the bond, and that the sheriff had taken him into custody. With reference to this defense, Galbraith, commissioner, speaking for the court, said: "It does not appear from an examination of the record in this case that the plaintiff in error appeared in the county court when the forfeiture of the bonds was taken, or afterwards made application to that court to vacate or set aside the forfeiture, or made any effort in that court to relieve himself from the consequences of the forfeiture. He seemed to have remained passive until after action was commenced in the district court, when he attempted to show as a defense, by oral testimony, a surrender of the principal. This could not avail him as a defense in such action. He might have secured his discharge by complying with the provisions of the statute above quoted, by proper steps taken in the county court. That he did not do this seems to have been his own fault, and he should not now complain of the result."

As we are unable to distinguish the case at bar from the cases just cited, it follows that the judgment below must be affirmed.

Pitchford, Johnson, McNeill, and Bailey, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Bail: stage of proceeding at which sureties are discharged in criminal case.

- I. Scope, 595.
- II. In general, 596.
- III. Preliminary examination before committing magistrate, 597.
- IV. Failure to indict, 597.
- V. Vacation or destruction of indictment:
 - a. In general, 600.
 - b. Vacation on motion of state:
 - 1. In general, 600.
 - 2. Nolle prosequi, 602.
 - c. Vacation on motion of defendant:

V. c—continued.

- 1. In general, 604.
- 2. Quashal, 604.
- d. Destruction, 607.
- VI. Appearance at time named, 607.
- VII. Failure to hold term at which defendant bound to appear, 609.
- VIII. Appearance from term to term, 610.
- IX. Plea to indictment, 615.
- X. Failure to try defendant, 617.
- XI. Commencement of trial, 618.
- XII. Discharge of jury, 623.
- XIII. Retirement of jury, 623.

XIV. Return of verdict:

- a. Conviction, 624.
- b. Acquittal, 627.

XV. Appearance to receive sentence, 628.XVI. Judgment or sentence, 629.*XVII. Submission to judgment or sentence, 632.*I. Scope.

The object of this annotation is to set out the cases showing the time at which the liability of the sureties in bail bonds or recognizances terminates by reason of the complete fulfillment of the conditions of the bond or recognizance, as distinguished from cases where the bail are held to have been discharged, or excused from fulfilling such conditions by events or acts happening or done during the progress of the prosecution of the accused. It therefore includes cases as to the termination of the liability of the bail by the vacation of the indictment on demurrer, by motion, by quashal, by entry of nolle prosequi, by filing away, by destruction, or otherwise; cases as to the continuation of the liability of the sureties for the appearance of the accused from term to term, and during the trial and its adjournments; cases as to the termination of their liability by the ending of the trial with the acquittal, conviction, or sentence of the defendant; cases as to the effect on the continuation of their liability, of an appeal; cases as to the termination of the liability of sureties in bail bonds or recognizances given on appeal or writ of error; and cases as to the continuation of their liability through appeal, and to a retrial in the lower court. It excludes cases as to the discharge of the bail by a failure to find an indictment, or a return of no indictment found, where such failure or return occurs after the forfeiture of the bond or recognizance, by reason of the failure of the defendant to appear or otherwise, and is made a ground for a remission of the forfeiture; but cases as to the termination of the sureties' liability by such failure to indict before forfeiture are included. Cases as to the discharge of the sureties by the indictment of the

XVIII. Appeal from conviction:

- a. In general, 635.
- b. Revival of liability of bail on dismissal of appeal, 636.

XIX. Bail bonds given on appeal:

- a. In general, 636.
- b. Reversal of conviction, 637.

accused for another offense than that named in the bond or recognizance are excluded, except where the original indictment is set aside, and a new indictment found, and the question is whether the liability of the bail extends to the appearance of the defendant to answer the new indictment. Cases as to the effect on the liability of the sureties of the failure to notify them of the indictment of their principal, or of the court in which to produce him; cases as to the remission of a forfeiture of the bond or recognizance by a subsequent vacation of the indictment; cases as to the discharge of the sureties from further liability by a change of venue; and cases as to their discharge by the continuance, adjournment, or postponement of the case without their consent or knowledge—are also excluded. The annotation further excludes cases as to discharge of the bail by the arrest of the accused for another crime, or his rearrest for the same offense, by his surrender by his bail, or by the taking of him into custody by the sheriff or other officer, except where he is taken into custody after conviction and the issue is whether an order of the court to do so is necessary to terminate the liability of the sureties. Cases as to the discharge of the bail by the execution of a new bond or recognizance by the defendant are not included, except where the execution of an appeal bond is claimed to mark the termination of the trial bail bond. Bastardy bonds, and recognizances without sureties, are also excluded. While, as stated in 3 R. C. L. 32, there is a distinction between a bail bond and a recognizance, but, as further stated therein, the terms seem to be used without distinction in most of the cases, and the rules laid down ordinarily are applicable to both, these terms have been treated in the annotation as synonymous, and used interchangeably.

II. In general.

No general rule can be laid down upon this subject because the conditions of bail bonds or recognizances vary in different jurisdictions, and in different courts, and have changed from time to time in the same jurisdictions or courts. This is so for the further reason that such conditions are frequently prescribed by statute, and sometimes the termination of the liability of bail depends upon the construction of still other statutory provisions. But as the sole purpose of a bail bond or recognizance is to secure the enlargement of the principal, and its effect is to place him in the custody of his bail, who are under the duty of producing him before the court to answer the charge against him, it may be generally stated, as will appear from a consideration of the following cases hereinafter set out in this annotation, that the liability of his sureties terminates at any stage of the proceedings at which the prosecution is ended by the discharge of the defendant by the court or by operation of law, or his custody is retransferred to the proper officers of the law.

United States. — United States v. Cercedo (1914) 6 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 622.

Alabama. — Goodwin v. Governor (1832) 1 Stew. & P. 465; Rogers v. State (1885) 79 Ala. 59; Ex parte Chandler (1896) 114 Ala. 8, 22 So. 285.

Arkansas. — State use of Independence County v. Glenn (1883) 40 Ark. 332; Ford v. State (1911) 100 Ark. 515, 140 S. W. 734.

Georgia. — Lamp v. Smith (1876) 56 Ga. 589; Colquitt v. Smith (1880) 65 Ga. 341; Roberts v. Gordon (1890) 86 Ga. 386, 12 S. E. 648; Sampson v. Harris (1917) 147 Ga. 426, 94 S. E. 558; Collins v. State (1910) 7 Ga. App. 653, 67 S. E. 847; Atlanta v. Turner (1910) 8 Ga. App. 213, 68 S. E. 847; Brock v. Slaton (1916) 18 Ga. App. 175, 89 S. E. 156.

Idaho. — State v. McLeod (1918) 31 Idaho, 536, 173 Pac. 496.

Illinois. — Ogden v. People (1871) 62 Ill. 63; Wilson v. People (1882) 10 Ill. App. 357; Spillman v. People (1884) 16 Ill. App. 224.

Indiana. — Lyons v. State (1824) 1 Blackf. 309; State v. Clerk (1896) 16 Ind. App. 137, 44 N. E. 813.

Iowa. — State v. Zimmerman (1900) 112 Iowa, 5, 83 N. E. 720.

Kansas. — Moorehead v. State (1888) 38 Kan. 489, 16 Pac. 957; Jackson v. State (1893) 52 Kan. 249, 34 Pac. 744; State v. Buis (1912) 86 Kan. 562, 121 Pac. 365; Lane v. State (1897) 6 Kan. App. 106, 50 Pac. 905.

Kentucky. — Com. v. Coleman (1859) 2 Met. 382; Askins v. Com. (1864) 1 Duv. 275; Bryant v. Com. (1867) 3 Bush, 9; Com. v. Blinco (1867) 3 Bush, 12; Mitchell v. Com. (1876) 12 Bush, 247; Ramey v. Com. (1885) 6 Ky. L. Rep. 524 (abstract); Hall v. Com. (1895) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 231, 30 S. W. 877.

Louisiana. — State v. Bugg (1843) 6 Rob. (La.) 63; State v. Wilson (1859) 14 La. Ann. 446; State v. Doane (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1194.

Maryland. — State v. Murphy (1839) 10 Gill & J. 365.

Michigan. — People v. Kennedy (1885) 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318.

Missouri. — State v. Mackey (1874) 55 Mo. 51; State v. Murmann (1894) 124 Mo. 502, 28 S. W. 2; Allen v. Cape Brewery & Ice Co. (1906) 196 Mo. 435, 95 S. W. 417; State v. Charles (1907) 207 Mo. 40, 105 S. W. 609, 13 Ann. Cas. 565; McKensie v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 24 Mo. App. 392; State v. Cobb (1891) 44 Mo. App. 375.

Nebraska. — Hesselgrave v. State (1902) 63 Neb. 807, 89 N. W. 295.

New York. — People v. Felton (1860) 36 Barb. 429; People v. Hainer (1845) 1 Denio, 454.

Ohio. — Swank v. State (1854) 3 Ohio St. 429.

Oklahoma. — State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine (1915) 47 Okla. 138, 148 Pac. 79.

Oregon. — Hyde v. Cross (1894) 25 Or. 543, 37 Pac. 59; State v. Turpin (1909) 54 Or. 367, 103 Pac. 468.

Pennsylvania. — Keehaver v. Com. (1830) 2 Penr. & W. 240; Com. v.

Somers (1893) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 159, 3 Lack. Jur. 185.

Tennessee.—Beasley v. State (1915) 134 Tenn. 660, 185 S. W. 687; Suggs v. State (1914) 129 Tenn. 498, 167 S. W. 122.

Texas. — Fossett v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 117, 67 S. W. 322; Fortenberry v. State (1904) 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 84, 79 S. W. 538.

West Virginia. — State v. Dorr (1906) 59 W. Va. 188, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 402, 115 Am. St. Rep. 915, 53 S. E. 120, 8 Ann. Cas. 1016.

Wisconsin.—State v. Becker (1891) 80 Wis. 313, 50 N. W. 178.

England. — Rex v. Spenser (1752) 1 Wils. 315, 95 Eng. Reprint, 637.

Canada. — Reg. v. Hamilton (1899) 12 Manitoba L. R. 507, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 1; Rex v. Edwards (1914) 23 Can. Crim. Cas. 296, 19 D. L. R. 207.

III. Preliminary examination before committing magistrate.

The liability of sureties in a recognizance conditioned that defendant appear on a certain day before a committing magistrate for examination, and not depart without leave, is not terminated by his appearance at the time named, and if he abscond during the examination the sureties are liable. Com. v. Ross (1821) 6 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 427.

A recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear before a city police magistrate for examination, during the examination, and on each and every day to which it may be adjourned, until the same is fully completed, is not fulfilled by the appearance of the defendant after the first day of examination, and the sureties are liable if he fails to appear on the day to which the examination is adjourned. People v. Newman (1905) 100 App. Div. 436, 91 N. Y. Supp. 811.

And a recognizance requiring the defendant to appear in court at a time certain, to proceed with his examination, and from day to day as ordered by the court, and not depart without leave, requires him to appear at a time to which the examination is lawfully adjourned by the magistrate, and to remain in attendance during the full examination, and the bond, therefore, remains in full force and effect during the entire examination, and the failure of the accused to appear at any time to which the examination is properly adjourned renders the sureties liable. People v. Gordon (1878) 39 Mich. 259.

But it was held in State v. Bobb (1890) 39 Mo. App. 543, that the sureties on a recognizance taken by a justice of the peace to bind the defendant to appear before him on a named day, and not to depart without leave, are discharged, where the defendant appears on such day, pleads not guilty, is examined, and the justice announces his finding, and thereafter the justice and the constable permit the defendant to leave the court room to secure bail for the circuit court, upon the ground that, by statute, the justice is only authorized to require a bond for the appearance of the defendant for examination, and a provision of the bond that the defendant shall not depart without leave, if interpreted to mean during the examination, does not add anything to the force of the bond, and, if taken to mean after the examination, is not authorized by the statute, and should be rejected as surplusage.

As to effect of commencement of trial, see infra, XI.

IV. Failure to indict.

Liability of bail is not terminated by the failure to find an indictment against the principal, where the case is continued for resubmission to the grand jury.

Thus, the simple fact that no indictment or presentment has been found against the defendant will not, per se, discharge his sureties, as there may be cases that will require the principal still to be held to answer to the charge, although no bill has been found against him. State v. Cooper (1879) 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 226. The court, however, said in this case that if the defendant appeared, and no indictment or presentment had been found against him, and no legal reason was given why he should be longer held to answer to the charge, the court might discharge him and his bail from their recognizance.

The sureties are liable where the defendant fails to appear on the day named in the bond, the first day of the term, although no indictment be found against him. Adair v. State (1822) 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 200.

Liability of the sureties is not terminated by the failure of the grand jury to find an indictment against the defendant at the term to which he is bound over, where the court orders the charges against the defendant to be continued for investigation by the grand jury; but the liability of the sureties continues from term to term, until the defendant is discharged by law. State v. Fuller (1900) 128 Ala. 45, 30 So. 506.

And it was held in Pack v. State (1861) 23 Ark. 235, that the failure to find an indictment against the defendant does not terminate the liability of his sureties to produce him at the term of the court specified in the bail bond, and that the bond cannot be discharged in any other way than by the direct order of the court. In this case the court said: "The recognizers are not concerned in the question of there being an indictment against their principal, or in his guilt or innocence of any charge. If there should be no indictment, it might be a good reason for the court to order his discharge, or if he were innocent, or could make a good legal defense to an indictment, that might procure his acquittal and consequent discharge; but these and kindred reasons are no cause for the absence of the principal, are no defense to his securities for not compelling his attendance. State v. Stout (1829) 11 N. J. L. 133; Archer v. Com. (1854) 10 Gratt. (Va.) 633. The condition of the recognizance, as set forth in the scire facias, was not only to appear and answer to the charge specified, but not to depart from the court without leave thereof. The meaning of that clause is to detain the party to answer charges that may be made against him, other than the particular one mentioned in the recognizance. The law contemplates that the particular charge may not be sustained—that it may not be the one that he will be called to defend, but that out of the transaction some other charge may spring up for which his presence will be needed, or that, for some good reason, he ought to be subject to the action of the court, upon other grounds than the main specification, and hence this precautionary clause is inserted."

Under a bail bond containing a stipulation by the defendant not only to appear, but also to "appear from day to day and term to term of said court, and not depart the same without leave," it is his duty, upon appearing at the proper time, to remain in attendance until given leave to depart, and the fact that no indictment or information is filed against him does not make the liability of his sureties terminate with his appearance. West v. State (1918) 75 Fla. 342, 78 So. 275.

And the sureties on a bond conditioned for the appearance of the defendant at the next term, and from term to term until discharged by law, are liable upon defendant's failure to appear at the next term, and they are not discharged by the failure to find an indictment against him at such term, where the case is regularly entered on the docket and continued, and no order is made discharging them from their undertaking. State v. Kyle (1892) 99 Ala. 256, 13 So. 538. In this case, however, the court said: "It may be that if there had been no order made in reference to the bond, such as calling the principal obligor and declaring a forfeiture upon his failure to appear, or docketing the case against them and continuing it for future action, such omission might have worked a discontinuance of the case, which would have authorized the discharge of the obligors. But the action of the court, as shown by the agreed facts, clearly shows that the state had not discontinued the prosecution, and had made no order discharging the bail."

By a bond for the appearance of the principal on the first day of the next term, and from day to day thereafter until discharged by the court, and to abide the order of the court, and not to depart without leave, the sureties bind themselves, by becoming his bail, that the principal shall perform these several acts, and the failure of the principal to appear at the term to which he has bound himself to appear is ground for the forfeiture of the bond, although no indictment be presented to the grand jury. Garrison v. People (1859) 21 Ill. 535.

And the fact that the grand jury returns "No true bill," where the case is continued, and again submitted to a grand jury, does not work a discharge of the defendant in the absence of a formal discharge by the court; and his failure subsequently to appear, when called in open court, renders liable the sureties on his bail bond, conditioned for his appearance, and to abide the order of the court and not depart without leave. Com. v. Harvey (1908) 36 Pa. Super. Ct. 235.

But the liability of the sureties on a bond for the appearance of the defendant at the next term, and from term to term until discharged by law, is terminated where no indictment is found at such term, and no order is made continuing the case, although no order discharging the sureties is asked for, or made, and they are not liable for his nonappearance to answer an indictment found at a subsequent term. Rogers v. State (1885), 79 Ala. 59. The court said: "The practice on this subject was settled in the case of Goodwin v. Governor (1832) 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 465, which was decided as early as the year 1832, and has never been since overruled. It was there held that when a party was recognized to appear at a particular term of the circuit court to answer for an offense with which he was charged, and the grand jury failed to find an indictment against him, and the cause was not continued for further investigation, this operated as a discontinuance, and discharged the accused; in the absence, at least, of any forfeiture being taken for sufficient reasons at such term of the court. There are cases in other states which hold that the accused is not discharged until the court enters of record an order of exoneration to this effect. But we see no harm to ensue from adhering to the rule settled in Goodwin's Case (Ala.) supra. If the accused is not called at the term of the court at which he was to appear by the express stipulation of his bond, and no indictment is found against him by reason of the grand jury's ignoring the bill, and the circuit court makes no order authorizing a continuance of the investigation at the ensuing term, the sureties have a right to believe that they are discharged from the obligation of their undertaking. If one term of the court can be passed without action by the grand jury, or the court, why not another? And, if more than one, when are the sureties to know that the legal custody of the accused, with the power to arrest and deliver him into the hands of the sheriff, has ceased, or been abrogated? The safer practice, perhaps, to prevent misunderstanding, is for the court to have the accused discharged by proclamation, and by entering of record an exoneration; though this course is not deemed necessary, nor is it believed to be customary in this state. But, where it is desired to authorize a continuance of the investigation by the grand jurors, the court, in order to hold the sureties, should make an order to this effect, showing a refusal to discharge the principal."

Where an indictment signed by the attorney for the commonwealth is returned into court by the grand jury, indorsed with the word "Ignored," and no order is made by the court directing a resubmission of the case to the grand jury, the liability of the sureties is terminated, although the defendant is not discharged, and they are not responsible for his subsequent appearance. Bryant v. Com. (1867) 3 Bush (Ky.) 9. The court said that the failure of the judge, as required by statute, to discharge the defendant, unless he was of the opinion that the charge should again be submitted to another grand jury, should not be allowed to prejudice the sureties.

And in Com. v. Blincoe (1867) 3 Bush (Ky.) 12, it was held that where, at the appearance term, the grand jury ignored the successive indictments presented to them by the prosecuting attorney, and no further prosecution of the charge against defendant was attempted, or was either indicated or probable, the sureties were not liable for the defendant's failure to appear on a subsequent day, the court saying: "When the grand jury refused to find any indictment, the principal cognizor and his sureties had a right to presume that the prosecution was ended, and that his formal appearance afterwards would be an idle and unnecessary act."

The sureties on the appearance bond of one committed on a felonious charge are entitled to be released from their bond by the discharge of the grand jury at the first term of court after the execution of the bond, without finding a true bill. State v. Doane (1878) 30 La. Ann. 1194. In this case the court said: "The state opposed their discharge for the reason that, although the grand jury had not found a true bill against Doane at that term, non constat that a subsequent grand jury would not find such a bill at some subsequent term, and, the crime being imprescriptible, Doane was liable always to an indictment. The state also contended that the sureties must be held bound until the grand jury had acted on the charge, and returned 'Not a true bill.' If the sureties to a bond of this kind must be held bound until a second term of the court is held, and a second grand jury has been impaneled and discharged, they may be held until any subsequent term of court, or forever. They were entitled to a discharge from the appearance bond after the discharge of the grand jury at the first term after the execution of the bond, without finding a true bill. The failure of the grand jury to indict the accused does not, of itself, relieve him of liability to a future prosecution. That can only be done by the jury acting on the charge, and returning 'Not a true bill.' But that is not the question here, but solely whether the sureties to his appearance bond should be released by a judgment of court under the facts shown. We think they were properly released from their bond."

And in upholding a forfeiture of a recognizance upon the failure of the defendant to appear on the day named therein, as against the objection that no indictment was subsequently found against the defendant, the court, in Fleece v. State (1865) 25 Ind. 384, said: "If he had appeared as required by his recognizance, the court, after the grand jury was discharged without having found an indictment against him for the offense charged, would doubtless have discharged him and his sureties from the recognizance, unless some proper reason existed why such discharge should not be entered; and until then it was the duty of the accused to be in attendance on the court."

V. Vacation or destruction of indictment.

a. In general.

As appears from the cases under this subdivision, while there is some conflict of authority, the weight of authority is to the effect that the vacation of the indictment terminates the liability of bail, but its loss or destruction is held, without contradiction, not to do so.

b. Vacation on motion of state.

1. In general.

The vacation, on the motion of the district attorney, of a valid indictment, terminates the liability of the sureties on the bail bond of the person indicted. Hyde v. Cross (1894) 25 Or. 543, 37 Pac. 59. The court gave the following reasons for its decision: "The judgment appealed from rests upon the power of a court, on motion of the state, to set aside a valid indictment upon which the defendant has been admitted to bail, resubmit the case to the grand jury, and hold the bail liable for the appearance of defendant to answer a new indictment, if one be found. The only provision of law making bail liable for the appearance of a defendant to answer a new indictment is to be found in §§ 1317 and 1328 of Hill's Code, which provides that when the original indictment is set aside on motion of the defendant, for any of the reasons specified in § 1314, or a demurrer thereto is sustained, the court may order that the case be resubmitted to the same or another grand jury, and in such case the bail remains answerable for the appearance of the defendant to answer a new indictment, if one be found. But in this case no motion or demurrer was interposed by the defendant. The indictment was set aside by the court, on motion of the district attorney. Indeed, the record does not show that there was any defect in the indictment which could have been taken advantage of by a motion or demurrer on the part of the defendant, or that it was resubmitted to the grand jury for the purpose of correcting some formal defect, but presumably it was resubmitted so that the state might change a material allegation, and thereby relieve itself from some possible embarrassment in being compelled to prove that the animal stolen was a gelding, as charged in the first indictment. The act of the court in thus resubmitting the matter to the grand jury at the instance of the state, in our opinion, amounted to a dismissal of the indictment specified in the bail bond, and clearly operated as a discharge of the sureties. By their undertaking the sureties covenanted with the state that the defendant should appear and answer an indictment therein stated; and when he did appear in fulfilment of that undertaking, and the indictment was set aside or dismissed on motion of the district attorney, it was, in effect, a discharge of the recognizance and the exoneration of his bail. The agreement or contract of the sureties was that the defendant should answer a particular charge as specified in the indictment then pending against him, and the condition that the defendant would appear to answer said indictment, 'and at all times render himself amenable to the orders and processes of the court,' was fulfilled and satisfied by an appearance and a dismissal of the particular indictment mentioned and described in the undertaking, and cannot be construed into an obligation that the accused should appear and answer some other indictment which might be found against him. What the rule may be in the case of an undertaking for the appearance of a defendant before indictment, or when the indictment is resubmitted to a grand jury for the purpose of correcting some formal defect therein, it will be time enough for us to consider when the question is presented; but no such question is made on this record."

The filing away of the indictment, on the motion of the commonwealth's attorney, subject to another indictment in the same case, releases the surety in the bail bond, and the surety is not liable for the failure of the defendant to appear at a subsequent term, since, the indictment being filed away, there is no prosecution pending in law at such term. Hall v. Com. (1895) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 231, 30 S. W. 877.

And an order of the court, upon the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, that the defendant be discharged without day, until the case is set for trial by the clerk after notice to defendant, which has the effect of filing away the indictment with leave to reinstate, releases the sureties, and they are not liable upon the failure of the defendant to appear at a future day set by the clerk, especially where the defendant is not personally notified, notice being given only to his attorneys. Miller v. Com. (1921) 192 Ky. 709, 234 S. W. 307.

And the vacation of the indictment upon the motion of the prosecuting officer, and in the presence of the accused while there to answer, is a discharge of the obligation, releasing the surety and authorizing the prisoner's departure from court without any special permission or order therefrom. People v. Felton (1860) 36 Barb. (N. Y.) 429. The court discussed this point as follows: "The condition of the undertaking was that the accused should appear at a time and place specified, to answer an indictment therein stated; and when the accused appeared in fulfilment of that undertaking, and that indictment was quashed in open court in his presence, on motion of the district attorney, it was a discharge of the recognizance, and a permission for the prisoner to depart. An acquittal of such indictment, on trial, would most certainly operate as a discharge of the recognizance, and no special leave for the prisoner to depart would need be asked of the court, in order to release the surety from his obligation; and this would be so even though the undertaking, as in this case, contained the clause that the accused should not depart the court without leave, etc. In a recognizance to answer an indictment, that clause has no force, beyond answering the particular charge named (People v. Stager (1833) 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 434); while in a matter before indictment it has force, and is important, to detain the accused until the court shall know what charges are to be brought against him, and in order that the prosecuting officer may have the same control over him, for all offenses brought against him, as the prosecutor would, had the accused remained in the custody of the sheriff. In the one case the recognizance is to answer a particular charge; in the other it is to answer what may be alleged against him before the grand jury. In this case the grand jury had investigated the complaint, presented their finding in the form of an indictment, the prisoner had been arraigned, the charges read to him, and he had pleaded thereto, thus forming an issue which was placed upon the record for the court to try; and a recognizance that the 'prisoner should appear and stand trial upon that indictment, and not depart the court without leave, but abide its order and decision,' was satisfied by an appearance and discharge of the indictment, and cannot be converted into an obligation that the accused should remain to see if any other indictment was to be found, unless formally discharged by the court. The surety, at least, assumed no such responsibility; as to him the obligation was single in its purpose, and fully satisfied when the indictment was discharged."

2. Nolle prosequi.

The entry by the district attorney of a nolle prosequi terminates the liability of the sureties on a bond for the appearance of the defendant. State v. Bugg (1843) 6 Rob. (La.) 63.

A nolle prosequi is a termination of the case, so as to discharge the sureties, and the force of the bond does not continue so as to render the sureties liable for the defendant's failure to appear and answer a new bill for the same offense. Lamp v. Smith (1876) 56 Ga. 589. In this case the court said: "When the first bill was nol. pros'd that case was terminated, and with it ended all incidents to it, including any bond connected with it. The security on any such bond was relieved at that moment, as much as he would have been by the verdict of a jury. The new bill was a new case, for which and upon which a new recognizance should have been taken with new security—Camp, or someone else. The solicitor, before he nol. pros'd the old bill, could have held Camp bound to cause defendant to answer and appear, but the moment he nol. pros'd it, he lost his power over Camp. Before he nol. pros'd that bill and got the new one, he should have called the defendant and bound him over again. If the defendant had not appeared, Camp would have been liable then, because the case was pending on which he was surety, but when that case was nol. pros'd Camp was released."

But the entry of a nolle prosequi does not terminate the liability of the surety on a bond conditioned that the defendant shall personally appear, and abide the final determination of the case. State v. Haskett (1835) 21 S. C. L. (3 Hill) 95.

Nor does such entry terminate the liability of the sureties on a bail bond for the appearance of the defendant, which provides that he will not depart from the court without leave. Silvers v. State (1896) 59 N. J. L. 428, 37 Atl. 133. This point is discussed by the court as follows: "In the brief of counsel, the problem is thus formulated: 'The entry of a nolle prosequi by the order of the court, on motion of the prosecutor, is a discharge of the bail.' But this court is of opinion that this contention is a manifest fallacy. In order to sustain the proposition, it would be necessary to suppress an important and clearly expressed stipulation in the recognizance itself. As appears from the pleading in the case, this instrument now in question is in the proper and customary form, and imposes a twofold objection—that is to say, that the defendant in the indictment will first appear and stand to and abide 'the order and judgment of the court in the premises, and, in the second place, will not depart the said court without leave.' In the present instance, this latter stipulation was admittedly violated, as there is no pretense that the withdrawal of the defendant from the court had been judicially sanctioned. And it is also to be noted that this engagement that the defendant will not depart the court without leave is not merely ancillary to the promise that he will abide the judgment of the court, but it is an additional and independent term of the contract. In its absence, our criminal procedure would be radically imperfect. It is intended to provide, and does provide, for the occasion when a particular form of prosecution may be terminated, but when, in another mode, the prosecution is to be continued. In the case before the court, a nolle prosequi was entered, the effect of which was, if it remained in force, to vacate and annul the then-existing indictment; but it did not conclude the prosecution for the offense, for another indictment could have been found. And if, in that condition of things, the prosecutor had stated to the court that the state intended to present the matter to the next grand jury, it is obvious that the court, if applied to, would not have ordered an exoneration to have been entered on the bailpiece. The importance, therefore, of the requisition that the defendant in the prosecution cannot be discharged until he has obtained formal judicial consent to such result, is plainly apparent. In the present instance, there is much reason to believe that, if the motion had been made to discharge the prisoner on the ground that a nolle prosequi had occurred, such motion would have been rejected, inasmuch as the rule for judgment on the abandonment of the existing procedure was ordered to be erased from the minutes, the implication being that the entry had been made by mistake, or without authority. If this were a case in which a judgment putting an end absolutely to the prosecution for the offense, such as would ensue in a verdict of acquittal or conviction, an entirely different question from that we are now considering would have been presented; for, in view of such a final determination, the stipulation not to depart from the court without leave would have been bereft of all substantial force. What the effect of such a course of law would be it is not necessary to consider. All that the court at present decides is that the cessation of the criminal proceeding in a certain form, leaving a potentiality of its further prosecution in a different method, does not, ipso facto, discharge the defendant from the obligation of his recognizance."

And the surety on a bail bond is not released by the fact that a nolle prosequi was entered, on the motion of the district attorney, because of irregularity in finding the indictment, and the surety is bound for the appearance of the defendant to answer to another indictment returned in lieu of the bad indictment. State v. Brooks (1896) 48 La. Ann. 855, 19 So. 739. In this case the court said: "The question for our decision is whether the surety is bound by recognizance that an accused shall appear to answer to a particular indictment against him, after the district attorney enters a nolle prosequi as to that indictment, and the grand jury brings in another for the same offense? In our view, if the defendant fails to appear to answer to the second indictment, the recognizance is forfeited. The defendant, having been held to bail, is deemed to be in custody of the court (as if imprisoned) to answer for the charge against him. The indictment may be bad, and yet he may be held to answer to the charge as set forth in another indictment. We are of opinion that the district court correctly held that the bond had been forfeited. The provisions of the bond were not only to appear, but also not to depart without leave in matter of the crime charged."

c. Vacation on motion of defendant.

1. In general.

The liability of the bail is terminated where, in accordance with a bond providing that the defendant shall appear at a stated time, and not depart without leave, he appears, and demurs generally to the indictment, in which demurrer the state joins, and the court adjudges that the defendant be dismissed and discharged of the indictment, and that he go thereof without day, although from such judgment the state sues out a writ of error, and the judgment is reversed, and the state adjudged to be restored to all things which, by reason of such judgment, it has lost, and the cause is remanded to the lower court with directions to proceed in the prosecution thereof, and to a trial thereof, in the same manner as if no judgment had taken place, or any writ of error had been prosecuted. State v. Murphy (1839) 10 Gill & J. (Md.) 365.

But the condition in a bond that the principal shall appear before the district court to answer a charge is not fulfilled by his appearing for arraignment, and moving to set aside the indictment, demurring, or pleading thereto, but he must stay until the case is disposed of, and he is discharged by the court. Shriver v. State (1912) 32 Okla. 507, 122 Pac. 160.

And the sureties on a bond conditioned, as required by statute, that the defendant shall appear and answer the charge, are not discharged by the sustaining of a demurrer to the information because of its failure to state some of the statutory elements of the offense, where the court, on sustaining the demurrer, allows the filing of an amended information, but the bail bond attaches to the amended information. State v. Warden (1922) — Wash. —, 205 Pac. 372.

And where the defendant appeared and pleaded "not guilty," but, before a jury had been impaneled, moved to set aside the indictment, and the court sustained the motion, and ordered that the charge against the defendant be submitted to another grand jury, and that the defendant be permitted to stand upon his bail bond, and another indictment was returned against him, but he failed to appear, the liability of the sureties is not discharged by his former appearance and the order of the court permitting him to stand on his bail bond. Brewer v. Com. (1858) 3 Bush (Ky.) 550. The court said: "According to § 160 of the Criminal Code, the liability of the appellants would not have been affected by setting the indictment aside and resubmitting the case to the grand jury, if no order had been made allowing Brewer to stand on his bond. The order, therefore, allowing what the law permitted without it, in the absence of any other order or direction of the court, and which did not impair the rights of the bail to release or indemnify themselves in any of the modes prescribed by law, did not, in our opinion, discharge them from liability."

2. Quashal.

A recognizance is discharged, and becomes functus officio, by the quashing of the indictment to answer which the defendant is bound by the recognizance to appear, and the liability of his sureties is thereby terminated, although no formal entry discharging the bail is entered. McKensie v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 24 Mo. App. 392.

And where the court, upon quashing the information, directs the matter to be again submitted to the committing magistrate, and the prosecuting attorney files another complaint, the sureties are not liable for the failure of defendant to appear to answer such new complaint. State v. McLeod (1918) 31 Idaho, 536, 173 Pac. 496. By the bond in this case the sureties undertook that the defendant would appear and answer the charge mentioned in the bond, and would at all times hold himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, would appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof.

The liability of the sureties is terminated by the quashing of the indictment, and the discharge of the defendant, the bail bond being thereby canceled and becoming inoperative and void; and the filing of an affidavit and information against the defendant on the same charge, during the same term of court, does not rehabilitate and make effective the bond, since the filing of the affidavit and information is the commencement of a new action, requiring the rearrest of the accused. State v. Clerk (1896) 16 Ind. App. 137, 44 N. E. 813.

And a subsequent reversal of the judgment, quashing the indictment upon demurrer and discharging the defendant, does not revive the sureties' liability. State use of Independence County v. Glenn (1883) 40 Ark. 332. In this case the court said: "The test of the continuing obligation of the bail is this: After the entry of the order quashing the indictment and dismissing Watts without day, had his bail the right to rearrest him and surrender him into the custody of the law? For bail hold their principal always in a string, and may at any time exonerate themselves by giving him up. And whatever deprives them of the right to surrender him discharges them. Now it is plain to our minds that, after the final judgment in the circuit court, his sureties had no further control over the person of Watts. And the reversal of that judgment did not revive their right to arrest him, nor, consequently, their obligation to produce him in court."

And in State v. Buis (1912) 86 Kan. 562, 121 Pac. 365, holding the same, where the recognizance provided that the defendant should appear at the next term of the court to answer the charge in the information against him, and abide the judgment of the court, and not depart without leave. the state submitted the question whether the language of the bond did not require the defendant to abide the final judgment after it had been reversed by the appellate court, but the court answered this question in the negative.

But a recognizance to attend from day to day to answer to the charge, and not depart without leave of the court, was held not discharged by the quashing of the indictment, in United States v. White (1837) 5 Cranch, C. C. 368, Fed. Cas. No. 16,678.

And in State v. Hancock (1892) 54 N. J. L. 393, 24 Atl. 726, likewise holding that the liability of the sureties on a bail bond for the appearance of the defendant, and providing that he shall not depart from the court without leave, is not terminated by the quashing of the indictment, the court discussed this point as follows: "In order to understand this argument the circumstances are to be borne in mind. One Bush, being under an indictment for a statutory offense, entered into the recognizance now under consideration, with the defendant, Hancock, as his surety, the same containing a condition 'for the appearance' of the culprit 'to answer said indictment on November 18, 1890, and not to depart the court without leave.' Before the day thus designated this indictment was quashed, and a motion was thereupon made to discharge Bush's bail. That motion was refused. Subsequently, Bush having been again indicted under the same statute in a different form, notice was given to his surety to produce him before the court on a given day, and, default being made at the time specified, the recognizance was duly forfeited of record. From this brief summary of the facts it will be observed that the position now taken in behalf of this defendant is that one of the express stipulations of the obligation entered into by him should be held by the court to be of no binding force whatever. He stipulated that Bush should 'not depart the court without leave.' That stipulation has been broken, and it is now asserted that such breach is nugatory, inasmuch as the stipulation itself has no legal efficacy. That a stipulation of this kind was valid and obligatory at common law is not to be doubted. . . . But there is another aspect of it which has laid the ground for the principal argument in behalf of the defense. It is argued that our statute relating to recognizances has annulled the condition usually contained in them, to the effect that the culprit shall not depart the court without leave. The statutory language thus relied on is this: "That every recognizance entered into, before any court having criminal jurisdiction in this state, shall remain in full force and effect until the cause in which said recognizance shall be entered into shall be finally determined or the same discharged by the order of the court." In the application of this statute to the case before the court, it was insisted by the counsel of the defendant that, the present recognizance having been given in a proceeding under the indictment in question, when that indictment was quashed there was within the purview of the act a final determination of the cause to which the recognizance related. It was argued that the only cause pending before the court was the indictment, and that to annul it was to annul, and consequently to determine, such cause. It will be observed that in this course of reasoning it is assumed that the indictment is synonymous with 'the cause,' but this is not to be admitted. The indictment is not 'the cause;' the accusation of criminality is the cause, and the indictment is an incident in pursuing the accusation. It is true that the term 'cause' sometimes expresses a suit or action, but it has a broader signification which comprises the prosecution of a purpose or object, and it seems to me that the word 'cause,' in this act, is used in the sense expressed by the word 'prosecution.' Taken in this signification, the cause cannot be said to be finally determined when the indictment is quashed, for the indictment is but a formal part of the prosecution. All rational intendment is adverse to the narrower and special meaning of the word 'cause,' as employed in the statute, for it is hardly conceivable that it was the legislative purpose to absolve a criminal who was under bail from all obligation to render himself in court in the event of the existence of a flaw in the indictment. In that way criminals of the highest grade and of the most dangerous character would often escape the pursuit of justice. In my opinion, the quashing of this indictment did not finally determine the cause—that is, the prosecution of this culprit."

The liability of the sureties is not terminated by the quashing of the indictment upon a general demurrer where, by the order of the court, the case is again referred to the grand jury and the defendant released upon the bail bond already given, but the sureties are liable for the appearance of their principal, upon his subsequent indictment for an offense of a higher grade, which includes the offense described in the bail bond, or which grows out of the same act or transaction. Hortsell v. State (1885) 45 Ark. 59. In this case the defendant was indicted for disturbing the peace and for an assault and battery, in the first indictment, and for an aggravated assault in the second indictment, and the court said: "The appellants urged that they did not undertake by their bond to answer for the appearance of their principal upon the charge of aggravated assault. Their bond was in the common statutory form. It was conditioned that Thompson should appear and answer the charge of disturbing the peace, and that he should at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court in the prosecution of the charge. One of the contingencies provided for by the statute when the bond was executed was an order quashing the indictment and holding the defendant to answer another charge, and it is also provided that, in case such order is made when the accused is on bail, his sureties shall answer for his re-appearance. Mansfield's Rev. Stat. 2158, 2169. These provisions were a part of the appellants' obligation. White v. Prigmore (1874) 29 Ark. 208. The precautionary clause that the defendant shall render himself amenable to the orders of the court was inserted to guard such a contingency."

d. Destruction.

Liability of the sureties is not terminated by the loss or destruction of the indictment, as, for example, by the burning of the courthouse, and if a new indictment is found against the defendant for the same offense, they are bound for his appearance to answer such new indictment, since they, in legal effect, undertook that the defendant should appear from day to day and from term to term, until legally discharged, the bond being conditioned that he appear from day to day and from term to term, and render himself, at all times, amenable to the orders and process of the court in the prosecution of the charge. Price v. State (1883) 42 Ark. 178.

And in People v. Dennis (1857) 4 Mich. 609, 69 Am. Dec. 338, where, prior to the term of the court at which the defendant was to appear, the indictment against him was similarly destroyed by the burning of the office of the clerk of the court in which it was on file, it was held that such destruction of the indictment was no defense to an action on a recognizance conditioned that he should appear at a specified term of the court to answer the indictment, and then to abide the order of the court, upon the ground that, until discharged by the order of the court, he must appear to answer to any other indictment that might be found against him for the offense.

VI. Appearance at time named.

The appearance of the defendant before the court at the time specified in the bail bond for him to appear to answer the charge against him does not, generally, as shown by the cases under this heading, terminate the liability of his sureties. It will be observed that this is also held as assumed in cases cited under other headings, which deal with the effect of steps or events subsequent to appearance.

There can be no question but that the liability of the sureties is not terminated before the appearance of the defendant, and that the recognizance may be forfeited for the defendant's failure to appear for trial. United States v. Fidelity & C. Co. (1919) 169 C. C. A. 460, 258 Fed. 444.

The surety in a recognizance providing that the defendant shall appear and answer what shall be objected against him is not discharged by the defendant appearing, and being ready to answer, and the defendant is not at liberty to depart after making his appearance in court, but he must remain until duly discharged. People v. Stager (1833) 10 Wend. (N. Y.) 431.

The obligation of a recognizance is not fully discharged by the appearance of the defendant at the time named, where a further condition of the bond requires him to abide the judgment of the court; and when, therefore, the defendant fails to respond to an order of the court requiring him to enter into a new recognizance for his appearance before another justice of the peace, his sureties are liable. Fowler v. State (1883) 91 Ind. 507.

The liability of the surety on a bail bond conditioned that the accused will appear on a specified date, and will, at all times, render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, does not terminate with his appearance on the day named, and the surety is liable if the accused fails to deliver himself into custody, upon the order of the court, on the following day. Lawrence v. Com. (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 455, 76 S. W. 10.

The sureties, by producing the defendant in court at the time the trial is ordered to proceed, are not discharged from liability upon a bail bond containing, among other conditions, the condition that the defendant shall not depart from the court without leave, and they are liable, where the defendant appeared with his counsel on the day of the trial, but, before the trial commenced, left the court without leave. People v. Petry (1858) 2 Hilt. (N. Y.) 523.

But where the defendant appears on the day named in the bond, and pleads to an indictment for a felony, and is thereupon put upon trial, and, by order of the court, is placed in the custody of the sheriff during the progress of the trial, but, after the jury have retired and are considering their verdict, escapes, and fails to appear for judgment upon the verdict, his sureties are not liable for his escape. Com. v. Coleman (1859) 2 Met. (Ky.) 382. The court said, however, that the mere appearance of the defendant in discharge of his recognizance, without an order of the court placing him in the custody of the sheriff, would not terminate the liability of the sureties. In explaining the reasons for its holding in this case, the court said: "Section 77 of the Criminal Code provides that the bail bond shall contain substantially the following covenants: (1) That the party in custody and about to be admitted to bail 'shall appear in the ——— court, on the ——— day of its ——— term, to answer the charge against him;' (2) that he shall, at all times, render himself amenable to the orders and process of said court; and (3) if convicted, shall render himself in execution thereof. Now it must be borne in mind that this form was provided for all cases in which a party charged with a public offense can be held to bail—for misdemeanors of the lowest, as well as felonies of the highest, bailable grade. It must be remembered, also, that the Criminal Code (§ 69) provides that, 'during the trial of an indictment for felony, the defendant shall be kept in custody; but, for misdemeanors, may remain on bail during trial.' The propriety, as well as necessity, of the undertakings of the bail that the party accused shall not only appear, but render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, surrender himself in execution of the judgment, in cases of mere misdemeanor, is obvious. In such cases, after appearance, he is, or may be allowed, to stand upon his bail, and, without the stipulations referred to, might escape with impunity and without subjecting his bail to any responsibility whatever. With the stipulations, however, their liability continues until the case is disposed of and the defendant surrenders himself in execution of the judgment; and, though not in custody of the court, he is subject to their control, and may be at any moment, by them, or their order, arrested and surrendered to the court. Being thus answerable for him, they have the power to control his movements, and it is their duty to see that he complies with the undertakings of his bond. Suppose, however, that on a trial for misdemeanor the court should, as it may do, refuse to allow the accused to stand on his bail, and, by an order to that effect, place him in the keeping of the sheriff or jailer, and whilst thus in his custody, and necessarily beyond the control of the bail, he should escape—would it be insisted that the bail should be held liable? This, however, was an indictment for felony, and upon the trial, in such cases, the law requires that the defendant shall be kept in actual custody. The circuit court, in discharge of its duty, made an order placing the prisoner in the actual custody of the sheriff, and whilst thus in the sheriff's keeping, and before the return of the verdict, he escaped. Can it, with propriety, be contended that the bail should answer for him, after he is taken by law from their control? We think not. When the court took charge of the accused and placed him in the custody of its own officer, the power of the bail over him ceased. They had no longer any control over him, and, having been deprived thereof by the act of the court, they were no longer answerable for his appearance for any purpose whatever. Such has been the law for time immemorial (Bacon, Abr. title "Bail"), and we cannot believe that the authors of the Criminal Code intended to change it. The case of Com. v. Ray (MS. opinion, June, 1859) differs materially from this. In that case there was simply an appearance of the defendant in discharge of his recognizance, and no order taking or placing him in custody of the officer of the court. He was still under the control of his sureties, and they were, therefore, liable for his not remaining until disposed of by the court. The fact that he appeared in discharge of his recognizance, without an order of court taking charge and control of him, did not relieve them."

But it was held in Askins v. Com. (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 275, contrary to the dictum in the preceding case, that the appearance of the defendant to answer an indictment for felony terminated the liability of his sureties, although there was no order of the court placing him in the custody of the sheriff, upon his being put upon trial, and that, if he escaped during the progress of the trial, his bail were not liable. The court said: "Is Askins liable for the escape? In the case of Com. v. Coleman it was said, upon the authority of a manuscript opinion (Com. v. Ray) therein cited, that the fact that the defendant in a felony case appears in discharge of the recognizance, without an order of court taking charge and control of him, does not relieve the bail. 2 Met. (Ky.) 386. But that is a dictum, and, in our opinion, is not supported by the decision in the case of Com. v. Ray. In that case there was no trial of the defendant at the appearance term, and, in the absence of an order taking him from the custody of the bail, the bail remained bound that he should again appear and answer the indictment. There was no evidence or reason for a presumption that such an order had been made. But, in the case under consideration, Farris, after appearing, was put upon trial. The Criminal Code declares that, 'during the trial of an indictment for felony, the defendant shall be kept in actual custody; but for misdemeanor, may remain on bail during trial' § 69. Any attempt by Askins to control the prisoner during the trial would have been illegal. It was the duty of the officers of the court to keep him in their custody. If an order of court was necessary for that purpose, as it was the duty of the court to make the order, we must presume that it was made in the absence of a bill of exceptions showing the contrary. Our opinion, therefore, is that the appearance of Farris, and putting him upon trial, discharged the bail. For obvious reasons, a different rule would apply to misdemeanor cases."

20 A.L.R.—39.

VII. Failure to hold term at which defendant bound to appear.

Liability of bail is not terminated by the failure of the court, for any reason, to hold the term at which the accused is required by the bond or recognizance to appear.

Thus, sureties on a bond for the appearance of the defendant at the next term of court, and providing that he shall not depart without leave, are not discharged from liability by the failure of the court to hold such term by reason of the illness of the judge, and the defendant is required to appear at the next term to which the court is adjourned, and his failure to appear at a subsequently held special term renders his sureties liable. State v. Horton (1898) 123 N. C. 695, 31 S. E. 218. This case was based upon statutory provisions which, by operation of law, carried all matters over to the next regular term, and which also applied to special terms.

And it was held in Gentry v. State (1861) 22 Ark. 544, that a recognizance, likewise conditioned, binds the defendant, where, for the same reason, the term named therein was not held, to appear at each succeeding term thereafter, until acquitted, or otherwise legally discharged, or, if found guilty, until sentence is passed on him, if not permitted to depart sooner by leave of the court, and that the liability of his sureties does not terminate until such time.

And in State v. Brown (1864) 16 Iowa, 314, holding that the liability of the sureties is not terminated by the failure to hold the term of the court at which the defendant is required to appear, the court said: "At common law the conditions of a recognizance of bail were that the accused should appear at the place of trial, and answer the charge against him. 1 Chitty, Crim. Law, 108. The apparent conflict of authority cited by the respective counsel in this case grows out of the fact that each state has, by statute, provided the conditions of the recognizance of bail; and the cases cited simply define the extent of the obligation under the particular statute or practice involved. The conflict is, therefore, only seeming, not real. Under our statute (Rev. § 4968) the conditions of the bond are not only that the accused shall appear at the place of trial, and answer the charge against him, but also that he shall abide the orders and judgment of the court, and not depart without leave. The bond in this case follows the statute. A man's bail are the jailers of his own choosing, and they are bound to have him as much in the power of the court as he would be if in custody of the proper officer. If the trial of the accused is continued until the next term, it is the duty of the bail to have him at the place of trial at that time, without any order of the court therefor. . . . Under our statute the undertaking of bail is a continuing one, from which the obligors may be discharged by the surrender of the accused, as provided by statute, or by obtaining leave of court for the accused to depart."

Where the court fails to sit at the term at which the defendant is bound to appear, the bail bond continues to be operative and binding on the sureties for the appearance of the defendant at the succeeding term of the court. Com. v. Branch (1866) 1 Bush (Ky.) 59.

The liability of the sureties is not terminated by the failure of the court to hold the term at which the defendant is bound to appear, where the recognizance is continued by virtue of a statute providing that if from any cause the court shall not sit at any term, or shall not sit until all of the business of the term shall be disposed of and determined, all matters and causes pending in the court and undetermined shall stand continued until the next succeeding term. Norfolk v. People (1867) 43 Ill. 9.

And in Bartling v. State (1903) 67 Neb. 637, 93 N. W. 1047, affirmed on rehearing in (1903) 67 Neb. 643, 97 N. W. 443, where the failure to hold the term, and its adjournment to a future date, were due to the prevalence of smallpox in the county, the liability of the sureties was held to be extended to the time to which such term was adjourned, under a statute providing that no recognizance shall be rendered invalid by reason of there being a failure of the term, and, in case of an adjournment, persons recognized or bound to appear at the regular term which has failed shall be held bound, in like manner, to appear at the time so fixed, and their sureties shall be liable, in case of their nonappearance, in the same manner as though the term had been held at the regular time, and they had failed to make their appearance thereat.

A recognizance, though for the appearance of the defendant in a district court on a day certain, and not for his appearance from day to day or term to term, continues in force, where on such day there is a vacancy in the office of district judge for the district, until the first day of the next term after the filling of the vacancy, by virtue of the statutory provision that, "when the office of judge of any district court is vacant, all process, pleadings, and proceedings pending before such court shall be continued of course until the next stated term after the appointment and qualification of his successor," and the failure of the defendant to appear on such day is ground for the forfeiture of the recognizance. United States v. Murphy (1897) 82 Fed. 893.

VIII. Appearance from term to term.

The bail continues liable for the appearance of the accused from term to term, when the bond or recognizance requires such appearance, and they, generally, though there is authority to the contrary, continue so liable, in the absence of such requirement, where the bond or recognizance provides that the accused shall abide the orders of the court, and not depart without leave, or the case is continued, or the accused directed to appear subsequently by order of the court.

Thus, a recognizance binding the defendant to appear on the first day of each and every term of the court in which the cause is pending, and to which the cause may be continued, and not depart thence without leave of court, is not discharged by an appearance at the first term thereafter. State v. Ritter (1877) 3 Mo. App. 562.

And a bail bond requiring the defendant to appear before the court "instantly and from time to time thereafter to which the case may be continued" binds his sureties for his attendance from term to term, and, in the absence of an order of the court continuing the case, the continuance is by operation of law, and a judgment forfeiting the bond may be entered upon the defendant's nonappearance at any time when called until discharged. United States v. Fletcher (1922) 279 Fed. 160.

And a recognizance for the appearance of the defendant at the next term, and to abide the order of the court, and not depart therefrom without leave, requires him to appear from day to day during the term, and from term to term, and from day to day of each term, until the final sentence or order of the court, and the liability of the sureties continues during such time. Gallagher v. People (1878) 88 Ill. 339.

The sureties in a recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at the next term of court and answer all matters that shall be objected against him, and abide the order of the court, and not depart without leave, are not discharged by the appearance of the defendant at the next term of the court after the recognizance was taken, but the defendant is bound to appear before the court at all times, until discharged. Gildersleeve v. People (1850) 10 Barb. (N. Y.) 35.

And it was held in Stokes v. People (1872) 63 Ill. 489, that the power to take a forfeiture of a recognizance was not limited to the term at which the accused had been recognized to appear, but that a forfeiture could be taken at the next or any succeeding term.

A continuance of the case continues the liability of the principal and sureties on the recognizance, and the rule is the same where the case stands continued by mere operation of law. State v. Merrihew (1877) 47 Iowa, 112, 29 Am. Rep. 464.

And the surety in a recognizance for the appearance of the defendant at a particular term will be liable, though no proceedings were had against the defendant at such term, where an order was made at that term continuing all cases not disposed of, and at the succeeding term the defendant failed to appear. State v. Plazencia (1844) 6 Rob. (La.) 417.

And such a recognizance binds the sureties therein for the accused's appearance at the succeeding term, although no action is taken or order made in the case at the term specified in the bond. State v. Ryan (1867) 23 Iowa, 406.

A recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at a given term, and abide the order of the court, requires his appearance from time to time, and from term to term, so long as the proceeding in which he was charged is continued. Gallagher v. People (1879) 91 Ill. 591.

The sureties in a recognizance binding the defendant to appear at the next term, and not to depart without leave, are not relieved from liability by the appearance of the defendant at such term and the continuance of the case, and, where the defendant fails to appear at the subsequent term to which the case is continued, the sureties are liable. State v. Smith (1872) 66 N. C. 622.

And a bail bond similarly conditioned, is forfeited, where the case, on motion of the state, is continued, and the defendant fails to appear at the next term, since by such bond the defendant is bound to appear not only at the term mentioned in the bond, but at each succeeding term thereafter until acquitted or otherwise legally discharged, or, if found guilty, until sentence is passed on him, if not permitted to depart sooner by leave of the court. Moore v. State (1873) 28 Ark. 480.

And the sureties in a bond conditioned that the accused shall appear at the next term of the court, and not depart without leave until discharged by due course of law, are not discharged by the continuance of the case to the next term following that at which the accused is bound by the bond to appear, since the condition of the bond requires the accused to appear from day to day, or from term to term, until discharged. People v. Hanaw (1895) 106 Mich. 421, 64 N. W. 328.

The liability of the sureties on a recognizance requiring the defendant to appear on a certain day before a city police justice, and not to depart without leave, is not terminated by the appearance of defendant on such day, but the recognizance requires him to remain subject to the order of the court until his trial takes place, or he is otherwise finally discharged, and where the hearing on the appearance day is continued to a later date, and the defendant fails to appear on such date, the sureties are liable. St. Louis v. Young (1911) 235 Mo. 44, 138 S. W. 5. The court held that the giving of this meaning to such a recognizance was required by a reasonable construction of the provision of the statute that "judgment for forfeiture shall not be prevented on account of any omission of recital or condition, so that it appears from the whole record or proceeding that the defendant was legally in custody, charged with a criminal offense, that he was discharged therefrom by reason of the giving of the recognizance, and that it can be ascertained from the recognizance that the surety undertook that the defendant should appear before a court or magistrate at a term or time specified for trial." The court distinguished the case of State v. Mackey (1874) 55 Mo. 51, set out infra, in this subdivision, upon the ground that it was passed before the enactment of this statute.

A recognizance conditioned that defendant shall appear at a named term, and do what shall be enjoined by the court, and not depart without leave, may be extended to any subsequent term of the court by a continuance of the cause to such term, and if the defendant fails to appear at such subsequent term, his sureties are liable. Knight v. State (1912) 35 Okla. 375, 1. 1.1916F, 261, 130 Pac. 282.

And where, on the appearance of the defendant at the term named in such a bond, the cause is continued by order of the court until the succeeding term, the liability of the sureties continues until such time, and the failure of the defendant then to appear renders the sureties liable. Wal-dron v. Harrison (1863) 2 Or. 87.

The sureties in a bond conditioned that the defendant shall appear and answer the charge against him, and at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof, are not relieved from liability until the defendant appears, and is discharged, or serves under the judgment of the court, and where he appears, and the case is adjourned, but he fails to appear on the adjourned date, the sureties are liable. St. Lawrence County v. Goldberg (1916) 175 App. Div. 88, 35 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 297, 161 N. Y. Supp. 641.

And a recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at a named term to answer a charge of assault and battery, and do what shall be enjoined by the court, and not depart therefrom without leave, continues in force without any special order until the following term, where an indictment is returned at the previous term, and the recognizers are bound to produce their principal at the later term, and they are not relieved from liability by the omission to call out the recognizance at the earlier term. Ellison v. State (1845) 8 Ala. 273.

But the condition in a recognizance which binds the principal to appear at a particular term of the court, and does not contain the further condition, commonly incorporated in such a bond, that he appear from term to term to abide the judgment of the court, and not depart without leave, does not extend his appearance from term to term, so as to make the sureties liable for the failure of the defendant to appear at a term, to which the case is continued, subsequent to that named in the bond. Colquitt v. Smith (1880) 65 Ga. 341.

And although a recognizance binds the defendant to appear before a justice of the peace on a named day, and from day to day thereafter until discharged by order of the court, the liability of the sureties terminates with the appearance of the accused on the day named, and his failure to appear on a subsequent day to which the case is adjourned does not constitute a ground for the forfeiture of the recognizance, where the justice is, by statute, only given authority to enter the accused's default upon his nonappearance at the time named in the recognizance. Ogden v. People (1871) 62 Ill. 63.

It was held in Goodwin v. Governor (1832) 1 Stew. & P. (Ala.) 465, that the liability of the sureties on a recognizance to keep the peace, requiring the defendant to appear at a certain term, terminates with such term, where the state fails to proceed at such term, and no indictment was found or continuance had at such term, and a forfeiture cannot be taken on the recognizance at a subsequent term. The court, on this point, said: "The uniform practice is, if the prosecutor appears, and on oath makes a satisfactory showing that his reasonable fears still continue, the defendant is rebound. But if the prosecutor fail to appear, or, appearing, fail to satisfy the court that there is good reason to continue the defendant under recognizance, he is discharged. In this case, it does not appear that the prosecutor appeared at the first term, or that the defendant was ever called. But at the second term after the date of the recognizance, the security is called upon to bring in the defendant, and failing to do so, a forfeiture is rendered against him. This is clearly error, as there did not then appear to be any proceeding against him." It appeared, however, from this case, that if an indictment had been found at the first term, and the case had been regularly continued, the recognizance would have continued in force until the next term, the court saying on this point: "My own opinion is that, had this been a recognizance to answer the state upon some charge exhibited against the defendant, and an indictment or presentment had been found at the first term, and the case had been regularly continued by either the state or defendant, and a forfeiture taken at a term subsequent to the one at which the cause had been so regularly continued, the proceedings would have been regular, although the recognizance did not, in terms, require the defendant to appear from term to term, but only at the first term. The obligation to appear and answer would continue in all its force, while the prosecution was regularly going on, and it would be unnecessary for the recognizance to be renewed to secure this object."

The liability of the sureties on a recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at the next term, and abide the judgment of the court, terminates upon the adjournment of the court at the end of such term without any proceeding being taken in the case. State v. Becker (1891) 80 Wis. 313, 50 N. W. 178.

A recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear on the first day of the next term, naming it, and not depart without leave, is not a continuing bond, and the defendant is only required to be in attendance at such term until the end thereof, unless sooner charged, and after the end of such term no liability exists against his sureties, the court saying: "Where the recognizance is conditioned for the appearance of the accused at the next term, and contains nothing about succeeding sessions, the surety is entitled to be discharged at the end of the term." Lane v. State (1897) 6 Kan. App. 106, 50 Pac. 905.

And the same was held in Com. v. Somers (1893) 14 Pa. Co. Ct. 159, 3 Lack. Jur. 185; Keefhaver v. Com.

(1830) 2 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 240, and State v. Dorr (1906) 59 W. Va. 188, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 402, 115 Am. St. Rep. 915, 53 S. E. 120, 8 Ann. Cas. 1016.

A recognizance for the appearance of the defendant before a justice of the peace on a named day, and providing that he shall not depart without leave of the justice, is discharged, where the defendant appears on such day, and the case is postponed without any steps being taken to secure his appearance on the day to which the case is postponed, and his sureties are not liable for his failure to appear on such later day, since it is provided by statute that the justice, on postponing a case, shall require the defendant to renew a recognizance, conditioned that he will appear at the time appointed, and that if the defendant fails or refuses to enter into such a recognizance the justice shall commit him to jail until the day fixed for the trial. Allen v. Cape Brewery & Ice Co. (1906) 196 Mo. 435, 95 S. W. 417.

And where the defendant, in accordance with the requirement of his bail bond that he appear on the first day of the next term, and not depart from the court without leave thereof, appeared at such term, and remained in court the whole term, ready to obey the order of the court until the term is adjourned, and no measures are taken by the court to convict him, or otherwise secure his appearance at any subsequent term of the court, the bond is discharged upon the adjournment of such term of the court, and is of no further effect, and cannot be forfeited by the failure of the defendant to appear at some subsequent term of the court. State v. Mackey (1874) 55 Mo. 51.

A recognizance conditioned to be void, if the defendant shall appear on the first day of the next term to answer the indictment, not departing without leave of court, does not bind the sureties for the appearance of the defendant after the term specified. Ramey v. Com. (1885) 6 Ky. L. Rep. 524 (abstract).

A recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at the next term, and abide the judgment of the court, and not depart without leave, binds the sureties for the appearance of the defendant during the first term only, and if the court adjourns without making any order, the surety is released from liability. Swank v. State (1854) 3 Ohio St. 429.

And a recognizance, so conditioned, does not bind the accused to appear from term to term, but the conditions of the bond are fulfilled by his appearance at the first term of the court next after the execution of the bond, and by his standing ready to answer to any call of his case which may be made by the court at such term; and the sureties are not liable if he fails to appear at a subsequent term. Hesselgrave v. State (1902) 63 Neb. 807, 89 N. W. 295.

And in People v. Hainer (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 454, holding the same, it was stated that the court might, at the term at which the defendant was bound to appear, make an order requiring him to appear at a future day, and, if the court did so, the sureties would be liable for the failure of the defendant to appear at such future day, by reason of the condition of the recognizance that the defendant should obey the order and direction of the court.

And in United States v. Backland (1887) 33 Fed. 156, an application to the Federal circuit court in South Carolina to discharge a surety, where the condition of the recognizance was that the defendant should appear at the next circuit court, to answer, etc., and to do and receive what should be enjoined by the court, and not to depart the court without license, and the defendant appeared, but the court took no action whatever with regard to the case, and the surety was discharged because an agreement was made, without his consent, between the commissioner and the defendant, that the case should not be sent up until the following term, the court said: "In Swank v. State (Ohio) supra, it is held that when a defendant is bound over for trial, and appears at the trial term, although the cause be continued on his motion, the surety on his recognizance is discharged, and a new bond should be taken. Keefhaver v. Com. (1830) 2 Penr. & W. (Pa.) 241, is quoted, and sustains the position. 1 Bishop, Crim. Proc. 264g, states the same doctrine as supported by abundant authority. But he says that the rule varies in the different states. In South Carolina this is not the practice. State v. Haskett (1836) 22 S. C. L. (Riley) 97. At the end of the term certain general orders are passed, and, among these, one providing 'that all recognizances which have not been specially discharged be continued over to the next regular term.' This is also the practice of the courts of the United States in this district. Had this been done here, there would be little question. The practice seems to be justified by the terms of the recognizance, 'to do and receive what shall be enjoined by the court.' It was not done."

A bail bond providing that the accused shall appear in a certain court now in session, on a specified date, binds the accused to appear in such court on such day during the term "now in session," and not to the term of such court that will convene in the month named of the next year. Sampson v. Harris (1917) 147 Ga. 426, 94 S. E. 558.

And the condition of a recognizance that the defendant shall appear at the next regular term and at any subsequent term of the court does not bind the sureties for his appearance at a term, years later, to which the case has been postponed to await the final determination of another case. Reese v. United States (1869) 9 Wall. (U. S.) 13, 19 L. ed. 541. In this case the court said: "The provision for his appearance at any subsequent term had reference to such subsequent term as might follow in regular succession in the course of business of the court. It was inserted to obviate the necessity of renewing the bail every time the cases were, from any cause, continued from one term to another. It was not intended to apply to any distant future term to which either party might be disposed to postpone the trials, without reference to any intervening term. The principal and sureties by their recognizance covenanted with the United States that the principal should appear before the court and answer all such matters as might be objected against him at the next term, and from term to term, until the cases were disposed of; not that he should appear at the next term, and then at a term years later, depending for its designation upon the happening of a contingent event."

IX. Plea to indictment.

The liability of bail is not terminated by the appearance of the defendant, and his entry of a plea to the information or indictment against him.

Thus, the liability of the sureties in a recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear on a certain day, and not depart without leave of the court, is not terminated by the defendant's appearing on the day named and pleading not guilty, and they are liable where the case is partly tried on such day, and adjourned to the next day, and the defendant fails to appear on the latter day. Allen v. Com. (1893) 90 Va. 356, 18 S. E. 437.

Nor is the liability of the sureties on a bond, conditioned that the defendant shall appear at the next term of court, and at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof, terminated by the appearance of the defendant, and the entry of a plea of not guilty; but where the case is continued to a succeeding term, and the defendant fails to appear at such term, the sureties are liable. State v. Green (1895) 6 S. D. 537, 62 N. W. 135.

And the appearance of the defendant, and his plea of not guilty, were held, in State v. Tambara (1916) 140 La. 412, 73 So. 250, not to release the surety on his bail bond, because of certain statutory provisions. The court set out the statutory provisions applicable, and discussed this point as follows: "Relator's counsel in the brief argue that defendant's said appearance and plea of not guilty to the information satisfied the appearance bond. Such a construction is not admissible, because it would nullify the force and effect of appearance bonds given pursuant to Rev. Stat. § 1010. Rev. Stat. § 1032, relative to the forfeiture of bonds in criminal cases, provides for the call of the accused and his surety. Rev. Stat. § 1033, reads, in part, as follows: 'The appearance and answer of any defendant or party accused, upon call made as provided for in the preceding section, shall not operate as a discharge or release of any surety from his responsibility and no such surety shall be discharged or released from his responsibility until the final trial and conviction or acquittal of such defendant or party accused.' The bond given in this case was conditioned for the personal appearance of the defendant in the district court from day to day, and from term to term, to answer the charge, and not to depart the court without leave first had been obtained. This condition was violated by the nonappearance of the defendant on the day fixed for his trial."

The liability of sureties on a recognizance binding defendant to appear and answer, to stand and abide the judgment of the court, and not to depart without leave, is not terminated by the defendant appearing and pleading guilty, and his sureties are liable, where the defendant, before sentence—which the court does not impose on the day of the plea, but allows to remain undisposed of for a few days—is pronounced, departs from the court without leave. State v. White (1913) 164 N. C. 408, 79 S. E. 297.

And under a recognizance providing that the defendant shall abide the order and sentence of the court, and not depart without leave, the sureties are liable where the defendant appears and pleads guilty, but, when called for sentence, fails to appear. Com. v. Teevens (1887) 143 Mass. 210, 58 Am. Rep. 131, 9 N. E. 524.

But the sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that the defendant shall appear to answer and defend the information, and not depart the court without leave, are discharged by his appearance and entry of a plea of guilty, and if thereafter his sentence is postponed to a certain day, and he fails to appear on such day, the sureties are not liable. State v. Charles (1907) 207 Mo. 40, 105 S. W. 609, 13 Ann. Cas. 565. In this case the court said: "The conditions of the bond in the case at bar required the principal to appear in court, 'to answer and defend the information.' Now, while it must be conceded that the mere appearance in court would not fully meet the conditions of the bond, yet if when the case is called and he is arraigned upon the information and enters his plea of guilty, or if he enters a plea of not guilty, and upon the trial the jury returns a verdict of guilty, in our opinion, he has fully satisfied the conditions of his bond 'to answer and defend the information.' Under the conditions of the bond he cannot absent himself during the progress of the trial or before he has entered his plea of guilty, for it is by the entry of his plea of guilty to the offense charged in the information, or return of a verdict of guilty by a jury upon trial, that places him directly within the power of the court. When, as in the case at bar, the principal, in obedience to the requirements of his bond, appears before the bar of justice and says to the court, upon the call of his case for hearing, 'Here I am; I waive formal arraignment and enter a plea of guilty; do with me as the law directs,' this was, as was said by Hawkins, in his 'Pleas of the Crown,' as completely and effectually putting himself under the power of the court as if he had been in the custody of the proper officer, and the power and duty of the court to exercise such power in dealing with a principal who had submitted himself to the control of the court began at that time, and if this court in State v. Murmann (1894) 124 Mo. 502, 28 S. W. 2, announced the correct rule, that it was the duty of the court upon the return of the verdict of guilty to order the defendant into the custody of the sheriff, it must logically follow that the power and duty of the court to exercise that power began upon the return of the verdict of guilty, or, in the case at bar, upon the entering of a plea of guilty, and the powers and duties of the sureties in respect to such principal ceased. In our opinion the appearance of the principal before the court, entering his plea of guilty to the offense charged in the information, thereby putting himself under the power and control of the court, substantially met and satisfied the conditions of the bond which required him to 'appear and answer the information.' At least, we are unwilling to take the advanced step, and announce the rule that the risk of the sureties should be increased by holding that the term 'answer and defend an information' shall be interpreted to mean, not only answering the information, but as well to render obedience to the judgment and sentence of the court which may be rendered in the cause. As to the recital in the recognizance, 'not depart the court without leave,' it is sufficient to say that in our opinion it has no application to the main proposition involved."

X. Failure to try defendant.

Failure to try the defendant at the term at which he demands trial, or at the next succeeding term (the necessary statutory requisites appearing), operates as a complete discharge and acquittal, whether an order discharging him be granted or not, unless the demand has been waived by some acts of the defendant, and such discharge and acquittal terminate the liability of the sureties. Collins v. Smith (1910) 7 Ga. App. 653, 67 S. E. 847. In this case the court said: "The only question that can arise is whether, although the effect of the state's failure to try the accused was equivalent to an acquittal so far as the criminal charge was concerned, such right of discharge on his part would relieve the surety upon his bond, in the absence of an order formally discharging and acquitting the accused. We are of the opinion that when the state failed to try the defendant, and the term of the court at which he should have been tried was adjourned, he was as completely discharged as he would have been by a verdict of acquittal at the hands of the jury, or (so far as the bond is concerned) as if he had been surrendered by his surety in the event of his conviction. . . . Nor was it necessary to his acquittal that any formal order of discharge or acquittal should have been entered by the court. The formal entry of discharge upon demand can be made at any time, nunc pro tunc, and should be made whenever justice requires it. This being true, the criminal recognizance becomes functus officio, and the surety is released."

The entire report of the case of Brock v. Slaton (1916) 18 Ga. App. 175, 89 S. E. 156, is contained in the following syllabi by the court: "After an indictment by a grand jury has been returned to a superior court, and the case so originating has, by order of that court, been legally transferred to a county court having jurisdiction to try the defendant for the offense charged, the case is no longer pending in the superior court, but in the county court to which it had been so transferred.

"Where in such a case the defendant made a demand for trial, which was entered on the minutes of the superior court prior to the transfer of the indictment, and he was present at the first term of the county court thereafter, held more than ten days after the transfer, and was not then put upon trial, he was entitled to his discharge at a subsequent term of the county court, notwithstanding the fact that, by reason of the failure of officers of the county court to serve the defendant with notice of the transfer, the county court was without authority, under the provisions of § 752 of the Penal Code of 1895 (6 Park's Anno. Penal Code, § 790 (s)), to force the accused to trial at the first term subsequent to the transfer of the indictment. . . .

"The defendant's plea setting up these facts was good and sufficient in a proceeding to forfeit the bond for his appearance to answer for the crime charged in the indictment."

XI. Commencement of trial.

The liability of the sureties on a bail bond or recognizance does not terminate with the commencement of the trial of their principal, except where it is so provided by statute.

Thus, the liability of the sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that the accused shall appear from term to term, and from day to day, until discharged by due course of law, is not terminated by his appearing and being placed on trial, and they are liable where, during the trial, he makes his escape. Lee v. State (1875) 51 Miss. 665.

And in Hawk v. State (1887) 84 Ala. 466, 4 So. 690, holding a bond for the appearance of the defendant at a specified term, and from day to day and term to term thereafter, until discharged by law, forfeited by his escape during the progress of the trial, the court said: "The question raised for decision by this record is whether the undertaking of bail, which is here in writing, is forfeited by the absconding of the defendant during the progress of the trial, and after his appearance to answer an indictment for felony. Or, to state the question differently, whether the defendant, upon the commencement of the trial, is at once placed by operation of law in the custody of the sheriff, without any order of court to that effect, or whether he is to be considered as in the continued custody of his sureties until the coming in of the verdict of the jury. The plain language of the statute would seem to leave no doubt on this point. It declares that the undertaking of bail binds them for the appearance of the defendant, 'until he is discharged by law.' This discharge can take place after the trial is begun, in the absence of a surrender by the sureties, only by an order of discharge based on a nolle prosequi of the indictment, a verdict of acquittal, or a verdict of conviction followed by the sheriff's taking custody of the defendant by the implied or express order of the court, which includes any necessary custody taken to prevent his escape. The obligation, therefore, ordinarily binds the sureties for the continued appearance of the defendant during every stage of the trial, from the time it is entered on, at least, until the rendition of the verdict of the jury."

And the sureties in a recognizance conditioned that the defendant shall appear at the next term of court, and not depart without leave, and abide the order and decision of the court, are not discharged by the defendant appearing to answer the indictment and entering upon his trial, and where, before the trial is finished, the defendant departs from the court without leave, and never returns again, the sureties are liable. People v. McCoy (1862) 39 Barb. (N. Y.) 73. The court in this case said: "It is contended that the condition of the recognizance has been fulfilled. That the prisoner placed himself under the power and control of the court, and in the custody of its officers, by appearing to answer the indictment, and entering upon his trial, and he was thereby surrendered, and the surety became discharged. The condition of the recognizance was not only to appear at the next court of oyer and terminer, to answer to an indictment for burglary and larceny, but also that he should 'not depart without leave of the court,' and that he should 'abide its order and decision.' The prisoner did depart without leave, and did not appear to abide the order and decision of the court, and his recognizance was duly forfeited. . . . It can scarcely be said that he had placed himself entirely in the control of the court because the trial had commenced, when he had not been either surrendered by his bail, or ordered into the custody of the sheriff. He was not called to answer under the recognizance, and was not substantially in the power of the officer or court to whom the appearance was due, within the meaning and intent of the condition. The recognizance does not intend that he shall simply submit to a trial, but that he shall at all times, until surrendered or ordered into custody, submit himself to the jurisdiction or authority of the court. It is intended to hold the prisoner to answer during the whole term of the court, and until the trial is ended. Such is the uniform practice, and it would be extraordinary to compel a prisoner to renew his recognizance at the commencement of his trial, for the remainder of the term. In fact, if this practice should obtain, I see no reason why the same process should not be required at the opening of the court on each day. He is not only bound to appear and answer the indictment, but 'he is not to depart without leave, and is to abide its order and decision.' Can it be said that he fulfils these requirements when he leaves before the trial is ended, and when he is not present to abide the order and decision of the court upon the final termination of the trial? The object of the recognizance has not been answered. The condition has not been performed. The appearance of the prisoner has not been secured, and the surety is liable to pay the penalty."

And a bond for the appearance of the defendant in a justice's court binds him not only to appear on the day named in the bond, but also to remain in attendance at the court until the trial is terminated, or he is discharged by the court, and where the trial is not completed on the date set, and is postponed to a subsequent day, failure to appear on such day renders the sureties liable. State ex rel. Solicitor v. Jenkins (1897) 121 N. C. 637, 28 S. E. 413.

But the liability of the sureties on the bail bond of one charged with a felony was held, in Willis v. Com. (1887) 85 Ky. 68, 2 S. W. 654, to terminate with the commencement of his trial. The bond provided that the defendant should appear to answer the charge, and at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court in the prosecution of such crime. The important question in such case is, when does the trial commence, and the trial was held not to begin until the issue was formed and the jury sworn, to try it. In this case the court said: "It appears that the motion for a continuance at that term was overruled, and the accused required to go into the trial, and ten jurors were selected and accepted by the commonwealth and the accused. But the court adjourned for the day without completing the formation of the trial jury, and the next day the court, on its own motion, discharged the ten jurors and continued the case until the next term, because the officer in whose charge they were placed permitted them to separate, contrary to law and the injunction of the court. Section 229 of the Code provides that during the trial of an indictment for felony the defendant shall be committed to, and remain in, the custody of the proper officer. But by § 183 it is provided that, if the indictment be for a felony, the defendant must be present, and shall remain in actual custody during the trial, unless his bail appear personally in court and consent that he may remain on bail, in which case he shall be placed in actual custody when the case is finally submitted to the jury. After the trial has commenced, the defendant is in custody of the proper officer of the court, and the bail is no longer answerable for his appearance unless, as provided in § 183, they appear personally in court and consent that he remain on bail.

... The decisive inquiry, then, is, When does the trial of an indictment for felony, in the meaning of § 229, begin? It seems to us it cannot, with propriety or accuracy, be said to begin until the issue is formed and the jury sworn to try it. For, as has been held by this court, the defendant cannot be regarded as being in jeopardy of his life or liberty until then. Everything done previously is merely preliminary to the trial."

And in Fossett v. State (1901) 43 Tex. Crim. Rep. 117, 67 S. W. 322, where the principal was indicted for murder, holding that the liability of his bail terminated, by reason of statutory provisions, upon the commencement of his trial, it appeared from the record that the accused was present in court when his case was called for trial, and that he thereupon made a motion for a change of venue, which was denied; that, on the denial of such motion, he presented an application for continuance, which was overruled, that he then demurred to the jurisdiction of the court to try the case, and the court overruled the demurrer, and that, during the argument of the demurrer, the accused escaped, and his recognizance was forfeited. The question as to whether the trial had commenced so as to discharge the sureties was discussed at length by the court, as follows: "It is insisted on the part of the sureties, who are appellants in this case, that the contingency had arrived under our statutes which discharged defendant Fossett from the custody of his bail; and that, the trial having commenced, he was then in the custody of the court or the sheriff. In support of this contention, we are cited to the following articles of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to wit, articles 635, 640, and 641. Said articles read as follows: 'Art. 635. When the defendant in a case of felony is on bail he shall, before the trial commences, be placed in the custody of the sheriff and his bail be considered as discharged.' 'Art. 640. In all cases less than capital the defendant is required, when his case is called for trial, before it proceeds further, to plead by himself or counsel whether or not he is guilty.' 'Art. 641. By the term, "called for trial," is meant the stage of the case when both parties have announced that they are ready, or when a continuance having been applied for has been denied.' We understand that particular stress is laid on the last article as construing the preceding article; and that the facts show the contingency marked out by this latter article, which discharged the sureties, had occurred; that is, that the case had been called for trial, and the state had announced ready, and a continuance, which had been applied for on the part of defendant, had been presented, and had been overruled by the court. While this is literally true in one sense, still there are other articles of our Code of Criminal Procedure which are to be taken into consideration in determining the question as to whether the recognizance had fulfilled its purpose under the law, and is no longer binding on the recognizers. Among others, we refer to articles 303 to 310, inclusive, which define bail and recognizance, and lay down some of the rules applicable thereto; and articles 569, 570, 575-577, and 617, which relate to the plea of not guilty and other pleas and motions of a defendant; and article 476, which relates to the forfeiture of bail. Now it will be observed that bail, as prescribed by our statutes, obligates the sureties that their principal will appear and answer before the proper court the accusation brought against him; and the bail, in this instance, follows, as it should, the terms of the statute. What answer is referred to? Evidently, this is provided for in article 640; that is, in every case the bail requires a defendant to appear and answer before the proper tribunal, whether or not he is guilty. Of course, there are special pleas and answers that he can make, but this is the final answer, and his bail goes with him until he has entered his final plea. True, he is required to be present on other occasions. Indeed, no important step can be taken in his case, if it is a felony, unless he is present; but his bail holds him in custody, and requires him to be present at each stage of the procedure, including and up to the last stage, when he is required to enter his plea of guilty or not guilty. And when articles 635 and 641 say that before the trial commences he shall be placed in custody of the sheriff, and his bail be considered as discharged, and that this stage is reached when both parties have announced ready, or when a continuance, applied for by a defendant, has been overruled, it clearly means that marks the stage of the case when the jury trial is to begin. But it does not mean that defendant can stand by and hear the court announce his continuance overruled, and then dodge out and escape, and thus relieve his bail; but he must, in accordance with the terms of his and their contract, remain until he has entered his plea. This may be, and, under the statute, should be, before the jury is impaneled. See art. 640, Code Crim. Proc. Of course, it does not follow that his bail may not surrender him under other articles of the statute before this juncture; but it implies that there is no interregnum between his bail and his trial—that is, his final plea. The law did not intend to furnish a loophole for his escape before his final answer. This construction is further borne out by reference to those articles of our statute which relate to the hearing of motions. These may be heard and determined at any time before trial upon the plea of not guilty is entered upon, but not afterwards. See art. 577, Code Crim. Proc. Article 591, Code of Criminal Procedure, provides: 'Judgment shall in no case be given against the defendant where his motion, exception, or plea is overruled, but he shall in all cases be allowed to plead not guilty. If he refuses to plead it shall be considered as if the plea were offered and be noted accordingly.' From these articles—indeed, from every provision of the Code—it is evident that all motions of every character must be disposed of, and that these are preliminary to the main trial; and when that stage is reached, and when he is ready to plead to the accusation, he is then placed in custody of the sheriff and his bail discharged, but not before. It appears that, after the court had announced what disposition he would make of the motion for continuance, defendant did not then enter his plea to the indictment, but craved leave to present another motion, which motion, indeed, should have come before the motion for continuance, as it went to the jurisdiction of the court—still it could be offered at any time; and the permission granted by the court to allow the same to be presented was tantamount to holding his ruling on the motion for continuance in abeyance until he had made his ruling on the motion to recuse himself (and he certainly had authority over his own orders during the term). If the court had held that he was not qualified to try the case, this would have been a postponement or continuance of the case until some other judge should be authorized to try it. The motion was not a joinder of issue, but was evidently intended to cut off an announcement of 'ready' at that time. Suppose, when the court announced he would overrule the motion for continuance, he had then ordered defendant to come forward and enter his plea, and had then announced that his bail was released, and the sheriff would take custody of him, and defendant had then stated he was not ready to proceed with the trial; that he had another motion to present. Could the court have refused to hear his motion, or to have discharged his bail pending the preparation and hearing of that motion? Unquestionably, under the terms of the law, he could present such motion, and he was in the custody of his bail pending its preparation, the motion itself being in the nature of a request of the court to hold up his ruling on the motion for continuance, and to forbear pressing him to trial, until such other motion should be disposed of. The court was asked to hear a preliminary motion—a motion set up to avoid a trial altogether; and, until this was disposed of, the case could not be called for trial proper, and, until this could be done, the trial before the jury could not commence. In the meantime his bail, which required him to answer the state's charge, and, in order to do so, to be there when the trial should begin, was operative; and he could no more evade the terms of his recognizance, as was attempted in this case, than he could had he remained present during the reading of his motion for continuance and the overruling by the judge of the same, and then, instead of remaining and pleading to the indictment, have immediately fled from the courtroom and made his escape. We apprehend it will not be seriously contended by appellant that he could have avoided the obligation of his bail in this manner. . . . We accordingly hold that the proper construction of the articles of our Code of Criminal Procedure, bearing on the question as to when the bail of the prisoner terminates and the custody of the court or the sheriff begins, is when such defendant appears in court and enters his plea of guilty or not guilty to the indictment. This is in accordance with the terms of the contract of himself and his sureties with the state, and the articles which appellants have invoked are to be construed in accordance with this contract and other statutes regulating the trial."

It appears, however, from Wiseman v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 477, 156 S. W. 683, that, under a statute enacted subsequently to the one construed in the preceding case, the liability of the sureties on a bail bond does not terminate with the commencement of the trial, but with the return of a verdict, and it was held that where his conviction was set aside, and a new trial awarded, and the sheriff instructed to discharge the defendant from custody on the original bail bond, the sureties were liable on his failure to appear at the next term of the court. The distinction between the effect of the former statute and the later one was discussed as follows: "Appellant went upon his trial, and was convicted. This conviction was at a subsequent day of the term, by the trial judge, set aside and a new trial awarded. Section 2 of the Act of the 30th Legislature, page 31, provides that where the defendant in cases of felony is on bail when his trial commences, the same shall not thereby be considered as discharged until the jury shall return into court a verdict of guilty and the defendant taken into custody by the sheriff, and he shall have the same right to remain on bail during the trial of his case, and up to the return into court of such verdict of guilty, as under the law he now has before the trial commences; but immediately upon the return into court of such verdict of guilty, he shall be taken into custody by the sheriff, and bail 'be considered as discharged.' By the terms of the bail bond or recognizance, it requires the principal to appear before that court from day to day, and from term to term, until discharged by order of the court, etc. Before the enactment of this statute, when the accused was placed upon trial he was taken from his bondsmen during the trial, and they were no longer responsible for his attendance upon that trial. If acquitted he was discharged; if convicted, he was placed in jail. Under the statute as it then was, if he was awarded a new trial, or his case was reversed on appeal, he was entitled to his discharge under the bond he was placed under prior to his trial and conviction. In either event, whether a new trial was awarded him by the trial court or by the appellate court, upon granting of that new trial he was entitled to his discharge under his bond, unless the sureties had surrendered him, and in that event the sureties were considered discharged until the new trial was awarded or the reversal occurred, and they would not be responsible for his appearance while he was in jail awaiting the order of the court on motion for new trial, or the action of the appellate court, but would be if a new trial was awarded. With reference to the appeal in felony cases, where the conviction is for less than fifteen years, he may give an appeal bond or recognizance, and go out under that bond. Whether the appeal bond would discharge the sureties from all subsequent liabilities is not necessary here to discuss, not being involved, but under the old law, as before stated, when the case went to trial, he was taken from his bondsmen by virtue of that fact and placed in custody of the officers pending the disposition of his case, and to that extent the bondsmen were considered as discharged of liability until the new trial was awarded. The only difference, as we understand the present and former statutes, is that the sheriff cannot now take the principal in charge until after a verdict of guilty has been rendered against him, and the defendant is then taken into custody, and his sureties are then considered as discharged from further liability on the bond, until a new trial has been awarded him, or some action is taken by the court which liberates him from that conviction; whereas, under the old law, he was taken into custody upon going to trial. The only relative difference in the two statutes is, it permits the defendant, under the Act of the 30th Legislature, to go at large during his trial, whereas, under the previous law, he was taken into custody immediately upon the announcement of ready for trial."

XII. Discharge of jury.

Where the defendant appears, pleads not guilty, and the issue is brought before a jury and all the evidence taken, and the court then dismisses the jury and discharges the defendant and permits him to depart, the liability of the sureties terminates with his departure, and they cannot be held liable for his nonappearance upon being called later upon the same day. Lyons v. State (1824) 1 Blackf. (Ind.) 309.

The court in the preceding case distinguished the case of Winscott v. State (Ind.) the report of which has not been found, in the following words: "This case is clearly distinguishable from the case of Winscott v. State, decided at this term. It seems that Winscott was one of the bail named in this recognizance. The reasons given by him why the state should not have execution against him are, to a certain extent, the same as are set forth in this plea. He states the appearance of Lyons, the answer to the charge, the impaneling and swearing of the jury, the hearing of the evidence, and the discharge of the jury by the court; but he does not pretend that Lyons was discharged by the court, or departed with their leave. He contends that Lyons was discharged by the operation of law, that the dismissal of the jury amounted to an acquittal, and that the court could not require him to answer any further to the charge. But it was there evident that Lyons departed without leave of the court. Whether the discharge of the jury amounted to a discharge of Lyons, or not, was not to be determined by the party accused, but by the court. They had a right to adjudicate upon that subject, and it was within the terms of the recognizance that Lyons should remain in court until that matter was determined. His departure without leave put an end to the adjudication, and was a violation of his recognizance. Here the plea expressly states the discharge of Lyons by the court, and his departure with the court's permission; so that, taking the plea to be true, the subsequent calling of Lyons, and forfeiting the recognizance on account of his failure to appear, were incorrect."

And it was held in State v. Turpin (1909) 54 Or. 367, 103 Pac. 438, that where the court adjourned during the progress of the trial of the defendant, and, by reason of a statutory provision, stood adjourned for the term, this operated as an acquittal under the rule that the discharge of the jury without legal necessity therefor, before verdict, has the legal effect of an acquittal, and the defendant was not required by his bail bond thereafter to appear in court, and the bond could not be forfeited for his failure to do so.

Where the defendant is put on trial, and, the jury not agreeing, a mistrial is ordered, but no order is made placing the defendant in custody or discharging him, and the court is adjourned sine die, the liability of the sureties on his bail bond, with the usual conditions to appear at court and not depart without leave, is not thereby terminated, and, on the failure of the defendant to appear at the next term of court, his sureties become liable. State v. Eure (1916) 172 N. C. 874, 89 S. E. 788. In this case the court said: "An appearance bond by its terms, and under the uniform ruling of the courts, requires that the defendant appear term after term, until he is discharged on a verdict of acquittal, or by order of the court."

XIII. Retirement of jury.

The sureties are liable where the defendant flees while the jury are considering their verdict. Cook v. State (1890) 91 Ala. 53, 8 So. 686. In this case the court said: "The defendants sought to set up, in answer to the scire facias, that their principal appeared at the term of the court at which the judgment nisi was taken against them, was arraigned, entered upon his trial, and appeared from day to day during the progress of the trial, and until the jury retired to consider of their verdict. The pleas to this end did not aver that their principal was present in court when the jury appeared therein to deliver their verdict, on the morning after their retirement, nor that, prior thereto, he had been placed in the custody of the sheriff, either by his bail, or under an order of court. The pleas were fatally defective. Disclosing that the trial had been entered upon, they should have disclosed, further, that the defendant had remained in attendance to respond to the judgment that should result therefrom, or that the sureties were discharged by reason of the defendant being taken in custody. The demurrers which were addressed to this infirmity were properly sustained; and, it appearing in evidence that the defendant fled while the jury were considering their verdict, and failed to appear when they were ready to return their finding, judgment final was properly rendered against his sureties."

Nor do they comply with the condition of their bond, and terminate their liability by producing their principal at the first call, where the bond contains the condition that he shall not depart the court without leave, and they are liable where he is put upon trial, and, while the jury are out to consider a verdict, escapes. State v. Martel (1842) 3 Rob. (La.) 22. In this case the court said: "The act of the legislature, passed in 1837 (Acts 1837, p. 99, § 2), is conclusive against the defendants. It says expressly that the appearance and answer of the party accused shall not operate as a discharge or release of the security from his responsibility, until after the trial, and conviction or acquittal, of the accused, unless the surety make a formal surrender of the accused in open court, or in the prison of the parish, and not otherwise. This was not done in the present case."

The liability of the sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that the accused shall appear to answer the charge brought against him and not depart from the court without leave, is not terminated by the appearance of the accused for trial, but the sureties must produce their principal to answer to the sentence, and his departure without leave, while the jury are considering their verdict, and prior to the return of a verdict against him, renders them liable. State v. Ruhing (1897) 49 La. Ann. 909, 22 So. 199.

But see Com. v. Coleman (1859) 2 Met. (Ky.) 382, supra, VI.

XIV. Return of verdict.

a. Conviction.

It is generally held that the liability of bail is not terminated by the return of a verdict against the accused.

Thus, the liability of sureties on a bond conditioned that the defendant appear on the first day of the next term of the court, and not depart without leave, is not terminated by the appearance of the defendant at the time named in the bond, and if he appears and enters a plea of not guilty, and a trial is had, and the jury return a verdict of guilty, and afterwards, and before sentence of judgment is pronounced, he leaves the court room, and is not thereafter seen or heard from, the sureties are liable. Glasgow v. State (1889) 41 Kan. 333, 21 Pac. 253. In this case, it was unsuccessfully contended that the statute did not authorize the bond to require that the defendant should not depart the court without leave, but the court held that the word "appear" in the bond implied that the defendant was to appear for the purposes of a trial of the charges made against him, and in this connection said: "It is not enough for the party to be there for the first day, and then slip off without leave, in order to comply with the conditions of the bond; the very fact of the condition of his appearance is that he shall appear for a certain purpose; he appears for the trial of the charges made against him, and if he departs before the trial and judgment are had, without leave of the court, his bond is forfeited. He appeared for trial, he departed before judgment. The statute provides that, if without sufficient excuse he neglects to appear for trial or judgment, the court must direct the fact to be entered upon its minutes, and declare the forfeiture of the bond."

Thus, the liability of the sureties on a bail bond providing that the defendant shall appear at court, and not depart without leave, is not terminated by his appearance, trial, and conviction, but they are liable for his subsequent disappearance without leave. State v. Norment (1838) 12 La. 511.

And where the principal in such a bond, after conviction and before being called for sentence, departs without leave, and fails to appear when called, the sureties are liable. Magie's Appeal (1886) 1 Sadler (Pa.) 496, 4 Atl. 737.

The surety on such a bond is not discharged by the appearance of the defendant at the time required therein, but the bond is reached where the defendant flees without leave of the court, after the rendition of a verdict against him. Chilton v. People (1873) 66 Ill. 501.

And under such a bond, the defendant, after appearing at the term named, must continue to appear until acquitted, or in some legal way discharged, or, if tried and found guilty, until the sentence of the court is passed upon him, unless he is permitted to depart sooner by leave of the court. Dennard v. State (1847) 2 Ga. 137. In this case the defendant continued in attendance on the court until the verdict of guilty was rendered, but departed from the court before sentence was passed, and the court said that the bond was intended to insure the appearance of accused to answer not only to the charge, but also to the judgment, and that the sureties, in order to terminate their liability, must have their principal to answer to the sentence of the court.

20 A.L.R.—40.

It was held in Ewing v. United States (1917) 153 C. C. A. 167, 240 Fed. 241, that the liability of the sureties is not terminated upon the conviction of the defendant, where such conviction is not immediately followed by the sentence because of the statement of counsel that a motion for a new trial would be made, but that their liability continues until the pronouncement of the sentence, and the failure of the defendant to appear therefor is ground for the forfeiture of the bail bond. In this case the court said: "The bond was to be void if the principal should make his appearance before the district court 'then and there to answer,' etc., 'and continue in attendance at said term of said court from day to day, and term to term, until discharged, and abide the decision of the said court in the premises.' When the accused was convicted by the verdict of the jury, he was, upon the statement of his counsel that a motion for a new trial would be filed, and upon his counsel's request in his presence, instead of being remanded into the custody of the marshal, permitted to go upon his old bond; the court being of opinion that it was a 'continuing' bond. If the court had pronounced sentence, a different question might be presented, or, if the court had ordered the defendant into the custody of the marshal, perhaps the question would not be, in legal effect, the same as the question under consideration. But in this case the accused was not discharged, nor did he 'abide the decision' of the court, since no judgment was rendered on the verdict, or upon the motion for a new trial. Whether or not, on principles of estoppel, applied also to this phase of the case, the surety could be held, need not be decided; for, under the terms of the bond as given, the responsibility of the surety was not brought to an end and completed by the conviction itself. The supreme court of Tennessee (Suggs v. State (1914) 129 Tenn. 500, 167 S. W. 123) discusses the difference between the rights and obligations of the surety after conviction, but before sentence, and after sentence, and says: 'Where a bail bond stipulates that the principal is not to depart without leave of the court, the sureties are not exonerated by the mere conviction of the principal. . . . But when a conviction is followed by a pronouncement of sentence, such pronouncement, it has been held, has the legal effect of a direction to the sheriff to hold the convicted defendant in custody, and operates to exonerate the sureties.' A number of cases are cited in support of each of these conclusions. No case has been cited, and we have found none, in which, upon a mere conviction, without sentence pronounced thereupon, it has been held that the custody of the accused passed from the surety to the officer who, under the law, would take the accused into his custody. If the case is to be assimilated to the mode of proceeding in Tennessee, all debate on the subject is foreclosed by the Statute of Tennessee of 1903 (Acts 1903, chap. 99; Shannon's Code Supp. 852), which provides that, when such a bond as this has been executed, it 'shall be valid and binding upon the defendant and his sureties thereon, for the defendant's personal appearance before the court from term to term until the case is finally terminated or stricken from the docket, and the defendant discharged by the court; and the defendant shall not be required to renew said bond or recognizance, unless ordered to do so by the court because of the insufficiency of said bond in amount, or the insolvency of the same, or on forfeiture of bail, or for other good and sufficient causes; provided that the sureties on said bond may surrender the prisoner and be released on said bond as now provided.' Of course, that provision of the statute is as much a part of the bond as if written into it. If it were so written, however, it would not add to the express agreement of this bond that the accused should attend 'until discharged,' and 'abide the decision of the said court in the premises.' The surety, by failing to produce the accused, must pay the penalty for his default."

And in State v. Baldwin (1888) 78 Iowa, 737, 36 N. W. 908, where it appeared that the principal in the bond was tried and convicted on the indictment, and two years afterward a default upon the bond was taken, the court said: "A default may be taken upon a bail bond if the principal fail to appear, at any time when his personal appearance may be lawfully required. Code, § 4596. The court may at any time require one convicted to appear and surrender himself, or perform the judgment. Having been required to appear, and having failed to do so, the default was entered against the defendant's principal. The principal in the bail bond may be required to appear at any term subsequent to the term at which he is required by the language of the bond to appear, without notice to him or his sureties, and his former appearance to answer to the charge does not discharge the sureties. State v. Brown (1864) 16 Iowa, 314. It will be presumed, if the forfeiture was taken at a subsequent term, that the cause was continued by operation of law to the term when default was taken. State v. Merrihew (1877) 47 Iowa, 112, 29 Am. Rep. 464. . . . It cannot be doubted that, after conviction, the person indicted may be ordered by the court to surrender himself upon the judgment; and upon nonperformance of such order default may be taken upon his bond, which is conditioned that the principal 'shall abide the order' of the court."

The sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that defendant shall at all times render himself amenable to the orders and process of the court, and, if convicted, appear for judgment and render himself in execution thereof, are not discharged from liability by the conviction of the defendant, and where, after conviction, the court adjourned to a future time for the purpose of passing sentence and judgment upon the defendant, and he failed to appear at such time, the sureties are liable. People v. MacGregor (1911) 147 App. Div. 438, 131 N. Y. Supp. 783. The lower court in this case held the sureties discharged upon the theory that the bond had no force or effect after the verdict of conviction, because § 5 of the Code of Criminal Procedure declares that, after the conviction of a crime, a defendant who has appealed, and when there is a stay of proceedings, but not otherwise, may be admitted to bail; but the appellate court held that the word "conviction" in such section did not mean the verdict of conviction, but meant the sentence or judgment of the court rendered upon the verdict.

Where the principal on a criminal appearance bond, requiring the defendant to appear before the district court on the first day of the next term, and there remain from day to day, and term to term, until discharged by due course of law, appears for trial, and is found guilty of the charge preferred against him, he does not, by virtue of § 5931, Rev. Laws 1910, which provides that if a general verdict is rendered against the defendant he must be remanded, if in custody, or, if on bail, he may be committed to the proper officer of the county to await the judgment of the court upon a verdict, immediately pass into the custody of the law, and thereby discharge the sureties on his bond, unless he is committed into the custody of the proper officer to await the judgment of the court. ABLES v. STATE (reported herewith) ante, 589.

And the liability of sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that the defendant shall appear and answer the indictment against him, abide by any and all orders of the court, and attend the sessions of the court from day to day thereafter, until the final adjudication of the case, is not terminated by his appearance for trial, and presence during the trial until a verdict of guilty is rendered, and they are liable where he fails to appear at the time set by the court for the pronouncement of sentence against him. United States v. Reyes (1908) 3 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 299.

But it was held in State v. Wilson (1859) 14 La. Ann. 446, that where the condition of the bond is that the accused shall appear at the next term, and not depart without leave of the court until his final trial and conviction or acquittal, the liability of the sureties is at an end when a verdict of guilty is found against him, and the accused, being then present in court, is, after the conviction, in the custody of the sheriff, and the sureties cannot be made liable on the bond because he afterwards makes his escape.

And in United States v. Cerecedo (1914) 6 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 622, it was held that an appearance bond, the form of which does not appear, did not apply between verdict and sentence, and the sureties were not liable for the defendant's appearance after verdict of conviction; that the appearance bond provided for defendant's appearance from day to day until final adjudication; but that the verdict of conviction was not something incidental to the trial from day to day, but a final adjudication on the facts, and the sentence resulted as a matter of law.

And the surety is discharged, where he produces the defendant in court for his trial, and after the return of a verdict of guilty, the sheriff lays his hands on him and starts with him to the jail, although no order is made by the court placing the prisoner in the custody of the sheriff. State v. Murmann (1894) 124 Mo. 502, 28 S. W. 2.

b. Acquittal.

Where the bail bond is conditioned for the appearance of the defendant to answer an indictment for rape, and to abide the judgment and orders of the court, and not depart without leave, and he is discharged and acquitted of the alleged rape, but convicted of an assault and battery with attempt to commit a rape, his acquittal of rape does not excuse him from appearing further in the case, and where, pending a motion for a new trial after his conviction for assault and battery with intent to commit rape, he fails to appear, the sureties are liable. Campbell v. State (1862) 18 Ind. 375, 81 Am. Dec. 363.

But it was held in Rex v. Spenser (1752) 1 Wils. 315, 95 Eng. Reprint, 637, that the bail should be discharged upon the acquittal of the defendant, as against the contention that the course of the court was not to discharge the bail until the acquittal of the defendant was entered upon record.

XV. Appearance to receive sentence.

Where, after the conviction of the defendant, the pronouncement of sentence upon him is deferred by the court, and he is directed to appear on a certain day to receive his sentence, and he appears on such day and finds no court in session, his bondsmen are relieved, and the defendant is absolved from any further attendance upon the court. People v. Kennedy (1885) 58 Mich. 372, 25 N. W. 318.

The liability of sureties on a bail bond, conditioned that the defendant shall appear before the court to receive judgment and sentence, and abide the judgment of the court, and not depart without leave, is terminated, where the defendant appears to receive sentence, and thereafter presents himself to the sheriff for the purpose of being taken into custody. Jackson v. State (1893) 52 Kan. 249, 34 Pac. 744. In this case the sheriff declined to take the defendant, and asked him to wait till the next day, and the court said: "The liability of the sureties terminated when the defendant had fully complied with the terms of the recognizance. Section 256 of the Criminal Code provides: 'Where any convict shall be sentenced to any punishment, the clerk of the court in which sentence was passed shall forthwith deliver a certified copy thereof to the sheriff of the county, who shall, without delay, either in person or by a general or usual deputy, cause such convict to receive the punishment to which he was sentenced.' The sheriff made two excuses for not taking the prisoner into custody at the time he offered to surrender himself; namely, that he had no papers by which to hold him, and no place to keep him overnight. Neither of the excuses was good. The law makes it the duty of the clerk to forthwith deliver the sheriff a certified copy of the judgment; and where the party himself raised no objection to being taken into custody on the ground of want of papers, we do not think the sheriff himself can make it. But a very brief time would be required for the clerk to make up the record and certified copy thereof required by the statute. As to the other objection, it is the duty of the sheriff to take prisoners into his custody and keep them. If he has no convenient place for doing so, he must use one that is not so convenient. Sureties on criminal recognizances are not bound to answer for the conduct of a prisoner after it becomes the duty of the sheriff to take him into custody, after judgment, and after the defendant has submitted himself for that purpose. The words 'not depart without leave' in the bond do not mean that the defendant will not escape from the custody of the sheriff. The 'leave' means leave of the court. So far as the record shows, the sentence was final, and to be executed at once. There is nothing showing that the court granted any stay, or directed the defendant to appear in the court at any future time. Under the ruling in Re Strickler (1893) 51 Kan. 700, 33 Pac. 620, the operation of the sentence began at once, and it was the duty of the sheriff to carry it into effect."

And it was held in State ex rel. Vigg v. Romaine (1915) 47 Okla. 138, 148 Pac. 79, that where an accused, who has given a recognizance with sureties to appear and answer the charge preferred against him, and abide the order of the court until said charge has been disposed of, and to do and receive what shall be enjoined by said court upon him, was in court after conviction to receive the judgment and sentence pronounced against him, he immediately passed from the custody of his bail to the custody of the sheriff, by an implied order of the court, by which his bail was discharged. Nor could they thereafter be bound by an order of the trial court, entered after the pronouncement of judgment and sentence, which permits the accused to depart from custody for the purpose of procuring an appeal bond, and provides that in the meantime the sureties on the bail bond shall remain bound unto the state of Oklahoma. In this case the court said: "The demurrer was sustained upon the theory that, upon a person charged with a felony being convicted and sentenced, he is no longer in the custody of his bail, but in the custody of the proper officer of the law, and if he thereafter escapes or departs without leave of court his bail is discharged, without a formal order to that effect. We think this position is well taken. Section 5931, Rev. Laws 1910, provides that: 'If a general verdict is rendered against the defendant, he must be remanded, if in custody, or, if on bail, he may be committed to the proper officer of the county to await the judgment of the court upon the verdict. When committed his bail is exonerated, or if money is deposited instead of bail it must be refunded to the defendant.' Section 5963, Rev. Laws 1910, provides that 'if the judgment be imprisonment, or fine and imprisonment, until such fine be paid, the defendant must forthwith be committed to the custody of the proper officer, and by him detained until the judgment be complied with, unless the sentence be suspended.' Section 5992 provides for the method of taking appeal from the judgment of conviction. It will be observed that § 5963, supra, makes it the duty of the trial court upon judgment immediately to commit the defendant, if the judgment be imprisonment, or fine and imprisonment, to the custody of the proper officer until the judgment be complied with. It is the further duty of the trial court, in passing sentence in accordance with § 5992, supra, to fix a reasonable time within which bail may be given, and during such time to hold the defendant in custody. Instead of following this statute, the court, after overruling the defendant's motion for new trial, rendering judgment, and passing sentence upon him, ordered him to be set at liberty for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to procure an appeal bond. His failure to return did not constitute a breach of the conditions of his bond. The sureties upon this bail bond did not undertake to return Romaine after his departure with leave of court, under the circumstances disclosed by the record before us. In our judgment the liability of the sureties could not be enlarged by an order of court made in plain contravention of the foregoing statutes. Upon judgment being rendered and sentence passed, the custody of the defendant, under the law, passed from his bail to the proper officer, and the court was not at liberty to vary or enlarge the terms of their undertaking."

XVI. Judgment or sentence.

The weight of authority seems to hold that the liability of bail terminates with the pronouncement of judgment or sentence upon the defendant, especially where the bond or recognizance does not contain a condition requiring the latter to abide the final order or judgment of the court, or, if convicted, to render himself in execution thereof.

Thus, the liability of the sureties on a bail bond conditioned that the defendant shall appear at a certain time, and not depart from the court without leave, and appear from term to term until final termination of the case, is terminated by the pronouncement of the final judgment in the trial court, and the liability of the surety does not continue until the termination of the case on appeal, or after remand. Beasley v. State (1915) 134 Tenn. 650, 185 S. W. 687.

And the liability of sureties upon a bond conditioned that the defendant shall appear on a date fixed, and not depart the court without leave, is terminated, where the defendant appears, is tried, found guilty by the jury, and sentence pronounced by the court to the effect that he be confined in the state penitentiary for a specified time, and that he be remanded to the county jail to await the proper authorities to take him to the penitentiary, since such judgment operates to place the defendant within the custody of the sheriff, and where the sheriff permits the defendant to go without custody for several days during which he escapes, the sureties are not liable. Suggs v. State (1914) 129 Tenn. 498, 167 S. W. 172.

And where the defendant is present in court, and pleads guilty, and the sentence of the court is pronounced, he is no longer in the custody of the bail, but is in the custody of the proper officers of the law, and his sureties are thereby discharged by the operation of the law without a formal order to that effect, because the condition of the bond will then have been fully complied with. Ford v. State (1911) 100 Ark. 515, 140 S. W. 734.

And in Ex parte Williams (1896) 114 Ala. 29, 22 So. 446, denying the right of one, convicted and sentenced, to be released, after reversal of such conviction, by virtue of a bail bond executed before his conviction and sentence, the court said: "Whenever a party is convicted and sentenced, he is no longer in the custody of his bail, but is in the custody of the proper officer of the law, and the bail are thereby discharged by the operation of law without a formal order to that effect. The condition of the bond then will have been fully complied with. The mere appearance of the defendant at court for trial, or his presence during trial, or a mistrial, will not operate to discharge the bail. The obligation of a proper bail bond binds the sureties, at least, until after the verdict of the jury; but when the sentence of the law is pronounced, the officer of the law is charged with its due execution. The bail have no further control over the custody of their principal, and cannot be longer held responsible."

A bail bond conditioned for the appearance of the defendant at a named term of the county court becomes functus officio when the defendant appears as required, and is tried, and the bond cannot be forfeited after the defendant has been convicted, and has appealed, and the appeal has been dismissed. Forten- berry v. State (1904) 47 Tex. Crim. Rep. 84, 79 S. W. 538.

Upon a recognizance for the appearance of the principal from term to term, and not to depart without the leave of the court, but not containing any stipulation to abide the final order or judgment of the court, the sureties are not bound for the appearance of the principal at a term of the court subsequent to that at which he was tried, convicted, and sentenced. Roberts v. Gordon (1890) 86 Ga. 386, 12 S. E. 648. In this case the defendant left after being sentenced, and did not return, and the court said: "There can be no doubt that, as soon as the sentence was pronounced, the sheriff, and not the bail, was the proper custodian of the convict. The legal effect of the sentence was equivalent to a special order directing the sheriff to hold him in custody. This being so, it was not necessary to enter an exoneretur on the minutes of the court in order to discharge the bail. The sentence itself operated as an exoneretur. . . . The bail was not bound by the stipulations of the bond for the appearance of his principal at any time after final sentence."

And the liability of the sureties on a bond, conditioned that the defendant shall appear before a police magistrate on a certain day to answer the charge preferred against him, and be further on treated according to law, is terminated by the appearance of the defendant at such time, a plea of guilty, and pronouncement of sentence, the statute providing that the arraignment or conviction of any person charged and bound shall not discharge the recognizance, but the same shall be effectual for his appearance for trial or sentence as the case may be, and therefore the sureties are not liable, where the defendant appears, pleads guilty, and is sentenced to imprisonment and to a fine, and to further imprisonment on default of payment of the fine, and the constable takes him in charge, but before his imprisonment, the sentence is modified by the court by striking off the term of imprisonment, and limiting the sentence to the fine and imprisonment in default of payment thereof, and the defendant is allowed to depart from the court room, and he fails to return or pay the fine. Rex v. Edwards (1914) 19 D. L. R. 207, 23 Can. Crim. Cas. 296.

But the liability of the sureties on a bail bond, conditioned for the defendant's appearance at the next term, and not to depart without leave, is not terminated by the appearance, conviction, and sentence, of the defendant, since the conviction does not, by virtue of its own force, put the defendant in the custody of the court or of the sheriff, but to accomplish this an order from the court is necessary. State v. Schenck (1905) 138 N. C. 560, 49 S. E. 917, 3 Ann. Cas. 928. The court gave another reason for its holding as follows: "But there is another sufficient reason why the appellants should be held bound by the recognizance or bail bond and to be now liable for the penalty thereof. All the proceedings of the court are in fieri until the expiration of the term, and during the term the record remains completely under the control of the court. It may strike out its judgment and enter a different one. In other words, the court has the whole term during which to consider its action and modify or reverse it. The principle is supported by abundant authority. Penny v. Smith (1866) 61 N. C. (Phill. L.) 36; Halyburton v. Carson (1879) 80 N. C. 16; Turrentine v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1885) 92 N. C. 642. This being so, why could not the court strike out the verdict and judgment and award a new trial, and then continue the cause to the next term, in which case the sureties would remain liable (State v. Smith (1872) 66 N. C. 620), and if it could do this, why did it not also have the power to direct that the defendant should not be taken into custody until it could come to a final determination in the matter, or, as in this case, suspend execution of the judgment for a proper reason. The conviction and sentence were not final and irrevocable until the end of the term, which was after the default of the defendant and the entry of the forfeiture. If the court could set aside the judgment, it could a fortiori postpone its enforcement. We conclude that the recognizance binds the sureties for the continued appearance of their principal, from day to day, during the term and at all stages of the proceeding, until he is finally discharged by the court, either for the term or without day. He must answer its calls at all times and submit to its judgment. In no other way can the criminal law of the state be well administered."

And the pronouncement of sentence upon the defendant does not terminate the liability of the sureties on his bond, conditioned for his appearance at a certain term of court, and to abide and not depart from the court without leave, and therefore they are liable, where the defendant appears, is tried and sentenced, but, owing to the absence of the clerk and the criminal docket, no entry thereof is made on the record, and the defendant subsequently disappears before entering the security provided by the sentence. Com. v. Limber (1914) 42 Pa. Co. Ct. 678.

And for the same reason, where the defendant appears in court, and pleads guilty, and is sentenced just before the adjournment at noon, and neither a sheriff nor any of its officers are present, and immediately upon the reassembling of the court after dinner the defendant is called, and fails to appear, his sureties are likewise liable. Com. v. Casper (1888) 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 382.

In State v. Thompson (1878) 62 Ind. 367, where it appeared on a prosecution for surety of the peace, that the defendant gave a bond to appear on a certain date before the justice of the peace, that he appeared at such time, and was tried, and ordered by the justice to enter into a bond to keep the peace, but he, without leave of the justice, departed without executing such bond, it was held that his sureties were liable on the bond, which provided that the defendant should appear on a named day to answer a charge for surety of the peace, and abide the order of the court, and not depart without leave.

And where the accused is convicted and fined, after trial by a jury, and, after the overruling of a motion for a new trial, the court passes judgment upon the verdict of the jury, but he does not appear to pay the fine, the sureties are liable. State v. Whitson (1846) 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 178. The court said: "It is set up in bar of this scire facias that the recognizance was discharged by the appearance and submission to trial of the said Harman on the first day of the term. We think otherwise. By the condition of the recognizance he was not only to appear, but he was not to depart without leave of the court, and was to abide the order and judgment thereof. He did depart without the leave of the court, and did not abide the order and judgment thereof. He forfeited his recognizance. The object in taking bail in these cases is not simply to secure the appearance of the accused at the trial, but also the performance and satisfaction of the judgment that may be given against him."

And where the defendant, indicted for a misdemeanor, was tried, found guilty and fined, and, after the judgment was rendered against him, went to the clerk in reference to the payment of the fine, and was allowed to go home for the purpose of making arrangements to do so, but did not afterwards return, the liability of the sureties upon his bail bond, providing that the defendant, if convicted, shall render himself in execution thereof, was not terminated by the defendant's appearance, trial, and conviction, and they are liable for his failure to appear further to pay the fine. Com. v. Turpin (1895) 98 Ky. 9, 32 S. W. 133. In this case the court said: "It seems to us that the conditions of this undertaking are not fully met, nor its obligations, as against the surety, fully discharged, merely by the appearance in court of the principal at the time fixed, or by his trial and conviction. By the terms of the bond, appellee has undertaken that Portwood, 'if convicted, shall render himself in execution thereof,' and, by the further express terms of the obligation, appellee is to be responsible 'if he shall fail to perform either of these conditions.' It is to be borne in mind, too, that this prosecution against Portwood was for a misdemeanor, and that the trial and conviction could have been had in his absence, and in this respect is unlike a prosecution in a felony case. If he had not appeared in court at all, the fine could still have been imposed, and appellee would clearly have been liable. Does the fact that he was voluntarily present in court, even when coupled with the fact that he conversed with the clerk about replevying the fine, and left with the promise to return the next day and execute a satisfactory replevin bond, exempt the surety in the bail bond from further liability?"

XVII. Submission to judgment or sentence.

The liability of the sureties on a bond conditioned that the defendant will appear before the court on the first day of the term, and not depart without leave, is terminated, where the defendant was present during the trial, and the rendition of the verdict, and the pronouncement of sentence against him, and immediately thereafter was taken into the custody of the sheriff, since the bond is not conditioned that the defendant or his sureties shall pay or satisfy the judgment, or fine imposed, and therefore, when, after the sheriff has taken him into custody, and, upon the day of the sentence, he is permitted to depart with leave of the court and the sheriff, the sureties are not liable. Moorehead v. State (1888) 38 Kan. 489, 16 Pac. 957.

And where a defendant who has entered into a recognizance for his appearance, which further provides that, if he shall pay all sums of money adjudged against him by the court, the bond will be void, appears when his case is called for trial, and pleads guilty, and is adjudged to pay a fine, but fails to pay the fine, and thereafter, at a subsequent term of the court, fails to appear when called, a judgment of forfeiture cannot be entered against the sureties, because there is no authority to make the payment of the fine a condition of the bond, and his appearance, plea of guilty, and submission to sentence discharge the obligation of the sureties. State v. Cobb (1891) 44 Mo. App. 375. The court said: "No authority exists in this state for exacting from a prisoner under indictment for a bailable offense, in addition to a bond for his appearance to answer the indictment, a bond to pay any fine that may be adjudged against him by the court. He cannot be compelled, at the price of his liberty between the date of his arrest under the indictment and the close of his trial, to give a bond to pay the fine that may be adjudged against him. The limit of the authority conferred upon the judge, under such circumstances, is to let the prisoner to bail. This authority is conferred by the following statute: 'When the defendant is in custody or under arrest for a bailable offense, the judge of the court in which the indictment or information is pending may let him to bail and take his bond or recognizance.' Rev Stat. 1889, § 4123; Rev. Stat. 1879, § 1829. Nor does any statutory authority exist for forfeiting such a recognizance after the prisoner has been discharged from his original custody by the judgment of the court upon his trial; and this takes place when he is sentenced to pay a pecuniary fine without imprisonment. It is then the duty of the officer having him in charge to commit him to the proper custody until the fine and costs be paid, or until he is otherwise discharged by due course of law. But this custody is a new custody. It is not a custody for the purpose of answering, but it is a custody for the purpose of execution. He is held in execution of his sentence, in default of payment of the fine and costs. The statute authorizing the forfeitures of recognizance in criminal cases confirms this view. It is as follows: 'If, without sufficient cause or excuse, the defendant fails to appear for trial or judgment, or upon any other occasion when his presence in court may be lawfully required, according to the condition of his recognizance, the court must direct the fact to be entered upon its minutes, and thereupon the recognizance is forfeited,' etc. There is here no authority to forfeit, after trial and sentence, a recognizance given to secure the presence of the prisoner in court; and the authority here given can only be exercised when the defendant fails to appear according to the condition of his recognizance. He did so appear, when he appeared and pleaded guilty and submitted to sentence, and this discharged the obligation of his sureties."

And where, after giving a recognizance to appear at the next term, and to abide the final sentence or order of the court, and not to depart without leave, the accused pleads guilty, and is sentenced to pay a fine, and is ordered committed to the custody of the sheriff until the fine is paid, but the court suspends the order of commitment, and the accused is permitted to depart from the court, the recognizance became functus officio when the accused submitted himself to the judgment of the court, and the sureties are no longer bound. Spillman v. People (1884) 16 Ill. App. 224.

In State v. Zimmerman (1900) 112 Iowa, 5, 83 N. W. 720, the following facts appeared: The judge who held the term of court at which the defendant pleaded guilty fixed a day for sentencing all who had been convicted of crime. All the prisoners who were not out on bond were brought into the court room by the sheriff, and were seated on one side of the room, while those who were out on bond were in another part of the room. They were first sentenced, and the judge said to the sheriff that he wished him to take charge of them as soon as sentenced. The defendant was present, and as soon as sentenced went over and took his seat with the prisoners who were not out on bond. After the sheriff had thus taken the defendant into his custody, the trial judge gave the defendant permission to go and get the money with which to pay the fine, and notified the sheriff of his order. The defendant, instead of getting the money to pay his fine, left the state, and thereafter, and before the adjournment of court, an order was made requiring him to appear and surrender himself to perform judgment, and upon his failure to appear the bail bond was forfeited. It was held that the liability of the surety was terminated. The court said: "The bond contained the usual conditions—'to appear and answer the indictment, and abide the orders and judgment of the court, and not depart without leave of same.' This undertaking is a continuing one, and can only be discharged by the surrender of the accused as provided by statute (Code, §§ 5528, 5529), or by obtaining leave of court for the accused to depart. State v. Brown (1864) 16 Iowa, 314. There is no pretense that Houser surrendered the defendant to the sheriff in accordance with the statute, and no claim that the court directly discharged him. It is said, however, that what occurred at the time judgment was pronounced amounted to a discharge by the court. . . . The bond, as we have said, was in the statutory form, conditioned to 'appear and answer the indictment, and submit to the order and judgment of said court, and not depart without leave of same.' Such a bond does not obligate the surety to pay the fine imposed. In a sense, the surety is simply a jailer for the defendant, charged with the duty of producing him when his personal presence is required, or of surrendering him in execution of the judgment. When once that duty is performed, the liability of the surety is extinguished. And whenever the court orders a defendant out on bail into the custody of the sheriff, in execution of the judgment pronounced against him, and the sheriff, in pursuance of that order, takes possession of the prisoner, the liability of the surety ceases, for he has lost all control of his principal, and can no longer direct his movements. In the instant case there can be no doubt that the court ordered Zimmerman into the custody of the sheriff, in execution of the judgment, and that the sheriff took him into custody pursuant to that order. His subsequent departure was with leave of court, for the purpose of obtaining the money whereby to pay his fine, and there was no breach of the conditions of the bond in his failure to return. The surety did not undertake to return Zimmerman after his departure, with leave of court, under the circumstances disclosed by the record before us."

And it is stated in Ex parte Chandler (1896) 114 Ala. 8, 22 So. 285, that the sureties on a bail bond are released when the defendant is committed to jail under sentence of the law.

In Wilson v. People (1882) 10 Ill. App. 357, where the defendant appeared at the time named, and pleaded guilty, and the court assessed a fine and ordered that he be committed to the common jail until the fine and costs were paid, it was held that under a recognizance condition for his appearance at a certain time, then and there to answer and abide the order and judgment of the court, and thence not depart without lawful permission, the undertaking of the sureties was completed when the principal appeared and submitted to the jurisdiction of the court. In this case the court said: "The judgment was that he stand committed until the fine and costs were paid, and it must be presumed that the sheriff, in the performance of his duty, immediately took the defendant into his custody, and placed him in jail pursuant to the judicial mandate. The statement that five days afterward it appeared he had departed without leave, not having paid said fine and costs, is, to say the least, ambiguous. The allegation must be taken most strongly against the pleader, as it is presumed he will state the case as favorably as the facts will warrant. From the statement thus made the fair inference would be that Wilson escaped from the custody of the sheriff. We think the sureties would not be bound in that case. If they secured his presence and submission to the court, their obligation was performed, and they ought not to be responsible for the failure of the sheriff to retain him till the fine was paid. When he went into the custody of that officer, he went by operation of law beyond their control; though up to that point he had been constructively in their custody, and subject to arrest and surrender by them at any moment. This legal right to control him being gone, it would be unreasonable to hold them bound to produce him."

Under a bail bond the conditions of which are that the defendant shall appear in court, and, at all times, render himself amenable to its orders and process in the prosecution of the charge, and, if convicted, shall render himself in execution of the judgment, the sureties are not liable for the failure of the defendant to satisfy the fine imposed upon him on conviction. Mitchell v. Com. (1876) 12 Bush (Ky.) 247. The court said: "The forfeiture in this case is based on the idea that the failure of Arthur to pay the fine adjudged against him is a violation of one of the stipulations of the bail bond. We do not so regard it. The bail did not undertake that the accused should pay any fine that he might be adjudged to pay, nor does the Criminal Code authorize the forfeiture of the bond because of his failure in that regard. The covenant is that, if fined, Arthur shall render himself in execution of the judgment, and the statute provides for a forfeiture in case he violates this stipulation by failing to surrender himself to the proper officer. He did render himself in execution of the judgment, by surrendering to the sheriff, and remaining in confinement, as provided for by § 283 of the Criminal Code. This was a full and complete compliance with the covenants of the bail bond, and exonerated Mitchell from all liability."

And in Atlanta v. Turner (1910) 8 Ga. App. 213, 68 S. E. 847, where it appeared that a prisoner was convicted in a municipal court, and sentenced to pay a fine, and additionally to serve a term under the chain gang, and, on seeking certiorari, gave a bond conditioned that he should "personally appear to abide the final order, decree, judgment, or sentence" in the case, and the certiorari was dismissed, and the prisoner surrendered himself into custody, and, served out the chain gang portion of the sentence, but did not pay the fine, it was held that the condition of the bond was complied with by the prisoner's having duly surrendered himself into custody, and that no action could be maintained on the bond.

XVIII. Appeal from conviction.

a. In general.

A bail bond remains in force after the reversal of the conviction of a felony and the remand of the case for a new trial, and the sureties are liable for the subsequent appearance of the defendant in the lower court. Ex parte Guffee (1880) 8 Tex. App. 409. It was contended in this case that the law was changed in this respect by a change in the Code to the effect that, when a felony case on appeal is reversed and remanded for a new trial, the defendant shall be released from custody upon his giving bail as in other cases where he is entitled to bail, but the court held that this provision of the Code was for the benefit of any defendant who, having been denied bail in the first instance, was subsequently convicted of a bailable offense, and upon appeal obtained a reversal and a new trial. The court also held that the change in the statutory provision relating to the construction and effect of bail bonds did not affect the question at issue, saying: "The former statute provided that a recognizance or bail bond, entered into by a defendant, and which binds him to appear at a particular term of the district court, shall be construed to bind him and his sureties for his attendance upon the court from term to term, and from day to day, until his final acquittal, or conviction and sentence. The change in the law provides that he and his sureties shall be so bound for his attendance until discharged from further liability on the bond according to law. The concluding phrase in the new law is more comprehensive than in the old, and the change was necessary in view of the change made in the time of passing sentence upon a prisoner. Had the law remained as it was, a sentence of the principal might have absolved the sureties from liability, notwithstanding the defendant might prosecute his appeal and obtain a new trial."

b. Revival of liability of bail on dismissal of appeal.

The liability of the sureties upon a bail bond given for the appearance of the defendant before the mayor of a city, terminated by the execution of an appeal bond, is not revived by the dismissal of the appeal from the conviction of the defendant in the mayor's court. Bailey v. State (1903) 71 Ark. 498, 76 S. W. 551. In this case the court said: "The main question presented is whether the execution and approval of the appeal bond did not supersede the bail bond given for the appearance before the mayor, and relieve the sureties on that bond from any further liability on account of the acts of the defendant, so far as that bond was concerned. The object and purpose of the law in allowing the defendant to give the appeal bond superseding the judgment of the justice or mayor was, we think, not only to supersede the collection of that judgment, but also to permit the defendant to remain at large during the pendency of his appeal, and to secure his presence in the circuit court on the trial there. If he had not executed the appeal bond, the judgment of the mayor would not have been superseded, and he would no doubt have been taken into custody in execution of the judgment, as he was present there at the trial. But he took an appeal, and gave the bond which the statute provides shall act as a supersedeas of the judgment of the mayor. He was, by virtue of this bond, entitled to remain at large pending his appeal; and the sureties on his former bond had no further power to take him into custody or surrender him, for the reason that the object and purposes for which their bond had been given had been attained, and the bond was, therefore, as we think, functus officio. After the appeal bond was executed, the sureties on the former bail bond lost their authority over him, and their liability ended with their control. The dismissal of the appeal, though it left the judgment of the mayor in full force, did not operate to revive the defunct bail bond. If the defendant had failed to appear in the circuit court, the sureties on his appeal bond might have been held liable. As he appeared in that court, and was there when his appeal was dismissed, he could have been placed in custody by the court, and turned over to the town authorities in execution of the mayor's judgment, for which he is still liable."

XIX. Bail bonds given on appeal.

a. In general.

A bond, given by the defendant on appeal to the circuit court from a conviction in the justice's court, conditioned that defendant shall appear at the next term of the circuit court, and not depart the court without leave, is complied with by the sureties, when they see that the defendant appears, and remains through the next term of the circuit court following the execution of the bond, and they are not liable for his failure to appear at a subsequent term, since the bond covers only the term named in it, and does not reach to a succeeding term. State v. Moore (1894) 57 Mo. App. 662.

And a bond given on appeal to the superior court from a conviction in a police justice's court is discharged by a verdict of not guilty in the superior court. State ex rel. Gabe v. Main (1911) 66 Wash. 381, 119 Pac. 844.

And an appeal bond given on appeal from a conviction in a justice's court to the county court becomes functus officio upon the appearance, fine, and imprisonment of the defendant by the judgment of the county court until the fine and costs are paid, and the bond is of no further binding force upon the sureties, and they are discharged from further liability. Phipps v. State (1888) 25 Tex. App. 660, 8 S. W. 929.

And where, upon the conviction of the accused by a jury, a case being reserved upon a question of law arising at the trial, he is released on giving a bail bond conditioned that he will appear at the next sitting of the court to receive sentence, the liability of his bail is terminated, where, after the hearing of the reserved case, the court quashes the conviction and orders a new trial, and his bail are not liable for his failure to subsequently appear at the next sitting of the court, since the accused could not properly be sentenced after his conviction had been set aside. Reg. v. Hamilton (1899) 12 Manitoba L. R. 507, 3 Can. Crim. Cas. 1.

But the sureties on a bond taken in the court of common pleas to prosecute exceptions in the supreme court, and abide the sentence of the latter court, are liable, where, after the exceptions have been overruled and the case remitted to the court of common pleas, the defendant fails to appear in such court. Com. v. Austin (1858) 11 Gray (Mass.) 330.

And when a question of law in the case of an indictment for a misdemeanor is reserved for the determination of the appellate court, by the defendant upon his conviction, and he gives bail for his appearance at the next term of the trial court to answer the judgment, the suspension of the judgment so obtained expires at the commencement of the term of the trial court, unless, before that time, the defendant procures in the appellate court a reversal of the judgment, or an order extending its suspension; and, where the suspension of a judgment so expires, the failure of the defendant to appear in the trial court at the term specified is ground for the forfeiture of the bail. State v. Lowry (1856) 29 Ala. 44.

And where, on conviction, the defendant, in order to suspend the execution of the judgment, pending appeal, until the next term of the trial court, gives bail to appear at that term and abide the judgment rendered, the legal effect of the undertaking is that the defendant shall appear at the next term of the trial court to abide the judgment rendered, if that is affirmed on the appeal, and if such judgment is reversed, and he is not discharged, to abide such other judgment as may be rendered in the trial court, and the liability of the sureties is not terminated by his appearance at the term specified in the undertaking; but, if the case is continued until the next term, the defendant is bound to appear then, and the liability of the surety continues. Williams v. State (1876) 55 Ala. 71. The defense to the enforcement of the forfeiture of the bail bond, that the liability of the sureties had been terminated because of the reversal of the judgment of conviction by the appellate court, was held unavailable, but the court stated that the defense would probably be good, saying in this connection: "The undertaking would have shown that it required the defendants, not (according to the directions of the statute) to appear and 'abide the judgment rendered,' but to appear 'and abide the judgment rendered at this, the spring term, 1875,' and if that judgment had been shown to have been in fact reversed, and not affirmed, the defense would probably have been made out. For the stipulation of the undertaking being thus special, and not in the terms of the act, it may be that the sureties would not have been bound to answer for the defendants abiding any other judgment in the cause."

b. Reversal of conviction.

A recognizance, given on appeal from a conviction, for appearance in the appellate court, requires the defendant to appear in the trial court after the reversal of its judgment and the granting of a new trial, although no order is made directing him to do so; and the sureties are liable if he fails so to appear. State v. Heed (1876) 62 Mo. 559. The court said: "When the judgment of the circuit court was reversed by this court, no direct or specific order was made that the defendant should appear in the circuit court and undergo a new trial, but this was necessarily implied in the order remanding the cause to that court for another trial. The judgment of this court was that the defendant had been illegally convicted and should be tried again, and this was as binding upon the defendant as upon the state. The defendant was not thereby discharged. The order remanding the cause was one which, in its very nature, required the parties to that cause to appear before the circuit court for further proceedings in accordance with the opinion of this court. It was the duty of the defendant, in rendering obedience to that order according to the conditions of his bond, to appear at the circuit court and submit himself to trial. The record recites that he failed so to appear, and such failure was a breach of his recognizance, for which the defendants are liable."

And the sureties in a recognizance on an appeal from the district court to the supreme court are not discharged from liability by the reversal of the conviction and the remand of the case to the district court for another trial, where the condition of the recognizance is that the defendant shall appear before the district court, and not depart without leave, in order to abide the judgment of the supreme court; and the sureties are, therefore, liable, where the defendant fails to appear after the reversal of the conviction in the district court. Weaver v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 386.

And it was held in Riviere v. State (1879) 7 Tex. App. 55, following the preceding case that the sureties on a recognizance given on appeal from a conviction of misdemeanor continue liable, after the reversal of the conviction and the remand of the case for a new trial, for the failure of the defendant subsequently to appear in the lower court. The contention unsuccessfully made by the surety against his liability was that the reversal of the case placed the cause "as it would have stood in case a new trial had been granted in the district court," and that "the effect of a new trial [in the district court] is to place the cause in the same position in which it was before the trial had taken place," and that it followed therefrom that the effect of the reversal was also to render the recognizance functus officio, and that the state must look to and forfeit the appearance bond and that alone, on the failure of the defendant subsequently to appear in the court below.

But the cases of Weaver v. State (1875) 43 Tex. 386, and Riviere v. State (Tex.) supra, were stated to be overruled by Wells v. State (1886) 21 Tex. App. 594, 2 S. W. 806, in Sanders v. State (1913) 70 Tex. Crim. Rep. 532, 158 S. W. 291, holding the liability of the sureties on an appeal bond given by the defendant after conviction of a felony is terminated by the reversal of the judgment and the remand of the cause, and the sureties are not liable for the failure of the defendant to appear at the next term of the lower court, but it was considered in the latter case that, had the court affirmed the judgment, the sureties would be liable on his failure to appear in the lower court.

And in Wells v. State (1886) 21 Tex. App. 594, 2 S. W. 806, holding that a recognizance given on appeal to the court of appeals from a conviction in the county court becomes functus officio on the reversal of the case and its remand to the county court, and that the sureties are not liable for the failure of the defendant subsequently to appear in the county court for trial, the court said: "It is only in the case of an affirmance of the judgment of conviction by this court that the defendant's recognizance, given on appeal, can be forfeited. When the judgment of conviction is reversed, and this court awards a new trial to the defendant, the cause stands as it would have stood in case the new trial had been granted by the court below. Code Crim. Proc. arts. 875, 876. In such case the recognizance given on appeal has served its purpose, and is functus officio. The bail bond, or original recognizance of the defendant in such case, still has full force and effect, and it is upon such obligation, and not upon his recognizance on appeal, that he is bound. Ex parte Guffee (1880) 8 Tex. App. 409. Prior to the adoption of the Revised Statutes it was held that the recognizance given by the defendant on appeal could be forfeited in the trial court, after the judgment of conviction had been reversed and the cause remanded by the appellate court. Weaver v. State, and Riviere v. State (Tex.) supra. These decisions were based upon the statutes then in force. Article 876 of the Revised Code of Criminal Procedure was not then enacted, but is a new article inserted by the revisers. We think this article settles the question, and that the decisions above referred to are no longer applicable. There is no question but that, in the case of an affirmation by this court of the judgment of the trial court, the recognizance on appeal is still binding, and may be forfeited upon a breach of its conditions. Code Crim. Proc. art. 875; Thompson v. State (1884) 17 Tex. App. 318. We conclude, therefore, that the recognizance of the defendant on appeal was no longer of any binding force after the reversal of the judgment and the awarding of a new trial by this court, and cannot support the judgment of forfeiture." G. V. I.

P. D. HUGHES, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

Tennessee Supreme Court — February 27, 1922.

(— Tenn. —, 238 S. W. 588.)

Arrest — without warrant — commission of offense — evidence.

1. That one is engaged in violation of the law in the presence of officers does not justify his arrest without warrant, if the officers are not aware of such violation until the search made after his arrest.

[See note on this question beginning on page 652.]

Constitutional law — necessity of pointing out specific provision infringed.

2. To raise the question of admissibility of evidence because of alleged violation of a constitutional right it is not necessary to specify the particular section alleged to have been violated, but it is sufficient to call attention to the particular right alleged to have been infringed.

Search — after unlawful arrest — utilization of evidence discovered.

3. Where police officers arrest one on the highway without a warrant or evidence of commission of crime in their presence, evidence discovered by the search of his person and conveyance subsequently to the arrest cannot be utilized to secure his conviction.

[See 2 R. C. L. 467; 8 R. C. L. 196; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 572.]

Arrest — information of offense — justification for arrest.

4. Information justifying an officer in the belief that an offense is being committed is not sufficient to justify arrest of the suspected person without warrant.

[See 2 R. C. L. 450.]

Breach of peace — transportation of intoxicating liquor.

5. It is a breach of the peace to transport intoxicating liquor, or have it in possession.

Arrest — breach of peace.

6. Under a statute authorizing an officer to arrest for breach of peace threatened in his presence, he may arrest one who is reputed to be engaged in the unlawful sale of liquor, and who from actions and surrounding circumstances he believes to be engaged in transporting such liquor, where such transportation is a breach of the peace.

Evidence — secured by search after arrest — admissibility.

7. Evidence of possession of intoxicating liquors, secured by search of one arrested by officers for breach of the peace threatened in their presence, may be admitted against him upon trial for possession and transportation of such liquor.

ERROR to the Criminal Court for Putnam County (Gardenhire, J.) to review a judgment convicting defendant of violating the prohibition law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Worth Bryant and V. E. Bockman for plaintiff in error.

Mr. William H. Swiggart, Jr., for the State.

L. D. Smith, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff in error, P. D. Hughes, was convicted in the criminal court of Putnam county on an indictment charging him with violating the provisions of chapter 12 of the Acts of 1917, prohibiting the receipt, possession, and transportation of intoxicating liquors. By consent the trial was had before the trial judge without the intervention of a jury, who, after hearing the evidence, found the plaintiff in error guilty, and after overruling motion for new trial entered judgment against him for a fine of $50 and a sentence of six months in the workhouse.

The questions presented for our determination arise upon the action of the trial court on exceptions to the testimony introduced by the state. The state introduced three witnesses, namely, C. N. Gracey, a United States deputy collector, W. M. Stout, sheriff of Putnam county, and Bill Gailbreath, who seems not to have held any official position. The testimony of each of these witnesses, to which exception was taken, is substantially that given by Sheriff Stout, and is as follows:

W. M. Stout, sheriff of Putnam county, in which county this offense was committed, if at all, testified that he, in company with Gracey, Tyler, and Gailbreath, was on the Buffalo valley road west of Baxter, and saw plaintiff in error and one Stone come out of a road toward the Buffalo valley road carrying a nail keg. He says: "We decided probably that they had whisky," and that, after running their car around the hill out of sight of the plaintiff in error, he, Gailbreath, and Tyler went back toward where the car of the plaintiff in error was standing, near the side of the road. Plaintiff in error had gotten into his car and started toward Baxter. "We got in the road in front of them and made them stop, and we searched their car, and found in this nail keg 1 gallon of whisky in a long dark bottle."

He says further: "We were not out looking for these boys on this occasion, but just happened to see them, and suspicioned that they had whisky. We had no warrant to search or seize the car or whisky, or for the arrest of either of the defendants. I had had some reports that the defendant, Hughes, was engaged in some way in whisky traffic, and seeing them come into the road with the keg, and from their actions and conduct and the reports I had received, I had reason to believe that it was whisky, and when I made a search it proved to be whisky."

The grounds of the exception to this evidence are "that the parties in question had no right to hold him up while traveling upon a public highway, and seize and search his car without a search warrant, and without knowing that he had whisky, either on his person or in the car; by so doing they violated defendant's constitutional rights against unreasonable seizure and search."

This exception was overruled by the court, and due exception was taken to the court's action thereon. The court's ruling, as stated in the bill of exceptions, is: "The court was of the opinion that it was not an unreasonable search, that the offense was committed in the presence of the officers, and that they were justified in making the arrest, as the search resulted in finding whisky."

The evidence introduced by the state unquestionably made a case of violating the liquor laws of the state against the plaintiff in error, and the only question for our determination is whether this evidence can be rightfully made the basis of conviction.

tion, having been obtained and procured in the manner indicated. This involves the consideration of two questions: First, whether the act of the officers in arresting the plaintiff in error and in searching his car was a violation of the constitutional rights of the plaintiff in error, which protect him against unlawful searches and seizures; and, second, if the method of making evident this violation of the law was of itself unlawful, and violated the constitutional rights of the plaintiff in error, was the evidence nevertheless admissible, and can it properly be made the basis of a conviction?

A negative answer to the last question stated is based by counsel for plaintiff in error upon the provisions of §§ 7 and 9 of article 1 of the Constitution.

Section 7 provides that "the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers and possessions, from unreasonable searches and seizures, and that general warrants, whereby an officer may be commanded to search suspected places, without evidence of the fact committed, or to seize any person or persons not named, whose offenses are not particularly described and supported by evidence, are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be granted."

Section 9 provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused hath the right to be heard by himself and his counsel; to demand the nature . . . of the accusation against him, . . . and shall not be compelled to give evidence against himself."

In his exception to the testimony the plaintiff in error did not specify that the admission of this testimony violated any of his rights under § 9 of article 1 of the Constitution, nor did he, in making exceptions, specify the particular clause of the Constitution which he claimed was or would be violated by the admission of this testimony; but his exception was based upon the ground that the conduct of the witnesses was unlawful and violated his constitutional rights against unreasonable search and seizure. It was not necessary, in order to raise the question, for the plaintiff in error to specifically point out by numbers the particular sections of the Constitution which he claimed were being violated; nor are we justified in assuming, as is argued by the attorney general, that the plaintiff in error, in his exceptions, referred only to the provisions of the Federal Constitution which are similar to those found in our state Constitution. It was sufficient to raise the question to call attention to the particular right which is guaranteed to the citizen under our own Constitution. If any constitutional right of plaintiff in error has been violated in this case, it is referable to § 7, and therefore it will be unnecessary to consider whether his rights under § 9 were also violated.

There is much apparent, if not actual, conflict in the decisions, with respect to the admissibility of testimony obtained by unlawful arrest and search. This court had occasion to review the subject quite fully in the case of Cohn v. State, 120 Tenn. 61-75, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 109 S. W. 1149, 15 Ann. Cas. 1201. The question has more recently come under review by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Amos v. United States, 255 U. S. 313, 65 L. ed. 654, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266, decided February 28, 1921, published by Lawyers' Co-operative Publishing Company in Advance Sheets of April 1, 1921, and in Gouled v. United States, 255 U. S. 298, 65 L. ed. 647, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261, decided at the same time and published in the same number of the Advance Sheets.

There is no conflict of authority upon the proposition that the constitutional provisions relied upon can only be invoked in this way to protect the citizen against the activities of the government. For example, the provisions of the Federal Constitution can only be invoked as against the activities of the agencies of the Federal government, and likewise the rights of the citizens involved in the constitutional provisions referred to are only protected against the actions of officers of the state government. It is only when persons are acting under color of authority from the government that evidence developed in violation of the law can be at all rejected. Cohn v. State, 120 Tenn. 61, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 451, 109 S. W. 1149, 15 Ann. Cas. 1201; Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 619, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524; Adams v. New York, 192 U. S. 586, 48 L. ed. 577, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 372. None of the cases go to the extent of holding that because evidence has been obtained by unlawful means it is therefore inadmissible; it is only when evidence has been obtained by means of unlawful conduct of government officials, in violation of the provisions of the Constitution referred to, that it has been held inadmissible in any of the cases.

Constitutional law—necessity of pointing out specific provision infringed.

In the Cohn Case, supra, Cohn had been convicted for the offense of selling liquors and cigarette papers on Sunday, contrary to the statute. The case was made out against him by the testimony of John Yeaman, a deputy sheriff of Davidson county, and another witness. He testified in substance: That he and two deputies went to Cohn's place about 6 o'clock on Sunday morning, January 13, 1907, and mounted a stairway leading up by the side of the saloon, and, after they had reached a point about half up the stairway, they stopped and removed some bricks from the wall, and the mortar along with them, being careful to draw the bricks and the mortar out upon the stairway, so as to give no indication, in the saloon, of what they were doing on the stairway; that the hole thus made was smaller on the inside of the saloon than on the outside; that, having made this peephole, they sat and watched occurrences in the saloon; that they saw Lem Horton and Charles Perkins enter the barroom by a rear door, and they were soon followed by a crowd; that witness and those who were with him watched the persons inside for an hour; that Lem Horton and Charles Perkins sold, and received money for, a great many drinks of whisky and beer, certainly more than three; that they saw a large box of cigarette papers, and saw Lem Horton reach under the bar, take out this box, and sell a book of them to a customer, one Henry Ewing; that he rang up this sale of the cigarette papers, just as he did the drinks, in the cash register; that the witness and the others with him got the cigarette papers and the sale book and brought them to court. It was further testified that Horton and Perkins worked for Cohn.

When this evidence was given, Cohn, by his counsel, moved the court to strike out the entire testimony, because it was inadmissible and incompetent upon the ground that it was obtained illegally and contrary to the laws of the state and to the state and Federal Constitutions. The trial court overruled the exception, and his action thereon was the basis of the appeal to this court. The court sustained the action of the trial court, and held that the evidence thus obtained was not in violation of the constitutional provisions against unreasonable searches and seizures, nor violative of the constitutional inhibition against compelling a party in criminal cases to give testimony against himself. In so holding the court said: "We think the evidence was competent. The unreasonable search and seizure against which the constitutional provision was designed to operate was that made through governmental agency, and has no bearing upon the unauthorized acts of private persons, or of petty officers of the law. Nor has the inhibition against compelling a person charged with crime to incriminate himself any more bearing upon the present controversy, since the plaintiffs in error were not required to testify. Nor was any presumption indulged or permitted against them because of their silence. Nor were the plaintiffs in error required to produce any private papers that would so speak as to incriminate them. It is true that the act of Yeaman and his companions in making a hole in the wall and spying upon the inmates of the building was an unlawful one, for which they were subject to punishment. Still, although the evidence was thus procured, it would not be rejected by the court, if relevant to the issue. 4 Wigmore, Ev. §§ 2183, 2264; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 254a; 2 Elliott, Ev. § 1013."

In support of the conclusion above quoted the court referred to quite a number of cases from different jurisdictions. In some of the cases the testimony was held admissible upon the theory that, the evidence being proper in itself, the court could take no notice of how it was obtained. In other cases it was held that the restrictions of the Constitution were intended to operate only upon legislative bodies, so as to render ineffectual any effort to legalize by statute what the people expressly stipulated could in no event be made lawful; upon executives, so that no law violative of this constitutional inhibition should ever be enforced; and upon the judiciary, so as to render it the duty of the courts to denounce as unlawful every reasonable search and seizure, whether confessedly without any color of authority, or sought to be justified under the guise of legislative sanction. In still other cases the theory of admissibility was that, when an official of the state exceeded his authority, he would be deemed as acting, not for the state, but for himself only, and therefore he alone, and not the state, should be held accountable for his acts.

The reasoning of the cases referred to in the Cohn Case is not necessarily established by the decisions upon the facts of that case. In that case the officer of the law went about discovering the evidence in an unlawful way; but it was not a case in which the citizen was compelled to produce evidence of his own guilt, nor one in which an unlawful act of the officer itself disclosed the unlawful act of the defendant. It was a case in which the officers of the law themselves violated the law in order to place themselves in a situation to testify as to the facts, and not one in which the officers produced and disclosed a violation of the law by an invasion of the defendant's constitutional right against unlawful search and seizure. Many of the cases may be reconciled by observing the distinction just indicated. This distinction is illustrated by the case of Burdeau v. McDowell, decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, June 1, 1921, and reported in 256 U. S. 465, 65 L. ed. 1048, 13 A.L.R. 1159, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 574.

It is pointed out in the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis, concurred in by Mr. Justice Holmes, that the distinction made by the majority of the court in that case is one without a difference. Nevertheless, this may account for the apparent conflict in the cases themselves. It was held by the majority of the court in that case that the constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures and self-incriminations are not violated, where Federal prosecuting authorities, to whom incriminating papers stolen by private persons have been delivered, retain them with a view to their use in subsequent investigations, where said papers will be part of the evidence against the accused, and may be used against him on the trial, should an indictment be returned; the government having had no part in the wrongful taking.

But in cases where the action of the governmental authorities is unlawful and violative of the constitutional rights of the citizen, and directly developed and disclosed the facts of the violation of the law, the government cannot rely upon the evidence thus unlawfully obtained by its agents. The cases of Amos and Gouled, supra, are direct authority for the proposition just stated.

In the Amos Case, 225 U. S. 313, 65 L. ed. 654, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 266, supra, the government's witnesses were deputy collectors of internal revenue. They went to the defendant's home, and, not finding him there, but finding a woman who stated she was his wife, told her that they were revenue officers and had come to search the premises for violation of the revenue law. Thereupon the woman opened the store, and the witnesses entered and in a barrel of peas found a bottle containing blockade whisky. On cross-examination these witnesses testified that they had no warrant for the arrest of the defendant, nor any search warrant to search his house. Thereupon their testimony was excepted to, but the trial court admitted it over the defendant's objection. With respect to this action of the trial court the Supreme Court said:

"The answer of the government to the claim that the trial court erred in the two rulings we have described is that the petition for the return of defendant's property was properly denied, because it came too late when presented after the jury was impaneled and the trial, to that extent, commenced, and that the denial of the motion to exclude the property and the testimony of the government agents relating thereto, after the manner of the search of defendant's home had been described, was justified by the rule that in the progress of the trial of criminal cases courts will not stop to frame a collateral issue to inquire whether evidence offered, otherwise competent, was lawfully or unlawfully obtained.

"Plainly, the questions thus presented for decision are ruled by the conclusions this day announced in No. 250, Gouled v. United States, 255 U. S. 298, 66 L. ed. 647, 41 Sup. Ct. Rep. 261."

The court thereupon held the action of the trial court in admitting the evidence aforesaid to be reversible error. The reasoning of the court by which this result was reached had been stated by the court in its opinion in the case of Gouled. The Gouled Case, as stated by the court, was this:

"In a joint indictment the plaintiff in error, Gouled, one Vaughan, an officer of the United States Army, and a third, an attorney at law, were charged in the first count with being parties to a conspiracy to defraud the United States, in violation of § 37 of the Federal Criminal Code [Comp. Stat. § 10,201, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 534], and, in the second count, with having used the mails to promote a scheme to defraud the United States, in violation of § 215 of that Code [Comp. Stat. § 10,384, 7 Fed. Stat. Anno. 2d ed. p. 812]. Vaughan pleaded guilty, the attorney was acquitted, and Gouled, whom we shall refer to as the defendant, was convicted, and thereupon prosecuted error to the circuit court of appeals, which certifies to this court six questions which we are to consider.

"Of these questions, the first two relate to the admission in evidence of a paper surreptitiously taken from the office of the defendant by one acting under direction of officers of the Intelligence Department of the Army of the United States, and the remaining four relate to papers taken from defendant's office under two search warrants, issued pursuant to the Act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. at L. 217, 228, chap. 30, Comp. Stat. §§ 10,496½a, 10,496½b, Fed. Stat. Anno. Supp. 1918, pp. 120, 128). It was objected on the trial, and is here insisted upon, that it was error to admit these papers in evidence, because possession of them was obtained by violating the rights secured to the defendant by the 4th and 5th Amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

"The 4th Amendment reads: 'The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrant shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.'

"The part of the 5th Amendment here involved reads: 'No such person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself.' "

Two of the questions certified to the Supreme Court for answer were:

First. "Is the secret taking, without force, from the house or office of one suspected of crime, of a paper belonging to him, of evidential value only, by a representative of any branch or subdivision of the government of the United States, a violation of the 4th Amendment?"

Second. "Is the admission of such paper in evidence against the same person, when indicted for crime, a violation of the 5th Amendment?"

The facts upon which the answer to these two questions depended were: "The facts derived from the certificate, essential to be considered in answering the first two questions, are: That in January, 1918, it was suspected that the defendant, Gouled, and Vaughan, were conspiring to defraud the government through contracts with it for clothing and equipment; that one Cohen, a private in the Army, attached to the Intelligence Department, and a business acquaintance of defendant Gouled, under direction of his superior officers, pretending to make a friendly call upon the defendant, gained admission to his office, and in his absence, without warrant of any character, seized and carried away several documents; that one of these papers, described as 'of evidential value only,' and belonging to Gouled, was subsequently delivered to the United States district attorney, and was by him introduced in evidence over the objection of the defendant that possession of it was obtained by a violation of the 4th or 5th Amendment to the Constitution; and that the defendant did not know that Cohen had carried away any of his papers until he appeared on the witness stand and detailed the facts with respect thereto as we have stated them, when, necessarily, objection was first made to the admission of the paper in evidence."

The court's answer to these questions is:

"The ground on which the trial court overruled the objection to this paper is not stated, but from the certificate and the argument we must infer that it was admitted, either because it appeared that the possession of it was obtained without the use of force or illegal coercion, or because the objection came too late.

"The prohibition of the 4th Amendment is against all unreasonable searches and seizures, and if for a government officer to obtain entrance to a man's house or office by force, or by an illegal threat or show of force amounting to coercion, and then to search for and seize his private papers would be an unreasonable, and therefore a prohibited, search and seizure, as it certainly would be, it is impossible to successfully contend that a like search and seizure would be a reasonable one if only admission were obtained by stealth, instead of by force or coercion. The security and privacy of the home or office and of the papers of the owner would be as much invaded, and the search and seizure would be as much against his will, in the one case as in the other, and it must, therefore, be regarded as equally in violation of his constitutional rights.

"Without discussing them, we cannot doubt that such decisions as there are in conflict with this conclusion are unsound, and that, whether entrance to the home or office of a person suspected of crime be obtained by a representative of any branch or subdivision of the government of the United States by stealth, or through social acquaintance, or in the guise of a business call, and whether the owner be present or not when he enters any search and seizure subsequently and secretly made in his absence, fall within the scope of the prohibition of the 4th Amendment, and therefore the answer to the first question must be in the affirmative. . . .

"Upon authority of the Boyd Case, 116 U. S. 619, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, this second question must also be answered in the affirmative. In practice, the result is the same to one accused of crime, whether he be obliged to supply evidence against himself, or whether such evidence be obtained by an illegal search of his premises and seizure of his private papers. In either case he is the unwilling source of the evidence, and the 5th Amendment forbids that he shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal case."

This result is said to follow from the spirit of the decisions dealing with these constitutional provisions, and which the court describes as follows: "It would not be possible to add to the emphasis with which the framers of our Constitution and this court (in Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, in Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 58 L. ed. 652, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177, and in Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U. S. 385, 64 L. ed. 319, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182), have declared the importance to political liberty and to the welfare of our country of the due observance of the rights guaranteed under the Constitution by these two Amendments. The effect of the decisions cited is that such rights are declared to be indispensable to the 'full enjoyment of personal security, personal liberty, and private property;' that they are to be regarded as of the very essence of constitutional liberty; and that the guaranty of them is as important and as imperative as are the guaranties of the other fundamental rights of the individual citizen—the right to trial by jury, to the writ of habeas corpus, and to due process of law. It has been repeatedly decided that these Amendments should receive a liberal construction, so as to prevent stealthy encroachment upon or 'gradual depreciation' of the rights secured by them, by imperceptible practice of courts, or by well-intentioned, but mistakenly overzealous, executive officers."

In the Gould Case, just referred to, the court held that not only the papers obtained without a warrant at all, but also other papers which had been seized under search warrants duly and lawfully issued, were obtained in violation of the defendant's constitutional rights. It does not follow that, because property is seized under legal search warrant, the seizure itself is not violative of the constitutional provisions referred to. These particular papers which were seized under search warrants themselves had no pecuniary value; they were valuable only in affording evidence against the accused of the offense of which he was charged. So the question was presented as to whether or not papers of this character, seized under a search warrant, were protected from seizure by the constitutional provisions against unreasonable searches and seizures. The principles of law for determining these questions were stated by the court to be:

"The wording of the 4th Amendment implies that search warrants were in familiar use when the Constitution was adopted, and, plainly, that when issued 'upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized,' searches, and seizures made under them are to be regarded as not unreasonable, and therefore not prohibited by the Amendment. Searches and seizures are as constitutional under the Amendment when made under valid search warrants as they are unconstitutional, because unreasonable, when made without them—the permission of the Amendment has the same constitutional warrant as the prohibition has, and the definition of the former restrains the scope of the latter. All of this is abundantly recognized in the opinions of the Boyd Case, supra, and the Weeks Case, 232 U. S. 383, 58 L. ed. 652, L.R.A.1915B, 834, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 341, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1177, in which it is pointed out that, at the time the Constitution was adopted, stolen or forfeited property, or property liable to duties and concealed to avoid payment of them, excisable articles and books required by law to be kept with respect to them, counterfeit coin, burglars' tools and weapons, implements of gambling, 'and many other things of like character,' might be searched for in home or office, and, if found, might be seized, under search warrants lawfully applied for, issued, and executed.

"Although search warrants have thus been used in many cases ever since the adoption of the Constitution, and although their use has been extended from time to time to meet new cases within the old rules, nevertheless it is clear that, at common law and as the result of the Boyd and Weeks Cases, supra, they may not be used as a means of gaining access to a man's house or office and papers solely for the purpose of making search to secure evidence to be used against him in a criminal or penal proceeding, but that they may be resorted to only when a primary right to such search and seizure may be found in the interest which the public or the complainant may have in the property to be seized, or in the right to the possession of it, or when a valid exercise of the police power renders possession of the property by the accused unlawful and provides that it may be taken. Boyd Case, supra.

"There is no special sanctity in papers, as distinguished from other forms of property, to render them immune from search and seizure, if only they fall within the scope of the principles of the cases in which other property may be seized, and if they be adequately described in the affidavit and warrant. Stolen or forged papers have been so seized (Langdon v. People, 133 Ill. 382, 24 N. E. 874), and lottery tickets, under a statute prohibiting their possession with intent to sell them (Com. v. Dana, 2 Met. 329); and we cannot doubt that contracts may be so used as instruments or agencies for perpetrating frauds upon the government as to give the public an interest in them which would justify the search for and seizure of them, under a properly issued search warrant, for the purpose of preventing further frauds."

It was held by the court that, since the papers had no pecuniary value and the government could not have any interest in the papers themselves,—the only event in which they would have a right to take them into possession,—it could desire their possession only for use as evidence, and to search and seize them for such a purpose would be unlawful.

It was held that, although papers may not have any pecuniary value, nevertheless, if they were of that character which justified the government in seizing them, under the principle stated, they could be used in the prosecution of a suspected person for a crime other than that which may have been described in the affidavit as having been committed by him, but where the seizure was for the purpose only of using the paper as evidence such seizure would be unlawful. The court having held the seizure of these particular papers to have been unlawful, another question propounded to the court was: "If papers of evidential value only be seized under a search warrant and the party from whose house or office they are taken be indicted—if he then move before trial for the return of said papers, and said motion is denied—is the court at trial bound in law to inquire as to the origin of or method of procuring said papers when they are offered in evidence against the party so indicted?"

To this question the court replied: "The papers being of 'evidential value only,' and having been unlawfully seized, this question really is whether, it having been decided on a motion before trial that they should not be returned to the defendant, the trial court, when objection was made to their use on the trial, was bound to again inquire as to the unconstitutional origin of the possession of them. It is plain that the trial court acted upon the rule, widely adopted, that courts in criminal trials will not pause to determine how the possession of evidence tendered has been obtained. While this is a rule of great practical importance, yet, after all, it is only a rule of procedure, and therefore it is not to be applied as a hard and fast formula to every case, regardless of its special circumstances. We think rather that it is a rule to be used to secure the ends of justice under the circumstances presented by each case, and where, in the progress of the trial, it becomes probable that there has been an unconstitutional seizure of papers, it is the duty of the trial court to entertain an objection to their admission or a motion for their exclusion, and to consider and decide the question as then presented, even where a motion to return the papers may have been denied before trial. A rule of practice must not be allowed, for any technical reason, to prevail over a constitutional right.

"In the case we are considering, the certificate shows that a motion to return the papers, seized under the search warrants, was made before the trial and was denied, and that, on the trial of the case before another judge, this ruling was treated as conclusive, although, as we have seen, in the progress of the trial it must have become apparent that the papers had been unconstitutionally seized. The constitutional objection having been renewed, under the circumstances, the court should have inquired as to the origin of the possession of the papers when they were offered in evidence against the defendant."

We are of opinion that the case we have here, as made by the bill of exceptions, falls within the rule applied by the United States Supreme Court in the cases just referred to, rather than that announced in the Cohn Case. The state, having through its executive representatives produced the evidence of a violation of the law by one of its citizens by means prohibited by the Constitution, cannot be permitted through its judicial tribunal to utilize the wrong thus committed against the citizen, to punish the citizen for his wrong; for it was only by violating his constitutionally protected rights that his wrong has been discovered. It is no answer to say that it matters not how a citizen's sins have been found out. Security from unlawful search is the right guaranteed to the citizen, even for the discovery of the citizen's sins. This right we must protect unless we may with impunity disregard our oath to support and enforce the Constitution. The experience of our forefathers with unlawful searches and seizures was deemed by the people who framed the Constitution sufficient to warrant the provision by which, in instances, even the guilty might escape detection and punishment. We are not to be understood as holding that all evidence obtained by unlawful means is inadmissible, but only where, in cases such as we have here, the evidence offered has been produced by violating the constitutional protection against unlawful searches and seizures.

Was the arrest and search of the defendant in this case unlawful? Provision is made by statute in this state for searches in two cases only: One by search warrant issued upon affidavit showing probable cause (Shannon's Code, §§ 7296-7311); and the other when a person charged with a felony is suspected by the magistrate before whom he is brought to have upon his person a dangerous weapon, or anything which may be used as evidence of the commission of the offense, the magistrate may direct him to be searched in his presence (Shannon's Code, § 7312). However, searches are allowable under the common law in cases where persons are lawfully arrested. 2 R. C. L. p. 468. In the text cited it is said: "An officer making an arrest has authority to search the person of his prisoner, even against his will; but a search is justifiable only as an incident to a lawful arrest, and if the arrest is unlawful the search is also unlawful. Thus, an officer acting without a warrant for an arrest, and without attempting to make an arrest, is not justified in making a search of a person upon mere suspicion that he has committed a crime. The officer making an arrest and search of the person of the prisoner may take from him any dangerous weapons, or anything else that he reasonably may deem necessary to his own or the public safety, or for the safe-keeping of the prisoner, and take into his possession the instruments of the crime and such other articles as may be of use as evidence on the trial, or which might enable the prisoner to escape."

Search—after unlawful arrest—utilization of evidence discovered.

Our statute on the subject of searches, to which we have just referred, was taken from the Code of Alabama. The supreme court of Alabama, in discussing the right of search under the statute similar to our own, and under the common law, said, among other things:

"In commenting on article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures, in the case of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. ed. 746, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 524, Mr. Justice Bradley, delivering the opinion, quoted with approbation from Lord Camden as follows: 'By the laws of England, every invasion of private property, be it ever so minute, is a trespass. No man can set his foot on my ground without my license, but he is liable to an action, though the damage be nothing. If he admits the fact, he is bound to show, by way of justification, that some positive law has justified or excused him. The justification is submitted to the judges who are to look into the books, and see if such a justification can be maintained by the text of the statute law, or by the principles of the common law. If no such excuse can be found or produced, the silence of the books is an authority against the defendant. According to this reasoning, it is now incumbent upon the defendants to show the law by which this seizure was warranted. If that cannot be done, it is trespass.' These are the principles which protect every citizen of this government in the enjoyment of his personal liberty, his home, and his property, and no other 'can abide the pure atmosphere of a government of political liberty and personal freedom.'

"This court in Chastang v. State, 83 Ala. 30, 3 So. 304, 7 Am. Crim. Rep. 135, referring to the opinion of Justice Bradley, declared: 'We indorse and approve everything said therein.' The statute law provides for the issuance of search warrants, but specifies on what grounds they are to be issued, and only on probable cause, supported by affidavit, naming the person, and particularly describing the property and place to be searched. Code, §§ 4727-4729. The search and seizure in the present case were not made under these statutory provisions. Section 4745 of the Code we have quoted above, and which provides that when a person is charged with a felony, and is supposed to have a dangerous weapon, or anything which may be used as evidence of the commission of the offense, he may be searched, and such weapon or thing may be seized and retained, subject to the order of the court in which the defendant is to be tried.

The question as to the dangerous weapon does not arise in this case. That part of the statute which authorizes the seizure and retention of 'anything which may be used as evidence' on the prosecution is a mere statutory enactment of the common law. At common law the arresting officer had the right to remove money from the defendant's person; but this right was limited to cases in which the money was connected with the offense, or to be used as evidence. See Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. § 60; Bishop, Crim. Proc. §§ 210, 211, and the cases cited in support of the text." Ex parte Hurn, 92 Ala. 102, 13 L.R.A. 124, 25 Am. St. Rep. 23, 9 So. 515.

So that, if the arrest is lawful, a search revealing evidence of the offense for which a person is arrested is not unreasonable, or violative of § 7 of article 1 of the Constitution.

The arrest in this case was made by the sheriff without a warrant. It is contended for the state that the arrest was lawful, notwithstanding it was made without a warrant, for the reason that the plaintiff in error was engaged in the commission of an offense in the presence of the officers. The circuit judge was of the opinion that this arrest was authorized, because after the arrest it was found that the plaintiff in error had intoxicating liquor in his possession.

It does not follow from the fact that evidence discovered upon the arrest proved the commission of an offense, that the arrest itself was

Arrest—without warrant—commission of offense—evidence.

authorized. Under our statute (Shannon's Code, § 6997) an officer may without a warrant arrest a person for a public offense committed in his presence. That means that the offense, or the facts constituting the offense, must be revealed in the presence of the officer. An officer cannot lawfully arrest a person without a warrant and search his person for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not he has violated the law. Even if the person arrested were in fact violating the law, the offense was not in legal contemplation committed in the presence of the officer, and such an arrest is unauthorized, where the facts constituting the offense are incapable of being observed, or are not observed by the officer. That such is the rule of law under our statutes is readily seen by an examination of the case of Hurd v. State, 119 Tenn. 583, 108 S. W. 1064. In that case the plaintiff in error had just shot one officer with a pistol, and was seen by several persons running down the street with a pistol in his hand, when another officer attempted to arrest him. He did, in fact, have the pistol at the time of the attempted arrest, because he turned upon the officer and shot and killed him. Yet it was held by this court that such an attempted arrest was unlawful, and plaintiff in error had a right to resist it. Under the circumstances the trial judge instructed the jury: "If deceased was a policeman in the city of Chattanooga at the time he was killed, and direct information was brought to him that defendant had a pistol on his person, it was his duty, as well as his lawful authority, to arrest said Hurd, with or without a warrant, and as to whether or not he was in uniform would be immaterial."

The court held that this instruction was erroneous, saying: "It is clear from the record that the deceased was attempting to arrest the defendant for a misdemeanor which was not committed in his presence, but the fact of its commission was communicated by others, and the instruction of the trial judge that deceased had lawful authority to arrest defendant without a warrant was erroneous."

And this was true, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant, when the officer attempted to arrest him, had the pistol, and in fact used the pistol on the officer in resisting arrest.

It follows, therefore, that it cannot be said that the plaintiff in error was in the commission of an offense in the presence of the officers, so as to justify the arrest, merely from the fact that, when the arrest was effected, it was found that he was actually committing an offense. Neither is it sufficient to —information of offense—justification for arrest.

that the officer had information justifying him in the belief that an offense was being committed, for the facts constituting the offense must have been within the knowledge of the officer, and that knowledge must have been revealed in the officer's presence. To illustrate: If a person has in his possession a concealed weapon, if he exposes it in the presence of an officer or uses it, and the officer sees it, then the officer may lawfully arrest him without a warrant. A person may have a concealed weapon upon his person, but if there is no evidence of that fact apparent to an officer his arrest would be unwarranted. The plaintiff in error may have been, as it was subsequently developed, engaged in the transportation of liquor in violation of the law, but the fact of his having liquor was not evident to the officer making the arrest. It must be held, therefore, that the arrest cannot be justified upon the ground of the commission of an offense in the presence of the officers.

But an officer may lawfully arrest a person if a breach of the peace is threatened in his presence. In such a case it is not necessary for the officer to see and know that the law is being violated. Indeed, he may arrest a person in order to prevent a violation of the law. In such a case he may lawfully arrest the person, if the circumstances are sufficient to justify the belief in the mind of a prudent officer, acting in good faith, that a breach of the peace is about to occur. Of course, an arrest for a breach of the peace cannot be justified merely upon belief or suspicion existing in the mind of the officer; but, where the actions of the person and the surrounding circumstances are such as to indicate a threatened breach of the peace, the arrest may be lawfully made. In this case the plaintiff in error had left his automobile on the side of the road. He was approaching his car, carrying a keg having the appearance of a nail keg, or horseshoe keg. There was no store or other place in the direction from which he was coming to indicate that this keg contained nails, or horseshoes, or other articles ordinarily contained in a container of that kind. Plaintiff in error was reputed to be engaged in the unlawful sale of liquor. These circumstances justified the officer in believing that a violation of the law was about to be committed. It is a breach of the peace to transport intoxicating liquors.

State ex rel. Thompson v. Reichman, 135 Tenn. 653, 188 S. W. 225, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 889. In that case the court said: "The unlawful sale of liquor being a breach of the peace, it is not always necessary for an officer to actually see a sale before he is authorized to make an arrest without a warrant. If, in his presence, such a sale is threatened, he is authorized to arrest as for any other threatened breach of the peace. The threat need not be in words. If one man puts himself in a position to assault, and by his acts manifests a purpose to assault another, a breach of the peace is undoubtedly threatened. How does this principle apply to a threatened unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors? The condemnation of our statutes is confined to the selling of such liquors. It is not unlawful for a man to have liquors, in any quantity, in his home or in his place of business. The mere presence of liquors, therefore, without more, is not a public offense, and will not under all circumstances indicate a purpose or threat to sell them unlawfully. Thus, a stock of liquors in a house from which an interstate shipping business is being done may have no unlawful significance. . . . Our act authorizing an arrest for a threatened breach of the peace was taken from the Alabama Code of 1852. And we quote, with approval, what the supreme court of that state has said in sustaining the right of an officer to prevent a threatened breach of the peace, as follows: "Two great and vital principles of government are to be kept steadily in view, in pronouncing on conduct, such as is brought to view in this record; the liberty of a citizen, and the peace and repose of society. Civil liberty is natural liberty, shorn of the excesses which invade and trench on the equal liberty of others. No one can claim the right to violate the law, and precautionary force is justified, to prevent a greater impending evil. Such force, however, is in its nature remedial, and can be carried no further than is reasonably necessary to prevent the threatened wrong. Prevention is less hurtful than redress, and, when prudently exercised, is not only justified, but is commended of the law. No man can rightfully complain of any encroachment upon personal liberty, which he himself, by his lawlessness or violence, has rendered necessary for the safety and protection of others. It is liberty as defined by law, not unbridled license, our free Constitution guarantees to every man,—the humblest, equally with the most exalted." Hayes v. Mitchell, 69 Ala. 454."

At the time of the Reichman Case, above referred to, receiving, having in possession, and transporting liquor was not a violation of the law; but it has been made such by subsequent legislation, and for the same reasons constitutes a breach of the peace, and therefore, when threatened under circumstances justifying apprehension in the presence of an officer, the officer may lawfully arrest the person about to commit it and search him for evidence of a violation.

We hold, therefore, that the arrest of the plaintiff in error under the circumstances was lawful, under the provisions of our statute which authorize an officer to arrest a person without a warrant for a breach of the peace threatened in his presence. The arrest being lawful, the search was also lawful, to the extent that it resulted in finding upon the person or in the possession of the plaintiff in error the evidence of the fact that he was about to violate the law, and this evidence was competent and admissible. There is, therefore, no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and the same will be in all things affirmed.

Arrest—breach of peace.

Evidence—secured by search after arrest—admissibility.

ANNOTATION.

Transportation of concealed liquor as an offense within presence of officer authorizing an arrest without a warrant.

The reported case (HUGHES v. STATE, ante, 639), in holding that the transportation of concealed liquor is not an offense in the presence of an officer so as to authorize an arrest without a warrant, finds support in Douglass v. State (1921). — Ga. —, 110 S. E. 168, a trial for homicide of sheriff, killed while attempting to arrest one on suspicion that he was illegally transporting liquor concealed in an automobile, which held that an instruction to the effect, inter alia, that an officer has a right to arrest, without a warrant, one who is committing an offense in his presence, was erroneous under the circumstances, the basis of the decision being that the offense was not committed in the presence of the officer.

And see Caffinni v. Hermann (1914) 112 Me. 282, 91 Atl. 1009, which is to the effect that an officer has no authority to arrest, without a warrant, one whom he suspects is illegally transporting intoxicating liquor in a suit case. See also State v. Lutz (1919) 85 W. Va. 330, 101 S. E. 434.

The reported case (HUGHES v. STATE, ante, 639) finds further support by analogy in Roberson v. State (1901) 43 Fla. 156, 52 L.R.A. 751, 29 So. 535; Pickett v. State (1896) 99 Ga. 12, 59 Am. St. Rep. 226, 25 S. W. 608; Hughes v. State (1907) 2 Ga. App. 29, 58 S. E. 390; Stewart v. State (1907) 2 Ga. App. 98, 58 S. E. 395; Ballard v. State (1885) 43 Ohio St. 340, 1 N. E. 76, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 36; Rasey v. Ciccolino (1913) 1 Ohio App. 194, 18 Ohio C. C. N. S. 331, 34 Ohio C. C. 294; State v. Lutz (W. Va.) supra, which held that the carrying of concealed weapons, contrary to law, is not an offense committed in the officer's presence so as to authorize an arrest without a warrant.

In Pickett v. State (1896) 99 Ga. 12, 59 Am. St. Rep. 226, 25 S. W. 608, supra, which was cited in Douglass v. State (Ga.) supra, as authority for its decision, the court said: "While, under § 4223 of the Code, an officer may, without a warrant, make an arrest for an offense committed in his presence, he has no authority, upon bare suspicion or upon mere information derived from others, to arrest a citizen and search his person in order to ascertain whether or not he is carrying a concealed weapon in violation of law. The Constitution of this state expressly declares in the Bill of Rights that the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated. If any search is unreasonable and obnoxious to our fundamental law, it is one of the kind with which we are now dealing, even if the person arrested did in fact have a pistol concealed about his person. The fact not being discoverable without a search, the offense of thus carrying it was not, in legal contemplation, committed in the presence of the officer, and the latter violated a sacred constitutional right of the citizen in assuming to exercise a pretended authority to search his person in order to expose his suspected criminality."

And in Roberson v. State (Fla.) supra, where an officer was killed while attempting to arrest one on information that he was carrying a concealed weapon, the court, in holding that an arrest is unlawful under such circumstances, said: "From this testimony we gather the following brief summary of the circumstances attending the arrest of the defendant that resulted in this unfortunate homicide: The defendant and his brother, out of the presence and view of the two officers, committed a breach of the peace by shoving a woman from the sidewalk, at the same time intimidating her by the threatening display of a pistol. After this actual breach of the peace comes to an end, the two brothers pass on, and the woman seeks the two officers (deputy sheriffs), and informs them of the behavior of the two brothers, and also informs them that said two brothers are carrying pistols concealed on their persons. Neither of the two officers knew that the two brothers were carrying concealed weapons, except from what the woman told them. Upon receiving this information from the woman, the two officers at once, without procuring a warrant for their arrest, start out to find the brothers, the woman accompanying them to point them out. Upon discovering the two brothers walking close together, the two officers step up behind them, one officer on the right and the other on the left of the defendant brother, the deceased officer saying, 'Boys, I have to arrest you for carrying concealed weapons,' and at the time taking hold of the arm of the defendant, while the other officer laid his hand on the other arm of the defendant. The defendant instantly swung himself loose from the grasp of the officers, whipped out his pistol, and fired two shots in rapid succession at the officer Sadler, then ran away, turning as he ran, and firing two or three shots more at Sadler, who had been mortally wounded by one of the two first shots. Under these circumstances, was the arrest of the defendant by the two officers, without a warrant, authorized by law? We think that it was not a lawful arrest. The antecedent infraction of the peace by the defendant had ended, and had occurred out of the presence and view of the officers, and at the time of the arrest the defendant was conducting himself in a quiet, peaceable, and orderly manner. It is true, as subsequent events quickly proved, that he was at the time secretly armed with a pistol, but he was at the time making no threatening display of it; and it would seem to be uttering a solecism to say that a man behaving himself in a quiet, peaceable, and orderly manner, but having a pistol quietly concealed on his person, tended towards a disturber of the peace from the bare fact of being secretly armed with such pistol. Breaches of the peace generally manifest themselves by some outward, visible, audible, or violent demonstration; not from quiet, orderly, and peaceable acts secretly done, though such acts may be mala prohibita. The carrying of arms in a quiet, peaceable, and orderly manner, but concealed on or about the person, is not either a breach of the peace or malum in se. Neither does it, of itself, tend to a breach of the peace, but it becomes a misdemeanor only because it is prohibited by statute. The statute does not declare it to be a breach of the peace, nor does the statute authorize an arrest without warrant for its infraction."

As to constitutional guaranties against unreasonable searches and seizures as applied to a search for, or a seizure of, intoxicating liquors, see annotations in 3 A.L.R. 1514, and 13 A.L.R. 1316.

J. H. B.

ANNA E. LEET, Admrx., etc., of Charles F. Leet, Deceased,
v.

WILLIAM H. BLOCK et al.

Indiana Supreme Court — October 13, 1914.

(182 Ind. 271, 106 N. E. 373.)

Master and servant — statutory duty to inspect — independent contractor.

A property owner is not rendered liable for injury to an employee of an independent contractor performing work upon his building, through the breaking of a scaffold rope, by a statute providing that it is the duty of all owners, contractors, etc., engaged in the construction of any building, to see that all rope, etc., is carefully selected, inspected, and tested, and generally it shall be the duty of all owners and all other persons having charge of, or responsible for, any work involving risk or danger to employees, to use every precaution practicable for the protection and safety of life.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

CROSS WRITS of error from the Superior Court for Marion County (Collier, J.) to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff against defendant Armond, in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's intestate; plaintiff assigning as error the sustaining of motions for judgment on the answers to interrogatories in favor of some defendants, and defendants assigning as error the overruling of their motions for new trial. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. H. N. Spaan, Ralph M. Spaan, and George W. Curtis for plaintiff.

Messrs. John B. Elam, J. W. Fesler, and Harvey J. Elam, for defendants:

At common law neither of the appellees would be liable, because the deceased was injured by the act of an independent subcontractor for whom the plaintiff's decedent was working, and for whose acts these appellees were not responsible.

Stalder v. Huntington, 153 Ind. 354, 55 N. E. 88; Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farver, 111 Ind. 195, 60 Am. Rep. 696, 12 N. E. 296; Schip v. Pabst Brewing Co. 64 Minn. 22, 66 N. W. 3.

Even if the Statute of 1911 does declare that the erection of a building is a dangerous occupation, that fact would not make either the owner or general contractor liable to an employee of a subcontractor, injured on account of the negligence of such subcontractor.

Stalder v. Huntington, and Schip v. Pabst Brewing Co. supra; Mohr v. McKenzie, 60 Ill. App. 575; Pender v. Raggs, 178 Pa. 337, 35 Atl. 1135; Callan v. Pugh, 54 App. Div. 545, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1118; Southern Oil Co. v. Church, 32 Tex. Civ. App. 325, 74 S. W. 797, 75 S. W. 817, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 245; Central Coal & I. Co. v. Bailey, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 973, 76 S. W. 842.

Where the facts found do not plainly and clearly show liability, a new trial should be ordered.

Shoner v. Pennsylvania Co. 130 Ind. 170, 28 N. E. 616, 29 N. E. 775; Osborn v. Adams Brick Co. 52 Ind. App. 189, 99 N. E. 530, 100 N. E. 472.

Morris, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action for damages for the death of Charles F. Leet against appellees William H. Block and Bedford Stone & Construction Company, and also against John Armond.

The complaint alleges that Block was the owner of certain real estate in Indianapolis, and in 1911 constructed a business block thereon; that said Block had complete and exclusive control of the construction of the building, and employed the defendants Bedford Stone & Construction Company and John Armond to do certain parts of the work under contracts the terms of which are unknown to plaintiff; that plaintiff's decedent was employed by defendants on June 24, 1911, while the construction work was unfinished, to clean certain stonework on the building, which required him to work on a scaffold suspended by ropes; that one of the ropes broke, causing the fall of the scaffold from the seventh story of the building, and resulting in injuries which caused decedent's death; that the injury was caused by a defective rope, which was negligently provided by defendants, to support the scaffold.

There was a verdict for plaintiff, accompanied with answers to interrogatories. Appellees Block and Bedford Company each filed a motion for judgment non obstante and for a new trial. Each motion for a new trial was overruled, but those for judgment on the answers to interrogatories were sustained, and judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against the defendant Armond and in favor of Block and the Bedford Company. Appellant assigns as error the sustaining of the motions for judgment on the answers to interrogatories. Appellees each assign as cross error the overruling of the motion for a new trial. When the accident occurred, there was in effect the Act of March 6, 1911, relating to dangerous occupations. Acts 1911, p. 597; Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 3862a.

Section 1 of the act provides that every employer or person managing or conducting any work of the character mentioned in the act is, for the purposes thereof, conducting a dangerous occupation at the time of such occurrence.

Section 4 (Burns's Anno. Stat. § 3862d) of the act provides that: "It is hereby made the duty of all owners, contractors, subcontractors, . . . engaged in the . . . construction . . . of any building, . . . to see and to require that all . . . rope, . . . appliances, . . . contrivances . . . are carefully selected, inspected and tested, so as to detect and exclude defects and dangerous conditions, and that all scaffolding, . . . and all contrivances used, are amply, adequately and properly constructed, . . . and, generally, it shall be the duty of all owners, . . . contractors, subcontractors, and all other persons having charge of, or responsible for, any work, . . . involving risk or danger to employees, . . . to use every device, care and precaution which it is practicable . . . to use for the protection and safety of life, limb and health, . . . without regard to additional cost, . . . the first concern being safety to life, limb and health." (Italics ours.)

Section 5 (Burns's Anno. Stat. § 3862e) makes it a misdemeanor to violate any provision of the act.

Appellee Block let the construction of the building to appellee Bedford Stone & Construction Company, but the terms of the contract are not set forth in the answers to interrogatories. The jury found specially that defendant Armond made a contract with the Bedford Company for the cleaning of certain parts of the building, under which Armond was to furnish his own labor and material and do the cleaning for a lump sum of money; that Armond employed decedent to work at the cleaning, and paid his wages for his work; that Block was "indirectly" a party to the contract between the Bedford Company and Armond.

Counsel for appellees rely on the defense that the accident was caused by the negligence of Armond, an independent contractor. Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley, 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220. Appellant's counsel contend that the said Act of 1911 renders such doctrine unavailable to appellees. In instructing the jury, the trial court adopted appellant's theory, and, by instructions numbered 10 and 13, informed the jury that if Block let the contract for the erection of the building to the Bedford Company, and the latter sublet the cleaning to Armond, it was nevertheless the duty of Block and the Bedford Company to test and inspect, for defects, the scaffold ropes used by the subcontractor. Afterwards, on presentation of appellees' motions for judgment non obstante, the court concluded that the act in question did not deprive appellees of the "independent contractor" defense, and sustained the motions. Each motion for a new trial assigned, as cause therefor, error in the giving of said instructions 10 and 13.

Does the Act of 1911 impose on the owner and contractor such duties of testing and inspecting as to deprive each of them of the "independent contractor" defense? We are of the opinion that the question must be answered in the negative. The act evinces no legislative intent to impose a duty of testing and inspecting appliances, except on the particular owner, contractor, or subcontractor who has "charge of," or is "responsible for," the work, etc., in question. While the act does materially change the common-law duties of the employer and impose on him greater obligations in relation to the safety of employees, it was not the legislative purpose to make the owner liable for an injury occurring to an employee of a contractor or subcontractor because of the latter's negligence, in cases where the owner lets a contract for the particular work, without reserving any control over the manner of the work or the character of appliances used. It was the purpose of the enactment to fix a higher standard of care on the person having the particular work in charge, whether such person be owner, contractor, subcontractor, or other person, but the language of the statute, considered as a whole, precludes the theory of any intent to eliminate the doctrine of independent contractor.

In June, 1910, an initiative petition for an act was filed in the office of the secretary of state of Oregon, pursuant to the provisions of the Constitution of that state. At the general election in November, 1910, the same was approved by the voters of the state, and became a law by proclamation of the governor in December, 1910. General Laws of Oregon 1911, p. 16. Section 4 of said Act of 1911 is a substantial copy of § 1 of the Oregon law. In Tamm v. Sauset (1913) 67 Or. 292, L.R.A.1917D, 988, 135 Pac. 868, the supreme court of that state considered a case similar to this one, and, in determining the effect of § 1 of said initiative act on the common-law doctrine of independent contractor, said: "To take up the case in hand, the Employers' Liability Act particularizes the class, such as owners, contractors, subcontractors, corporations, or persons whatsoever engaged in certain activities shall see that the materials employed and the appliances used are carefully selected, inspected, and tested, so as to detect any defects. The evident intent of the statute was to hold responsible, for personal injuries to an employee, only that member of the class enumerated who was engaged in the undertaking or enterprise embraced in the statute, whereby the injury occurred. To conceive otherwise would be going wide of the rule established by this court in the case of Lawton v. Morgan, Fliedner & Boyce, 66 Or. 292, 131 Pac. 314, 134 Pac. 1037. The initiative act does fix a high standard of care, a violation of which is negligence per se, but lays that care to the door of the person having the work in charge, and, in consequence thereof, the application of the enactment must be circumscribed to that particular source from which or from whom authority and control of the instrumentalities and individuals emanate."

20 A.L.R.—42.

We are of the opinion that the court erred in instructions numbered 10 and 13, given to the jury, because each proceeds on the erroneous theory that our Act of 1911 abrogated the common-law right of appellees Block and the Bedford Company to rely on the defense of independent contractor. However, in awarding judgment in favor of Block and the Bedford Company, reversible error was committed, because the answers to interrogatories do not show with sufficient certainty that Armond was an independent subcontractor, within the rule that permits of such defense by the owner and contractor. This proposition is practically conceded by counsel for appellees, who evidently assign cross errors because thereof.

Master and servant—statutory duty to inspect—independent contractor.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to overrule appellees' respective motions for judgment on the answers to interrogatories, and to sustain their motions for a new trial.

NOTE.

The elements bearing directly upon the quality of the contract as affecting the character of one as an independent contractor is the subject of the annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. CO. v. BENNETT, post, 684. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes under "Master and servant."

G. W. STORM, Appt.,
v.
GEORGE O. THOMPSON.

Iowa Supreme Court — January 23, 1919.

(185 Iowa, 309, 170 N. W. 403.)

Workmen's compensation — independent contractor — one removing trees.

1. One who contracts with a highway contractor to remove for a lump sum the trees within the limits of the highway is a contractor, not entitled to the benefit of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

Definition — "contractor."

2. The word "contractor" is ordinarily applied to anyone who in the pursuit of an independent business undertakes to do a specified piece of work for other persons, using his own means and methods without submitting himself to their control in all its details.

[See 14 R. C. L. 67; 28 R. C. L. 762; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 163.]

Statute — presumption as to meaning of words.

3. The Workmen's Compensation Act will be presumed to have used the word "contractor" in the sense in which the term is commonly employed, and in which it has been defined by the courts.

[See 28 R. C. L. 762.]

APPEAL by claimant from a judgment of the District Court for Polk County (Guthrie, J.), affirming a finding of the arbitrator in favor of defendant in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for injuries sustained while engaged in removing trees under a contract with defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John D. Denison and Royal & Royal, for appellant:

The Compensation Law is to be given a liberal construction in favor of the workman to be affected by its provisions.

Hunter v. Colfax Colliery Co. 175 Iowa, 245, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 803, 11 N. C. C. A. 886; Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598; Milwaukee v. Miller, L.R.A.1916A, 215, note.

The term "workman" or "employee" is given a broader and more liberal interpretation under compensation laws than under the strict rules of common law.

Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598; Levine v. Gold's Sons, N. Y. Indus. Com. No. 25,712, Bulletin 3, p. 78; Litts v. Lumber Co. N. Y. Indus. Com. No. 513, Bulletin 3, p. 119.

Even by common law, plaintiff was a "workman" or "employee" and not an independent contractor, because the employer had exercised and possessed the right of control.

Sylcord v. Horn, 179 Iowa, 936, 7 A.L.R. 1285, 162 N. W. 249, 16 N. C. C. A. 592; Callahan v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 23 Iowa, 562; Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 453, note; Tuttle v. Embury-Marvin Lumber Co. 192 Mich. 385, 158 N. W. 875, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 664.

The simple nature of the work to be done by claimant and its relation to the work of the employer would here indicate an ordinary employment rather than an independent contractor.

Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 495, note; Ft. Wayne v. Christie, 156 Ind. 172, 59 N. E. 385; State, Red-strake, Prosecutor, v. Swayze, 52 N. J. L. 129, 18 Atl. 697; Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598.

The payment in a lump sum is not indicative of independent contractor.

Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 505, note; Atlantic Transp. Co. v.

Coneys, 28 C. C. A. 388, 51 U. S. App. 570, 82 Fed. 177; Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. v. Hayes, 97 Ala. 201, 12 So. 98; Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52; Rheinwald Builders' Brick & Supply Co. supra; Tuttle v. Embury-Martin Lumber Co. supra.

Messrs. Brockett, Strauss, & Shaw and Frank T. Jensen, for appellee:

The independence of a contract is usually inferable where it is for the performance of an entire piece of work at a stipulated price.

Miller v. Minnesota & N. W. R. Co. 76 Iowa, 655, 14 Am. St. Rep. 258, 39 N. W. 188; Uppington v. New York, 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115; Ireland v. Clark, 109 Me. 239, 83 Atl. 667; Edmundson v. Coca-Cola Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 273; Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 505, note.

The relationship of employer and employee is not shown by the reservation or exercise of the right of control over the work, where such control is not in regard to the means or method to be employed, but only as to results.

Callahan v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 23 Iowa, 562; Humpton v. Unterkircher, 97 Iowa, 509, 66 N. W. 776, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 595; Francis v. Johnson, 127 Iowa, 391, 101 N. W. 878, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 507; Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 36; Cramblitt v. Percival-Porter Co. 176 Iowa, 733, L.R.A. 1917C, 77, 158 N. W. 541; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721; Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 475, note.

The same test is applied under workmen's compensation acts as at common law.

State ex rel. Virginia & R. Lake Co. v. District Ct. 128 Minn. 43, 150 N. W. 211, 7 N. C. C. A. 1076; Perham v. American Roofing Co. 193 Mich. 221, 159 N. W. 140; Sylcord v. Horn, 179 Iowa, 936, 7 A.L.R. 1285, 162 N. W. 249, 16 N. C. C. A. 592; Donjon Bros. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff for a period of two years or more had made a business of what he calls "tree work." Concerning it he says his occupation was "anything to be done with trees, such as trimming, removing, and chopping them down. That is the way I make my living." The defendant was a contractor engaged in grading a city street. The progress of this work appears to have required the removal of certain trees upon the land through which a way for the street was being cut. On March 17, 1917, the parties entered into a contract for the removal of the trees. The agreement was in writing, and, omitting the signatures, reads as follows:

"This contract, entered into by G. W. Storm, party of the first part, and G. O. Thompson, party of the second part, witnesseth:

"The party of the first part agrees to remove by grubbing, if necessary, sixty-two (62) trees, located on Sixth avenue between Center and School streets, for the sum of seventy-five (75) dollars and the wood that said trees will make.

"Party of the second part agrees to remove stumps from job and furnish teams to haul wood to No. 1060 Sixth avenue."

Plaintiff proceeded with the work mentioned in the contract, and while so engaged, and in the act of removing one of the trees, he was accidentally injured in such manner as to cause the loss of two fingers of his left hand. On the theory that he was an employee engaged in the service of the defendant he made claim for an allowance of damages under the Workmen's Compensation Act (Code Supp. 1913, §§ 2477m-2477m51). This demand was resisted by the defendant on the ground that plaintiff was not its employee, but a contractor, and as such did not come within the protection of the statute. The majority of the arbitration committee to which the matter was submitted found against the plaintiff, on the theory that he was not an employee within the meaning of the Compensation Act, but a contractor.

On the hearing before the court

the contract was introduced in evidence, and the fact of plaintiff's injury was shown. In addition, plaintiff testified that he did the work alone, using his own saws, axes, ropes, and other tools, but procured or borrowed from defendant a bar, pick, and shovel for temporary use on some parts of the job. As the defendant's steam shovel was also working in that vicinity, and it was necessary to have the trees nearest the front of the shovel removed, to avoid delaying its operation, it was understood between the parties that this work should have priority of attention, and on several occasions the defendant gave directions to that effect. Plaintiff controlled his own hours and times of work so long as he kept it ahead of the shovel. After the accident defendant furnished a man to complete, or to assist plaintiff in completing, the removal of the trees.

There is no dispute as to the facts in the case. The trial court affirmed the arbitrators' finding, and plaintiff appeals.

The Workmen's Compensation Act, after defining the word "workman" as synonymous with "employee," and as meaning any person who has entered into the employment or works under contract of service for an employer, with certain specified exceptions, attaches to such definition the following proviso: "Provided that one who sustains the relation of contractor with any person, firm, association, (or) corporation . . . shall not be considered an employee thereof." Code Supp. 1913, 2477m16.

The question we have to consider in this case is whether the plaintiff's relation to the defendant, as shown by the evidence, is that of a workman or employee within the statutory definition of the term, so that he is entitled to an award in damages; or whether he is to be regarded as a contractor, and therefore not within the protection of the act.

Whether the distinction thus drawn between workman and contractor is in all respects logical and just is a consideration for the legislature, and not for the court, which must apply and give effect to the statute according to its plain and unequivocal terms. The only debatable question, therefore, is whether, upon the admitted facts, the arbitrators and the trial court erred in classing plaintiff as a contractor. The term is one of very frequent use in common speech, and its meaning has often been considered by the courts. As is not unusual in judicial definitions of even the most familiar words, it has been variously phrased and interpreted, but we think there has been developed no radical difference of opinion as to its substantial meaning or effect. In its broadest sense, every person who enters into a contract or takes upon himself contract obligations of any kind is a contractor, but as ordinarily used it is applied to any person "who, in the pursuit of an independent business, undertakes to do a specific piece of work for other persons, using his own means and methods, without submitting himself to their control in respect to all its details. The true test of a contractor would seem to be that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as [to] the means by which it is accomplished." Jann v. W. H. McKnight & Co. 117 Ky. 655, 78 S. W. 862; Caldwell v. Atlantic, B. & A. R. Co. 161 Ala. 395, 49 So. 674; Halstead v. Stahl, 47 Ind. App. 600, 94 N. E. 1056; Carey-Lombard Lumber Co. v. Jones, 187 Ill. 203, 58 N. E. 347; Humpton v. Unterkircher, 97 Iowa, 514, 66 N. W. 776, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 595; Carlson v. Stocking, 91 Wis. 432, 65 N. W. 58; Madix v. Hockgreve Brewing Co. 154 Wis. 448, 143 N. W. 189; Parrott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 127 Iowa, 419, 103 N. W. 352; 2 Words & Phrases, p. 1534.

Tested by this rule, which seems to fairly reflect the consensus of judicial opinion, there can be little doubt of the correctness of the decision of the trial court in this case.

Workmen's compensation—
independent contractor—one removing trees.

The plaintiff made a specialty of this kind of work, and had supplied himself with substantially all the tools and appliances necessary for the performance of such jobs. His agreement with the defendant was to produce a certain result, to wit, the removal of sixty-two trees standing on a described tract of ground. The method and manner of their removal were left wholly to his own choice and discretion, except that the trees should be "grubbed" where necessary. No right to control or direct the work was reserved to the defendant, though plaintiff says it was understood that he was to keep in front of the steam shovel in order to clear the way for its operation. He was not limited in the time for the performance of the work, except as the law implied a duty to complete it within a reasonable period. He controlled his own time, and was in all essential respects his own master, being answerable to the defendant for nothing except the accomplishment of the promised result, the removal of the trees; or, if we go beyond the writing, the removal of the trees in such time as not to delay the operation of the steam shovel with which defendant was doing the grading through the land from which the trees were to be taken. To say that under these circumstances the plaintiff was not a contractor, but an ordinary employee or servant, is quite impossible, unless we are ready to disregard all precedent. The statute must be presumed to have used the word "contractor" in the sense in which the term is commonly employed, and in which it has been defined by the courts, and we are satisfied that plaintiff's own showing brings him very clearly within that class.

Definition—"contractor."

Statute—presumption as to meaning of words.

This decision is in no way out of harmony with any of the authorities cited by appellant, unless it be Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598. That decision seems to have been reversed on appeal (see 174 App. Div. 935, 160 N. Y. Supp. 1143), and cannot be considered as of controlling authority.

The trial court did not err in holding plaintiff to be a contractor, and not an employee within the terms of the Compensation Act, and the judgment is affirmed.

Ladd, Ch. J., and Stevens, Preston, and Gaynor, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT, post, 684, treats of the elements bearing directly upon the quality of a contract as affecting the character of one as an independent contractor. More specifically, as to the effect of the fact that the contractor is bound to furnish the materials and appliances required for the work, see § 34 of that annotation. As to oral evidence with respect to the extent of the power of control reserved to the employer, see §§ 15-18. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes under "Master and servant."

ROBERT GADSDEN, Appt.,

v.

CRAFT & COMPANY et al.

North Carolina Supreme Court — April 25, 1917.

(173 N. C. 418, 92 S. E. 174.)

Master and servant — independent contractor — who is.

One constructing a bridge for a railroad company under contract is not an independent contractor so as to relieve the railroad company from liability for injury to his employee, if the work is to be done agreeably to the orders of the railroad engineer, whose decision as to amounts due is conclusive, and who may employ laborers necessary to complete the job on time if the contractor fails to do so, or may declare the contract forfeited and complete it himself, and the railroad company may pay money directly to the contractor's employees or creditors for work done or materials furnished, while payment may be made on the cost-plus basis for work which cannot be accurately measured.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from a nonsuit granted by the Superior Court for New Hanover County (Connor, J.) as to the defendant railroad companies in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries, alleged to have been sustained by the fall of an improperly and insecurely constructed scaffold. Reversed.

Statement by Hoke, J.:

There was evidence tending to show that in the fall of 1914 defendants Craft & Company were engaged in constructing a reinforced concrete bridge over Fourth street in the city of Wilmington, under a contract with the two defendant railroads, and that on the 27th of November, 1914, plaintiff, while engaged as an employee in said work, was injured by the fall of a scaffold on which he was placed, in the course of his employment, the scaffold having been improperly and insecurely constructed.

On the trial it appeared for defendant companies that the work in question was being done by their co-defendants, Craft & Company, under a written contract which was put in evidence, and under the terms of which defendants contended that Craft & Company were independent contractors, and that no liability could be properly imputed to the companies by reason of default of such contractors.

The court having intimated an opinion that this was the effect of the contract and the attendant facts in evidence, plaintiff excepted, and submitted to a nonsuit as to the railroad companies. There was recovery and judgment for $1,250 damages against Craft & Company, and judgment of nonsuit as to the railroad companies, and from the judgment as to these companies plaintiff appealed.

Mr. A. G. Ricaud for appellant.

Messrs. Rountree & Davis, John D. Bellamy, and Emmett Bellamy for appellees.

Hoke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff objects to the validity of the judgment of nonsuit for the reasons: (1) That, under the terms of the written agreement, Craft & Company were not independent contractors; (2) that the work in which they were engaged was inherently dangerous, and that the position of independent contractor could in no event be maintained for the benefit of the appellees.

On the record we see nothing to justify the position that the work was inherently dangerous, and the objection made upon that ground must be disallowed. Scales v. Lewellyn, 172 N. C. 494, — A.L.R. —, 90 S. E. 521.

We are of opinion, however, that, under the written agreement offered in evidence, the powers reserved to the railroads during the performance of the work, and as to the manner and methods of doing it, are so extended and controlling that Craft & Company could in no proper sense be considered as independent contractors, but are themselves agents and employees of the railroads, for whose negligent default the companies may be held responsible under the principles of respondeat superior.

In Beal v. Champion Fiber Co. 154 N. C. 147-150, 69 S. E. 835, the court quotes with approval from Moll on Independent Contractors, who, in § 19, quotes as follows from Judge Thompson, who in his Commentaries on Negligence, states the rule thus: "If the proprietor retains for himself or for his agent (e. g., architect and superintendent) a general control over the work, not only with reference to results, but also with reference to methods of procedure, then the contractor is" not deemed an independent contractor within the meaning of the rule under consideration, but he is "deemed the mere agent or servant of the proprietor, and the rule of respondeat superior operates to make the proprietor liable for his wrongful acts, or those of his servants, whether the proprietor directly interfered with the work and authorized and commanded the doing of such acts or not. It is not necessary in such a case that the employer should actually guide and control the contractor. It is enough that the contract vests him with the right of guidance and control."

And again, from Smith v. Simmons, 103 Pa. 32, 49 Am. Rep. 113:

"Where one who contracts to perform a lawful service for another is independent of his employer in all that pertains to the execution of the work, and is subordinate only in effecting a result in accordance with the employer's design, he is an 'independent contractor,' and in such case the contractor alone, and not the employer, is liable for damages caused by the contractor's negligence in the execution of the work."

These tests for determining the position of an independent contractor are in accord with the generally prevailing doctrine, and have been recently approved and applied in several decisions of this court. Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. 167 N. C. 457, 83 S. E. 740; Harmon v. Ferguson Contracting Co. 159 N. C. 22, 74 S. E. 632; Johnson v. Carolina, C. & O. R. Co. 157 N. C. 382, 72 S. E. 1057; Hopper v. Ordway, 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839; Denny v. Burlington, 155 N. C. 33, 70 S. E. 1085, 3 N. C. C. A. 922.

True, in Denny v. Burlington, supra, and in Hopper v. Ordway, 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839, it was held that when the relation of independent contractor has been created within the meaning of these definitions, the result is not affected by the fact that an agent of the proprietor is to be present for the purpose of seeing that the work is done according to specifications. Johnson v. Carolina, C. & O. R. Co. 157 N. C. 382-384, 72 S. E. 1057.

No more would conditions be changed by the mere fact that the contract contains a provision that, in case of failure to perform properly, the proprietor could take over the contract and complete the same. But, in our opinion, the powers reserved to the companies and their immediate agents by the provisions of the present contract go much beyond anything appearing in these decisions, on the principles they are intended to sustain. In the opening clause of the contract there is a stipulation that "the work is to be done and finished agreeably to the direction and orders of the chief engineer of one of the defendants, or his assistants."

This officer, too, is given large powers with reference to modifications of the plans as the work progresses. His decision as to amounts due on the previous estimates is absolutely conclusive, and, in the final estimate, the amount due is to be paid when the entire work is completed to the satisfaction of the said engineer, and on his certificate that it has been done according to specifications, and in accordance with his directions, and to his satisfaction and acceptance. In another clause the work is to begin at once, and be completed on or before a specified period, and prosecuted with such force as the engineer may deem adequate, and "if said party shall fail to prosecute the work with sufficient force, in the opinion of said engineer, the latter, or such agent or agents as he may designate, may proceed to employ such number of workmen, laborers, and overseers as may be necessary to insure completion, at such wages as they may find necessary or expedient, and charge same over to Craft & Company on the contract," etc.

And again: "Or for failure to prosecute the work with an adequate force, or for noncompliance with his directions in regard to the manner of constructing it, or for failure to complete the work within the time limit, or for other delays in the performance of, or any omission or neglect of the requirements of, the agreement and specifications on the part of the party of the first part, the said engineer may, at his discretion, declare this contract, or any portion or section of it, forfeited, and the railroad companies exonerated from all liability under it."

In § 12 stipulation is made as follows: "It is further understood and agreed that the parties of the second and third parts, the railroad companies, jointly and severally, may at any time, either with or without an estimate furnished, pay any moneys directly to the employees and others having claims and demands against the party of the first part for work done and material furnished to the party of the first part, for the purpose of this contract, and may at any time require voucher for the payment to employees and others having claims and demands against the party of the first part, for the purposes aforesaid."

And § 13: "If, during the progress of the work contracted for, which shall be under the direction of the engineer not contemplated in the specifications mentioned in § 1 of this agreement, and not specifically included herein, which work cannot, in the opinion of the engineer, be accurately measured or estimated under the terms of this contract, then in that case the same shall be paid for at actual cost for labor and materials furnished by the party of the first part, with 10 per cent added for superintendence and use of tools, and it is further agreed and understood that all terms and stipulations of this contract, as far as may be applicable, shall attach to all work so done, which work for all purposes shall be deemed part of the work contracted for by the party of the first part hereunder."

From these stipulations, and under the principles approved and sustained by the authorities cited, it will sufficiently appear, as stated, that the powers over this work reserved

Master and servant—
independent contractor —who is.

to the companies and their agents, in the course of its performance and as to the manner and methods of doing it, are of such a character and extent as to constitute the contractor, Crafts & Company, the agents and employees of the railroads in reference to the construction of this bridge, and the rights of the parties must be adjusted on that basis.

There is error, and this will be certified that the question of the responsibility of the appellees may be properly determined.

NOTE.

The elements bearing directly upon the quality of a contract as affecting the character of one as an independent contractor are the subject of the annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT, post, 684. More specifically, as to the effect of stipulations requiring the contractor to satisfy a certain standard, see § 11 of that annotation; as to stipulations by which the employer is authorized in general terms to give directions concerning the work, see § 12; and as to stipulations by which employer is empowered to give directions as to particular matters, see § 13. The effect of the employer's right to terminate the employment is considered in § 26. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes under "Master and servant."

C. H. SWAIN

v.

KIRKPATRICK LUMBER COMPANY and

CALCASIEU NATIONAL BANK et al., Appts.

Louisiana Supreme Court — February 25, 1918.

(143 La. 30, 78 So. 140.)

Master and servant — payment for work produced — independent contractor.

1. A foreman and filer in a sawmill has a lien or privilege on the material manufactured in the mill, when he is employed under Act No. 23 of 1912, p. 30, although his wages are measured by the amount of material produced, less the amount paid by the employer to the workmen who are under the joint control of the employer and foreman. He is not an independent contractor.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

Action — revocatory — when lies.

2. The revocatory action lies when the sale complained of was made by judicial process, or by convention of the parties.

Judicial sale — vacation — cause.

3. Fraud in the concealment or misrepresentation of facts is not the only cause which will vitiate a judicial sale. Anything by a party in interest that chills the sale, or prevents competition among the bidders, will, on competent proof, cause such sale to be set aside.

[See 2 R. C. L. 1131, 1132; 16 R. C. L. 89, 95; 1 R. C. L. Supp. 710.]

Headnotes by SOMMERVILLE, J.

APPEAL by defendants bank and mercantile company from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Calcasieu (Overton, J.) in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought to have a sale of lumber on which he claimed a lien for wages set aside, and to recover the value of the lumber to the extent of his claim. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Pujo & Williamson for appellants.

Messrs. Peterman & Dear, Hundley

& Hawthorn, and Cline & Bell, for appellee:

Where one is engaged by the president of a sawmill company to manufacture lumber, but with authority retained by the president to direct its manufacture, employ and discharge laborers, and give orders to the workmen conjointly with the person so engaged, and which reserved authority is constantly exercised by the president, such engagement does not render such person an independent contractor.

Blumauer v. Clock, 24 Wash. 596, 85 Am. St. Rep. 966, 64 Pac. 844; Nyback v. Champagne Lumber Co. 48 C. C. A. 632, 109 Fed. 732; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638; Parrott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 127 Iowa, 419, 103 N. W. 532; Barclay v. Puget Sound Lumber Co. 48 Wash. 241, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 140, 93 Pac. 430; Employers Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. 149 Ky. 712, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 963, 149 S. W. 992; Yeates v. Illinois C. R. Co. 241 Ill. 205, 89 N. E. 338; McColligan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 214 Pa. 229, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 544, 112 Am. St. Rep. 739, 63 Atl. 792, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 471; Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray, 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803; Andrews Bros. Co. v. Burns, 22 Ohio C. C. 437; Seaboard Air Line R. Co. v. Continental Trust Co. 166 Fed. 597; Faren v. Sellers & Co. 39 La. Ann. 1017, 4 Am. St. Rep. 256, 3 So. 363; Moffet v. Koch, 106 La. 375, 31 So. 40.

A sale of property as staple as lumber, at public auction, which brings less than 10 per cent of its value, should be annulled and set aside when it is shown that competitive bidding was stifled and chilled by acts of the owner of the property, and which injured to the benefit of the owner, by the act of the purchaser thereof in giving the owner credit, not for the amount for which the property was adjudicated at the sale, but for the amount which the purchaser realized at a resale thereof in the usual course of business.

2 R. C. L. 1131; Liles v. Rhodes, 7 La. 91; Wood v. Hennen, 9 La. Ann. 264; Herndon v. Gibson, 38 S. C. 357, 20 L.R.A. 545, 37 Am. St. Rep. 765, 17 S. E. 145; Hamilton v. Hamilton, 19 S. C. Eq. (2 Rich.) 355, 46 Am. Dec. 58; Smith v. Greenlee, 13 N. C. (2 Dev. L.) 126, 18 Am. Dec. 564; Slater v. Maxwell, 6 Wall. 268, 18 L. ed. 796; Hudson v. Hudson, 5 Munf. 180; James v. Fulcrod, 5 Tex. 512, 55 Am. Dec. 743; Jackson v. Morter, 82 Pa. 291; Stewart v. Severance, 43 Mo. 322, 97

Am. Dec. 392; Bunts v. Cole, 7 Blackf. 265, 41 Am. Dec. 226; Kinard v. Hiers, 24 S. C. Eq. (3 Rich.) 423, 55 Am. Dec. 643; Trimble v. Turner, 13 Smedes & M. 348, 53 Am. Dec. 90; Dick v. Lindsay, 2 Grant, Cas. 431, 24 Pa. 217; Bethel v. Sharp, 25 Ill. 173, 76 Am. Dec. 790; Chaffe v. Farmer, 34 La. Ann. 1017; Chaffe v. Mayer, 34 La. Ann. 1031; Meyer v. Farmer, 36 La. Ann. 785.

The law gives to a creditor injured by any device by which an illegal preference is given another creditor, whether the result of convention or the machinery of the courts, the right to have it annulled and set aside.

Block v. Marks, 47 La. Ann. 108, 16 So. 649; Palmer v. Hightower, 47 La. Ann. 18, 16 So. 560; Newman v. Baer, 50 La. Ann. 329, 23 So. 279.

Sommerville, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Plaintiff, the foreman and filer in the mill of the Kirkpatrick Lumber Company, is a judgment creditor of that company, with recognition of a lien for wages on the lumber manufactured by said company while he was in its employment, and which was stacked on the yards of said company in Calcasieu parish. He caused the lumber to be provisionally seized; all in accordance with Act 23 of 1912, p. 30.

He alleges that while under seizure the other two defendants, the Calcasieu National Bank of Southwest Louisiana and the Calcasieu Mercantile Company, caused executory process to issue under a chattel mortgage given to them by the Kirkpatrick Lumber Company, under Act 65 of 1912, p. 75, and caused the same 350,000 feet of lumber provisionally seized by him to be seized and sold under the chattel mortgage above referred to, and that the bank became the purchaser thereof for the vile price of $200, and that it has sold the same for the joint benefit and account of the Kirkpatrick Lumber Company, the mercantile company, and itself, and that he has thus been unfairly and fraudulently deprived of his wages and lien therefor.

Plaintiff further alleges and shows that the lumber sold was well worth $6 to $8 per 1,000 feet. He further alleges that the three defendants conspired and colluded together to prevent, prohibit, suppress, and stifle competitive bidding at the sale of the lumber; that they circulated and caused to be circulated, directly and by inference, various and sundry reports tending to keep off and prevent bidders who were present at the sale from bidding; that no one bid at the sale except the agent and representative of the bank and the mercantile company; and that defendants were thus given an unfair and undue preference, to his injury.

Plaintiff alleges that the lumber company was insolvent on the day of the sale, and he has proved that it was insolvent, to the knowledge of the other defendants, at the date of the chattel mortgage given to them. He further alleged and proved that a large part of the lumber seized and sold under executory process was not covered by the chattel mortgage, to the knowledge of the defendants, and that the funds derived from the sale of the lumber mortgaged, and that not mortgaged, were commingled and confused.

Plaintiff asked that the sale be annulled and set aside, and, as the property had been disposed of by defendants, that he have judgment in his favor against defendants in solido for the value of the lumber to the extent of his claim.

The lumber company did not answer, and default was taken against it. There was judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants. The bank and the mercantile company have appealed. The lumber company has not appealed.

In their answer the bank and the mercantile company deny that plaintiff had a lien on the lumber seized and sold. They argue that he was an independent contractor, and not covered by the terms of Act 23 of 1912, p. 30. They also set up the validity of the sale.

The evidence is clear that plaintiff was the foreman and saw filer in the sawmill, and that he received, or was to receive, $3.50 per 1,000 feet on the lumber manufactured in the mill; that he was to employ the hands engaged in the mill, who were subject to the orders of himself and his employer; that the hands were to be paid by the sawmill company; and that he (plaintiff) was to receive from his employer the difference between the wages thus paid to the other hands and the amount due him at $3.50 per 1,000 feet of lumber manufactured.

The court has held adversely to the position assumed by the defendants in somewhat similar cases.

The sawmill company owned and operated the mill, and plaintiff was hired by it to serve as foreman therein, at the will of the company. The president of the company was present every day, and directed plaintiff and the other workmen. Plaintiff was under the authority of the company, and the other workmen were under the joint authority of plaintiff and the company. It is immaterial what plaintiff's wages were to have been, or how they were to have been paid. Wages are that which are paid for a service rendered; what are paid for labor; hire. Century.

Master and servant—payment for work produced—Independent contractor.

In the case of Lalanne v. McKinney, 28 La. Ann. 642, where laborers were to receive one half of the proceeds of the cotton and other produce, the court said: "The testimony of the laborers shows that the contract between them and McKinney was that they were hirelings, to be paid by the half of the proceeds of the cotton and by receiving the half of the other produce. This contract was exactly like the one between the Cowans and their laborers, reported in [Bres v. Cowans] 22 La. Ann. p. 438, where it is said: 'The plantation in question was owned by the defendants in 1867, and cultivated by them in cotton. The defendants employed certain laborers, and agreed to give them, in lieu of wages, one third of the gross products of the cotton. There was plainly no partnership in this. The plantation was the Cowans's, the cotton as it grew was theirs, the supplies were furnished to them for the crop, and every fiber of the cotton as it matured was affected by the privilege.'"

Again, in the case of Faren v. Sellers, 39 La. Ann. 1017, 4 Am. St. Rep. 256, 3 So. 366, the court quotes from Mr. Wood [Mast. & S.] p. 614, as follows: "The simple test is, Who has the general control over the work? Who has the right to direct what shall be done, and how to do it? And if the person employed reserves this power to himself, his relation to his employer is independent and he is a contractor; but if it is reserved to the employer or his agents, the relation is that of master and servant."

In other jurisdictions, findings are to the same effect. See Nyback v. Champagne Lumber Co. 48 C. C. A. 632, 109 Fed. 732: "Defendant, which owned and operated a saw-mill, contracted with a third person to work up the slabs into laths and pickets, using machines in the mill, which were run, kept in order, and lighted by defendant. Defendant owned the products, paid the wages of the workmen employed by such person, and paid him the remainder, if any, due, computed at a stipulated price per one thousand for the laths and pickets made. Held, that such person was not an independent contractor, but a servant of defendant, put in charge of particular machines, and paid upon the terms stated, and that whatever duty there was to instruct an inexperienced workman employed in the operation of such machines, as to the dangers of the employment, remained a duty of defendant."

And Barclay v. Puget Sound Lumber Co. 48 Wash. 241, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 140, 93 Pac. 430, 3 Am. Dig. (1908A) p. 1806: "Where defendant operated a lath mill through a contract with T., by which T. was to receive 75 cents per 1,000 laths produced, and was to employ other men, whom defendant was to pay out of the 75 cents per thousand, T. to receive the balance, . . . and plaintiff was employed by T. to work in the mill, T. was not an independent contractor, . . . and the relation of master and servant existed between plaintiff and defendant."

See also Moffet v. Koch, 106 La. 375, 31 So. 40; Blumauer v. Clock, 24 Wash. 596, 85 Am. St. Rep. 966, 64 Pac. 844; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638; Employers Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. 149 Ky. 712, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 963, 149 S. W. 992; Yeates v. Illinois C. R. Co. 241 Ill. 205, 89 N. E. 338, 7 Am. Dig. 1722.

And in Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray, 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803, 13 Decen. Dig. 27, it was held: "Defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing iron and steel, and owned and furnished the building, machinery, material, and motive power, and provided the superintendent and head workmen in a rolling mill in which plaintiff worked. The department in which plaintiff worked was under the control of a 'boss roller,' who furnished his own assistants and employed all help under him (among whom was plaintiff), kept the time of these assistants, had the right to discharge them, had sole control of manufacturing into iron and steel material furnished him by the defendant, and was paid a certain gross sum for his work, from which he paid his assistants. Defendant repaired and improved all machinery, exercised some control over material while it was in the boss roller's hands, and also had the right to discharge men employed by said boss roller. Held, that the boss roller was a foreman rather than an independent contractor, since such contractor is not the servant of his employer, and that from the fact that defendant had the right to discharge plaintiff could be implied the contractual relation of master and servant."

And in Andrews Bros. Co. v. Burns, 22 Ohio C. C. 437, 13 Decen. Dig. 27, it was held: "Where a rolling mill company employs a boss roller under the rules . . . of the . . . association, the boss roller to employ his own assistant roller, roughers, and beaters, the compensation to be an agreed price per ton for labor performed, divided among the boss roller and his assistants . . . as provided by the rules, . . . and the output of the mill to be under the direction of the general superintendent and to his satisfaction, the relation between the company and the employee is that of master and servant."

Plaintiff has not offered direct evidence showing collusion and fraud between the three defendants, by which he was deprived of the lumber upon which his lien rested; but the conclusion is clear that the acts of defendants, taken separately and together, deterred bidding at the sheriff's sale except by one bidder. That bidder was declared, in an answer to one of the suits between plaintiff and defendants, not to represent them (defendants) at the sale; the bank and the company admit him to have been their representative at the sale, in their answer to this suit.

The evidence shows that the bank and the mercantile company knew that the sawmill company was insolvent at the time that they took the mortgage notes foreclosed upon in the executory proceeding; they knew that some, if not about one half, of the property upon which their chattel mortgage rested, had been sold and removed by the lumber company before the seizure was made by them; they caused to be seized and sold lumber upon which they knew their mortgage did not rest; they knew that the president of the sawmill company permitted them to seize and sell lumber upon which their chattel mortgage did not rest, if he did not actually agree to the seizure; they knew before they sought execution on their mortgage notes that plaintiff had sued the sawmill company for his wages as foreman and filer, and had asked to have a lien or privilege on the lumber recognized therefor; they sent a representative to the sale who pretended to be acting for himself; this agent saw several prospective bidders on the day of the sale, and told one of them "whoever bought the lumber would have a lawsuit with the bank," and that person decided he would have to litigate with the bank if he bought, and he did not bid, although he had gone there for the purpose of bidding. Other bidders present refused to bid because the president of the sawmill company told them that the lumber was on leased ground and subject to a landlord's lien, when the yearly rent was only $5, and that had been paid in advance; he also said that the buying of the lumber would not give a right of way for hauling it, and that the railroad spur which was laid to the sawmill was a private spur, which belonged to his company, and that it could not be used unless he gave permission to use it. Defendants knew that their bid of $200 was an inadequate price for the lumber, being less than one tenth of its value. The bank and mercantile company bought the lumber for the joint account of themselves and the sawmill company, and did not credit the account of the latter with the $200; but they, with the assistance of the president of the sawmill company, subsequently sold and delivered the lumber to others for more than $2,000, and divided the receipts between the bank and the mercantile company, and credited the notes of the sawmill company with the full amount realized from the sale.

Thus, the three defendants acted in the interest of one another through all the stages of the transaction referred to, and throughout the litigation, and, at the close, divided the spoils between them.

The suit of plaintiff is similar to the revocatory action. Plaintiff is a judgment creditor of the sawmill company, which concern was in insolvent circumstances when the mortgage notes were issued to defendants, and when the sale and purchase thereunder took place. These transactions were made in bad faith, and they injured plaintiff. They are deemed under the law to have been made in fraud of the creditors of the sawmill company. It is immaterial that the sale of the lumber was by a judicial proceeding, rather than by convention between the parties. On this point, it is said in Newman v. Baer, 50 La. Ann. 329, 23 So. 279: "An insolvent debtor cannot give in payment to one creditor, to the prejudice of the others, any other thing than the sum of money due. Rev. Civ. Code, art. 2658; Taylor v. Knox, 2 La. 16; Lovell v. Payne, 30 La. Ann. 511. The acts and doings of an insolvent debtor, through which he seeks to give a fraudulent preference to one creditor over others, are all the more to be reprobated when the machinery of the law is invoked to give the semblance of plausibility and propriety to such proceedings. Haas v. Haas, 35 La. Ann. 885. The law recognizes no distinction between a voluntary conveyance of property in fraud of creditors, and such an alienation disguised under the forms of judicial proceedings. It will annul and set aside any machination or contrivance by which this is sought to be done. Rev. Civ. Code, arts. 1969, 1970, 1983, 1984, 2658; Muse v. Yarborough, 11 La. 530. Neither the law nor the courts are to be used as instruments to work injustice. To attempt this is to aggravate the offending."

The state of facts in this case is one which admits most clearly of the application of the revocatory action. Not only contracts which dispose of property, says the Civil Code, article 1984, but all others which are made in fraud of creditors, and deprive them of their recourse upon the property of their debtor, come within the provisions of the section of the Code which treats of this action. In the case of Prats v. His Creditors, 5 Rob. 288, the court held: "A fraud perpetrated by the machinery of a judgment, when the courts themselves are made the unconscious instruments, is as liable to be questioned and annulled as when effected in the usual forms of a contract."

And in Stone v. Kidder, 6 La. Ann. 552, the court said: "Every fraudulent device, contrivance, or artifice by which a creditor may have been injured, and from which a fraud upon his rights is practised, is reached and remedied by this action."

See also, to the same effect, Block v. Marks, 47 La. Ann. 108, 16 So. 649.

The judgment of the trial court in setting aside the sheriff's sale was also fully justified because of the acts of defendant's agent in deterring another from bidding, regardless of what his motive was, honest or fraudulent. His acts caused great prejudice to this plaintiff by preventing others from giving a greater price for the lumber.

The law is stated in 2 R. C. L. 1131, to be: "Sales at auction must be fairly and openly conducted. The great object of the rules regulating such sales, and said to be founded upon reasons of public policy, is to secure a fair price to the owner or those interested in the proceeds of the property. This can be accomplished only by the means of fair competition. Just as the law protects the purchaser by condemning the practice of employing puffers to enhance the price, in like manner it protects the owner of the property, and such persons as may be interested in the proceeds thereof, by forbidding the stifling of competition among bidders, irrespective of the cloak under which it is accomplished, in order that those interested in the property may obtain a full equivalent therefor.

Action—revocatory—when lies.

. . . A sale may be set aside where a mortgagor whose property is being sold at foreclosure appeals to the sympathy of the crowd in order to induce them not to bid against him, even though his representations are perfectly true. Moreover, it is entirely immaterial whether the statements were made publicly at the sale, or privately, so long as they had a depressing effect upon the sale. The rule is equally applicable to any act of the auctioneer of the owner of the party selling, or of third parties as purchasers, which prevents a fair, free, and open sale, or which diminishes the competition and stifles or chills the sale."

Judicial sale—
vacation—cause.

See also Liles v. Rhodes, 7 La. 91; Wood v. Hennen, 9 La. Ann. 264; Chaffe v. Farmer, 34 La. Ann. 1017; Chaffe v. Meyer, 34 La. Ann. 1031; Barclay v. Puget Sound Lumber Co. 48 Wash. 241, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 140, 92 Pac. 430.

Act 23 of 1912, p. 30, in the first section, gives to "all managers, mechanics, or laborers employed by or working in sawmills," etc., liens or privileges on all logs, lumber, etc., manufactured in the mills where such managers, mechanics, or laborers are engaged or employed, for the payment of their salaries or wages.

Plaintiff was engaged and employed in defendant's sawmill as foreman and filer, and he had a lien upon the lumber seized and sold by the other defendants, the bank and the mercantile company, and he was in a position to contest, and he has successfully contested, the validity of the sale of that lumber under the executory process sued out by two of the defendants. Meyer v. Farmer, 36 La. Ann. 785.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

NOTE.

The annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT, post, 684, deals with the elements bearing directly upon the quality of a contract as affecting the character of one as an independent contractor. More specifically, as to the significance of the footing upon which the remuneration of the person employed is computed, see § 25 of that annotation. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes, under "Master and servant."

MURDOCK CAMPBELL, Appt.,

v.

E. N. JONES et al., Respts.

Washington Supreme Court — October 3, 1910.

(60 Wash. 265, 110 Pac. 1083.)

Master — independent contractor — fixed profit.

1. A railroad company which employs a person to construct a bridge for it, upon paying the actual cost of labor, tools, and materials, plus a fixed percentage for profit, is not liable for injury to his employees through negligent performance of the work, since he is an independent contractor.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

— injury to servant — safe working place.

2. Bridge contractors are liable for injuries to one of their employees through the negligent act of their foreman in uprooting a stump on a hillside, for use as fuel, in such manner that it causes a stone to roll down on the injured person, who was working at the foot of the hill, since it is their duty to furnish him a safe place in which to work.

[See 18 R. C. L. 593.]

Trial — question for jury — negligence.

3. The jury must determine whether or not it is negligence for the foreman of a bridge gang to loosen a stump on a hillside above the place where the men were working, in such manner that it caused a stone to roll down upon them.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Spokane County (Sullivan, J.) in defendants' favor, in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to have been responsible. Affirmed as to defendant railway company. Reversed as to remaining defendants.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Plummer & Latimer for appellant.

Messrs. H. H. Field and Cullen & Dudley for respondents.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant brought this action against the respondents to recover for personal injuries. On the trial, at the close of his case in chief, a challenge to the sufficiency of his evidence was interposed by the respondents and sustained by the court, and afterwards a judgment was entered against him to the effect that he take nothing by his action. This appeal followed.

From the record it appears that, at the time the appellant received the injuries for which he sues, the respondent Chicago, Milwaukee, & Puget Sound Railway Company was engaged in constructing a railroad across the state of Washington, and had let the contract for the construction of a part of its roadbed to a firm of contractors known as Grant, Smith, & Company, who in turn had sublet the work of constructing a portion thereof to the respondents Jones & Onserud. Between the terminals of the work undertaken by Jones & Onserud, or contiguous thereto, was certain bridge work, which was not included within the work undertaken by them, but which nevertheless required certain grading and excavating to be done preparatory to the erection of the bridge. The contractors, Jones & Onserud, undertook to do this work under what a witness called a "force account;"

that is, as the witness explains, Jones & Onserud undertook to furnish all the necessary labor, materials, and tools, and do the necessary grading and excavating, for the actual cost of the work, plus a fixed percentage to be added thereto as profit. The appellant was employed by Jones & Onserud, and was put to work with some three or four others on the "force account" work, excavating for a bridge pier under the direction of one A. E. Lundin, foreman for Jones & Onserud. The place of work was on a steep hillside; so steep, in fact, that before paths and steps were cut into the face of the hill, the workmen were let down to their places of work with ropes. A part of the work consisted in drilling holes into the bank with churn drills. The weather being cold, clay and earth would freeze to the drills, rendering them useless, and to clean them they were heated in a small fire, which was kept burning for that purpose at the place of work. To get fuel for this fire the foreman, Lundin, went up the hill, some 150 feet above the fire, and proceeded to uproot a small stump that stood at that place, by kicking it with his foot. In so doing he loosened a rock some 12 inches in diameter, which rolled down the hill and struck appellant, causing the injuries for which he sues.

The record does not show that the railway company was in any manner concerned in the employment of the appellant. It did not hire him directly, nor did it attempt in any manner to direct or control his work while he was engaged in excavating for the pier. Its contract was with Jones & Onserud. It employed that firm to do the work, leaving them to perform it according to their own methods, and with their own tools, materials, and employees, subject to the one condition that certain defined results be obtained. Such being the record, we think the trial judge very properly sustained the challenge to the sufficiency of the evidence made by the respondent railway company. Jones & Onserud, the employers of the appellant,

Master—independent contractor—
fixed profit.

sustained to that company the relation of independent contractors, and their negligence, or the negligence of their foreman, whereby one of their employees was injured, could not render the railroad company liable for such injury. Easter v. Hall, 12 Wash. 160, 40 Pac. 728; Boyle v. Great Northern R. Co. 13 Wash. 383, 43 Pac. 344; Ziebell v. Eclipse Lumber Co. 33 Wash. 591, 74 Pac. 680, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 457; Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. 39 Wash. 631, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 283, 109 Am. St. Rep. 917, 81 Pac. 1089; Engler v. Seattle, 40 Wash. 72, 82 Pac. 136, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 49; Larson v. American Bridge Co. 40 Wash. 224, 111 Am. St. Rep. 904, 82 Pac. 294; Kendall v. Johnson, 51 Wash. 477, 99 Pac. 310; Seattle Lighting Co. v. Hawley, 54 Wash. 137, 103 Pac. 6.

But we think the court erred in sustaining the challenge to the evidence made on behalf of the defendants Jones & Onserud. They were the appellant's employers, and owed to him the duty of furnishing him with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and the duty of keeping the place reasonably safe as long as they required him to work therein. This duty was non-delegable, and when they intrusted it to another they became responsible for the negligent performance of the duty by that other. If, therefore,

—injury to servant—safe working place.

Lundin, in uprooting the stump, acted negligently, and the place of work which had been furnished the appellant was thereby rendered dangerous or unsafe, there can be no question of the liability of his principals therefor. His negligence was their negligence, and any negligent act in the line of his duty, which would render him personally responsible to the appellant, would render his principals likewise personally responsible. The liability of the respondents Jones & Onserud, therefore, turns on the question whether the act of uprooting the stump was in itself negligent. But as to this we think the evidence made a case for the jury. Trial-question for jury—negligence.

The position of the stump with reference to the working place of the appellant, the manner in which it was uprooted, the frozen condition of the ground, and the fact that the act did in fact loosen a rock, which rolled down the hill and injured the appellant, were all matters to be considered by the jury in determining the character of the act, and the court should have submitted the question of negligence to them.

We are aware of the contention of the respondents to the effect that Lundin, when he uprooted the stump, was not engaged in the master's work, but was performing the labor of a servant; that he was at that time a fellow servant, and his acts, being those of a fellow servant, would not render the master liable for injuries resulting therefrom, even though it were considered that the acts were negligent. But this reasoning overlooks the fact that the duty of the respondents to oversee the appellant's place of work was a continuing duty, obligatory upon them at all times; that, while the work itself may have been servant's work, the duty to see that its performance did not result in injury to the servants working elsewhere was the master's duty. This duty, as we say, could not be delegated, and if the injury to appellant was caused by its negligent performance the master is liable.

This principle was announced by this court in the case of Creamer v. Moran Bros. Co. 41 Wash. 636, 84

Pac. 592. There certain employees of the appellant were engaged, under the direction of a foreman, in removing a propeller from a propeller shaft of a ship, to which it was tightly wedged. The hub of the propeller had been heated to facilitate its removal, and oil confined therein had by that means become intensely hot. In the course of the work, the foreman took up a sledge and struck the hub a blow which loosened it, releasing the hot oil, which poured upon an employee assisting in the work, and burned him so severely as to cause his death. It was held that the act of the foreman was the act of the master, and not that of a fellow servant. In the course of its opinion the court said: "It is urged by appellant that the act of the superintendent in striking the hub with the sledge at the time and in the manner in which he did constituted an act of a fellow servant of Creamer; that such an act, although performed by the superintendent, was not one of superintendence, was not one of the non-delegable duties of the master, was not the act of a vice principal, but was the manual act of one working with Creamer in the same undertaking and to accomplish the same end toward which they were all working; that in striking said blow said superintendent was, for the time being, a fellow workman of Creamer; and that his negligence, as such, would not render the appellant company liable. This argument would appeal strongly to the writer of this opinion, were it not for the former decisions of this court. Nelson v. S. Willey S. S. & Nav. Co. 26 Wash. 548, 67 Pac. 237; Dossett v. St. Paul & T. Lumber Co. 40 Wash. 276, 82 Pac. 273; O'Brien v. Page Lumber Co. 39 Wash. 537, 82 Pac. 114. Under the authority of those decisions, when the superintendent, without the knowledge of the workman, negligently set in operation an agency fraught with danger, he thereby rendered the company liable for the result of such negligence."

We are of the opinion, therefore, that, on any view of the case, the judgment is erroneous as to the respondents Jones & Onserud. As to them the judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to grant a new trial. As to the Chicago, Milwaukee, & Puget Sound Railway Company, it will stand affirmed.

Rudkin, Ch. J., and Gose and Chadwick, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The elements bearing directly upon the quality of the contract as affecting the character of one as an independent contractor is the subject of the annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT, post, 684. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes under "Master and servant."

C. F. KALER et al., Respts.,

v.

PUGET SOUND BRIDGE & DREDGING COMPANY, Impleaded, etc.,
Appt.

Washington Supreme Court (Dept. No. 1) — March 20, 1913.

(72 Wash. 497, 130 Pac. 894.)

Master and servant — contractor — trespass — remedy against principal lost.

A contractor is not liable for injury to private property by casting material thereon in filling adjoining low land, under contract with a municipality for the conservation of public health, if he follows the plans prepared by the municipal authority, and the right to hold the city liable has been lost.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

APPEAL by the defendant dredging company from a judgment of the Superior Court for Thurston County (Mitchell, J.) in plaintiff's favor, in an action brought to recover compensation for injuries to real estate through an improvement executed by defendant under contract with the city of Olympia. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. John W. Roberts and George L. Spirk, for appellant:

Plaintiff is estopped by bringing a lawsuit.

Justice v. Lancaster, 20 Mo. App. 559; Preston v. Cedar Rapids, 95 Iowa, 71, 63 N. W. 577; Collins v. Grand Rapids, 95 Mich. 286, 54 N. W. 889; Hembling v. Big Rapids, 89 Mich. 1, 50 N. W. 741; Dallas v. Beeman, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 315, 55 S. W. 762; Jeffersonville v. Myers, 2 Ind. App. 532, 28 N. E. 999.

The release of the city by respondents operated to release appellant as alleged joint tort-feasor.

De Baker v. Southern California R. Co. 106 Cal. 257, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237, 39 Pac. 610; Wallenberg v. Minneapolis, 111 Minn. 471, 127 N. W. 422, 856, 2 Ann. Cas. 873; Abb v. Northern P. R. Co. 28 Wash. 428, 58 L.R.A. 293, 92 Am. St. Rep. 864, 68 Pac. 954; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 285; 34 Cyc. 1047.

If there was any liability, that liability was one which could be imposed upon the city alone.

28 Cyc. 1086; De Baker v. Southern California R. Co. 106 Cal. 257, 46 Am. St. Rep. 237, 39 Pac. 610; Denison & P. Suburban R. Co. v. James, 20 Tex. Civ. App. 358, 49 S. W. 660; St. Louis use of Sullivan v. Clemens, 42 Mo. 69; Shaw v. Crocker, 42 Cal. 435; Eachus v. Los Angeles, 130 Cal. 492, 80 Am. St. Rep. 147, 62 Pac. 829; Engebretsen v. Gay, 158 Cal. 775, 109 Pac. 879; Wallenberg v. Minneapolis, 111 Minn. 471, 127 N. W. 422, 856, 2 Ann. Cas. 873; Pearson v. Zable, 78 Ky. 170; Jeffersonville v. Myers, 2 Ind. App. 532, 28 N. E. 999; Cooper v. Seattle, 16 Wash. 462, 58 Am. St. Rep. 46, 47 Pac. 887; Seattle v. Buzby, 2 Wash. Terr. 25, 3 Pac. 180; Provine v. Seattle, 59 Wash. 681, 110 Pac. 619; Cincinnati v. Stone, 5 Ohio St. 38; Fink v. St. Louis, 71 Mo. 52; Quinn v. Peterson & Co. 69 Wash. 207, 124 Pac. 502; Potter v. Spokane, 63 Wash. 269, 115 Pac. 176.

Messrs. Thomas M. Vance and Harry L. Parr for respondents.

Chadwick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit growing out of a municipal improvement in the city of Olympia, and known locally as the "Swantown fill." The work was done under an invocation of the police power of the city, the ordinance reciting that it was "necessary and expedient, on account of the public health, sanitation, the general welfare, and the general improvement of the property located within the boundaries" of the district, which are described in the ordinance. Two lots and a fraction, which were included in the improvement district, are owned by the plaintiffs. When the fill, which was made by a hydraulic dredger with silt and sand from the bottom of the bay, had so far progressed as to come up to plaintiffs' property, they asked and were granted the right to take a part of their property out of the district. They undertook, at their own expense, to build a bulkhead along the line agreed upon. The material used was old bridge flooring, which was placed against some fence posts. As the work progressed, this gave way. A new line was agreed upon, and a new bulkhead put in. The salt water and silt ran through and over the barrier, and did considerable damage to the property of the plaintiffs. A trial was had, and a verdict in the sum of $500 was returned in plaintiffs' favor. The city was made a party to the suit; but, it appearing on the trial that no claim had been presented within the time fixed by law for the presentation of claims, it was dismissed out of the case, and the trial proceeded against the dredging company alone.

It is not denied that the ordinance and contract under which the work was done provided that it should be done strictly in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished by the city, and under the direction of the city engineer, and the testimony shows that the changes made were sanctioned by that officer. One other fact material to our discussion is that the property of the plaintiffs was bounded on the north by a street, and on the west and south by property still within the improvement district, and which the dredging company was bound to fill under its contract.

The arguments of counsel, as set forth in the briefs, have taken wide range; but the case, in so far as the liability of the appellant is concerned, can be quickly determined by reference to some of the cases heretofore decided by this court, and to one or two fundamental principles. One of the suggestions made by respondents, and which should be first determined, is that there has been a taking and damaging, within the meaning of the Constitution (art. 1, § 16), for which they are entitled to compensation; that, the city being a trespasser, appellant could not escape liability because it had a contract to do that which was unlawful. Whether the damage suffered by respondents is such an injury as would sustain a recovery under the Constitution, and to which the special statute covering the presentation of claims would not apply, is a question that cannot now be raised. Whatever the law may be, the trial court held that the city was not liable; and, no appeal having been taken from that order, it has become the law of the case (8 Cyc. 791), and respondents must recover from the appellant, if at all, upon other grounds.

This court has held that it is within the police power of a city to fill low-lying ground, when necessary to protect the health, comfort, and convenience of the municipality, and that any consequential damage suffered because thereof is in due process of law. "It would be manifestly destructive to the advancement or development of organized communities to put the public to the burden of rendering compensation to one, or to many, when the individual use is, or might be, a menace to the health, morals, or peace of the whole community." Bowes v. Aberdeen, 58 Wash. 535, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 709, 109 Pac. 369. A proceeding in all respects similar to the one under discussion has been passed by this court as possessing no legal infirmity. Martin v. Olympia, 69 Wash. 28, 124 Pac. 214. Consequently, the city council having determined that it was necessary to fill and improve the property of these respondents, no damages could have been recovered if the city had made the improvement in accordance with the original plan. While the city can improve property within the insanitary district as determined by the ordinance, it does not follow that it can damage abutting property. "Legislation tending to the preservation of the public health is favored by the courts, and is regarded as a power inherent in a municipal corporation where population is congested. 28 Cyc. 709; Gundling v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44. But the power must be exercised within a proper limit—in this case, the filling of the district—and when the city goes beyond that limit the legislature should provide, and it has in this case provided, for compensation to those whose property stands in the way. If it did not, it would result in the confiscation of unoffending property." State ex rel. Stalding v. Aberdeen, 58 Wash. 562, 109 Pac. 379. See also Dono- frio v. Seattle, 72 Wash. 178, 129 Pac. 1094; Ferry-Leary Land Co. v. Holt & Jeffery, 53 Wash. 584, 102 Pac. 445; Olson v. Seattle, 30 Wash. 687, 71 Pac. 201; State ex rel. Smith v. Superior Ct. 26 Wash. 278, 66 Pac. 385. When the city, acting through its engineer, he having authority to exempt property, excluded a part of respondents' property and drew new lines around it, it made the excluded lots abutting property; and it would become liable for such damages as might result to the abutting property from the manner in which the work was done. Now, admitting, without deciding, that there was such damage for which the city could have been held, the question remains whether, the city, which furnished the plan of the work and directed it in all particulars, having been dismissed out of the case, its contractor is liable. The negligence, if any, upon which a right of recovery could have been predicated, was the omission of the city to provide an adequate plan, or to make proper provision for carrying away the water and silt which, in the natural order of things, would seep through and over the bulkheads, and to care for the water that flowed from an artesian well which was on the premises. Because of these omissions water was left standing on the lots, and trees and vegetation were killed. It is not shown that appellant has in any manner violated its contract with the city, or has failed to follow the plans and specifications, or refused to obey the orders and directions of the city engineer.

Negligence implies a wilful fault. In keeping with this principle, it has been held by this, and generally by other courts, that where the fault lies in the plan furnished by the superior, and the work is done under his direction, the contractor is not liable in the absence of negligence. If negligent, he is held for his negligence, and not as a trespasser. This case, in principle and in many of its facts, is not unlike the case of Quinn v. Peterson & Co. 69 Wash.

208, 124 Pac. 502, where a recovery was denied. In Potter v. Spokane, 63 Wash. 267, 115 Pac. 176, it appeared that the damage for which a recovery was sought was caused by a defective bulkhead. It was held that, the plan being at fault, the contractor, who had done the work under a contract which "provided that the work should be performed according to certain plans and specifications described in the contract, and should be under the supervision, direction, and control of the board of public works of the city, and its representative, the city engineer; and that, in case of improper construction and noncompliance with the contract, the board had the right to order a partial or entire reconstruction of the work, or to declare the contract forfeited, and relet the same to another contractor, and to adjust the differences that should arise between the city and the contractor by reason of the change"—was not liable.

The liability of the contractor was not expressly passed on in that case, or in Cooper v. Seattle, 16 Wash. 462, 58 Am. St. Rep. 46, 47 Pac. 887, but it would seem to follow from the reasoning of the court that the general rule would have been applied, if it had been necessary to a decision. Peter Casassa brought suit against the city of Seattle and the Lewis & Wiley Company, contractors, for damages from slides suffered because of insufficient slopes to sustain a street grade. The city was held, but the contractor was exonerated, it appearing that the work was done under the direction of the city, and that there was no sufficient evidence of negligence to charge the contracting company. Casassa v. Seattle, 66 Wash. 146, 119 Pac. 13. The general rule, as found by Mr. Dillon, is thus stated: "Where a city, acting within its general powers, contracts for the grading of a public street, and in accordance with the conditions of the contract, and the law prescribing the same, the work is done under the immediate supervision of certain officers, whose official duty it is to superintend the work, and the damages result, not from any negligence or wrongdoing of the contractors, but from the performance of the work in the manner required by the contract, the contractors are the agents of the city, and the city is liable for such damages." 4 Dill. Mun. Corp.

Master and servant—
contractor—trespass—remedy against principal lost.

5th ed. § 1655, note; 28 Cyc. 1280. We conclude that appellant was not an independent contractor, and that the liability for the damages sustained rested upon the city, and not upon appellant.

We shall not discuss the other questions, some of which might, in any event, call for a new trial, as the forgoing is determinative of the case.

Reversed, with instructions to dismiss the suit.

Crow, Ch. J., and Gose, Parker, and Mount, JJ., concur.

NOTE.

The question whether or not one is an independent contractor as affected by the elements bearing directly upon the quality of the contract is the subject of the annotation following CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT, post, 684. As to the effect of provisions in statutes and municipal ordinances, see § 2 of that annotation. For other annotations on the general question, who is an independent contractor, see A.L.R. Indexes, under "Master and servant."

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

E. S. BENNETT.

Oklahoma Supreme Court (Division No. 2) — September 17, 1912.

(36 Okla. 358, 128 Pac. 705.)

Master and servant — test of relation.

1. In determining whether the relation between a proprietor and one doing work for him is that of master and servant, or proprietor and independent contractor, while the court may take into consideration the manner of payment, whether by the day, week, month, etc., with a reservation of the right to discharge, or whether there was to be payment by the piece or entire job, yet the mode of payment is not a decisive test by which to determine the question. The test lies in whether or not the contract reserves to the proprietor the power of control over the employee. The mere fact that the work being performed by an employee at the time he was injured was done by the piece or job, as by payment of a stated price per ton for shoveling coal into an engine tender, does not deprive him of the character of an employee, where he was a mere servant carrying out his employer's will and instructions.

[See note on this question beginning on page 684.]

— independent contractor defined.

2. An independent contractor is one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, and without being subject to the control of his employer except as to the result of the work.

[See 14 R. C. L. 67; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 164.]

Headnotes by BREWER, C.

(36 Okla. 358, 128 Pac. 705.)

— retention of contract — inference.

3. The employer's intention to retain the right of exercising control over a person performing work for him, and hence creating the relation of master and servant between the parties, will be inferred when it appears that the employment was general, and not based on a contract to do a certain piece of work on certain specified terms in a particular manner and for a stipulated sum.

Trial — question of law — construction of contract.

4. Where the contract of employment involved is in writing, the question of the relation created by it between the parties is ordinarily one of law for the court; but if the contract is oral, and the evidence as to its terms is conflicting, or where a written contract has been modified by the practice under it, the question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. But, although the contract may be oral, if there is no dispute as to its terms, or if but one inference can be drawn from the evidence, then the question of whether the relation is that of employer and independent contractor, or that of master and servant, is for the court.

[See 14 R. C. L. 78; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 168.]

Master and servant — safety of working place — duty.

5. A master is under an obligation to take care that the premises in which, and the appliances and instrumentalities with which, he requires his servant to work, shall be reasonably safe for the purposes intended.

[See 18 R. C. L. 587, 593; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 827.]

ERROR to the District Court for Greer County (Brown, J.) to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. C. O. Blake, H. B. Low, R. J. Roberts, and W. H. Moore, for plaintiff in error:

A carrier is not responsible for the loading or unloading of cars.

Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. v. Wittnebert, 101 Tex. 368, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1227, 130 Am. St. Rep. 858, 108 S. W. 150, 16 Ann. Cas. 1153.

Plaintiff was an independent contractor, not a servant of defendant.

Thomp. Neg. § 202, p. 575, note 4; Steel v. South-Eastern R. Co. 16 C. B. 550, 139 Eng. Reprint, 875; Earl v. Beadleston, 10 Jones & S. 294; Anderson v. Tug River Coal & Coke Co. 59 W. Va. 301, 53 S. E. 713; Riedel v. Moran, Fitzsimons Co. 103 Mich. 262, 61 N. W. 509; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley, 53 Ark. 503, 9 L.R.A. 604, 13 S. W. 333, 14 S. W. 800.

The question as to whether the plaintiff was an independent contractor or an employee of the railroad company should have been submitted to the jury for its determination.

Sacker v. Waddell, 98 Md. 43, 103 Am. St. Rep. 374, 56 Atl. 399, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 324; Carlson v. Stocking, 91 Wis. 432, 65 N. W. 58; Whitson v. Ames, 68 Minn. 23, 70 N. W. 793, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 178; Wallace v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. 91 Tex. 18, 40 S. W.

399; Smith v. Humphreyville, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495; Brophy v. Bartlett, 108 N. Y. 632, 15 N. E. 368; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. 147 Mass. 101, 16 N. E. 690; Barg v. Bousfield, 65 Minn. 355, 68 N. W. 45, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 188; Craft v. Albermarle Timber Co. 132 N. C. 151, 43 S. E. 597.

Messrs. H. M. Thacker and Charles M. Thacker for defendant in error.

Brewer, C., filed the following opinion:

The defendant in error, as plaintiff below, recovered judgment against the plaintiff in error, as defendant, in the sum of $750, on account of personal injuries received in defendant's yards at Mangum, while loading a locomotive tender with coal from a box car. The coal had been loaded into the box car, without using grain or inside doors, and the heavy lump coal thus loaded came into contact with sliding side doors of the car, bulging the doors out against the sides of the groove upon which it was to be moved. On the night of the injury the engine to be coaled was placed on the north side of the car, but the north door was bulged and broken so it could not be opened. The engine was then placed on the south side of the car. The south door was sprung and bulged to some extent, but was not broken so far as could be seen, and plaintiff, with the assistance of a yardman, attempted to open the south door by sliding it back. It was tight, and would not move, so plaintiff inserted the point of a small iron pick in an attempt to slide the door, when it suddenly broke loose, evidently from the great pressure of the heavy lumps of coal inside, and the door fell on plaintiff, breaking his arm and causing other injuries.

The defendant, after general denial, set up the special defense of independent contractor. In the petition in error defendant sets out thirteen specifications of error, and, in presenting its argument thereon, says in its brief: "In presenting the errors to this court on appeal the plaintiff in error desires to urge them as a whole without urging any one specifically, and without waiver of any," etc. The argument and authorities are submitted, however, under three subheads, a consideration of which will dispose of the case. They are: First, the plaintiff is an independent contractor, and not a servant of defendant; second, it was the duty of the court to submit the question of independent contractor to the jury; third, the carrier is not responsible for loading or unloading of cars.

1. We will consider the questions in their order; and to determine the relation existing between the plaintiff and the defendant—that is, whether he was a servant, or an independent contractor—we will refer to the evidence. The plaintiff was a coal heaver. His contract of employment was oral. He says he heard there was a vacancy, and applied in person for the job; that he was told to go to work that night—that the company would try him and see how long he would stay. Plaintiff says nothing was said at the time about how he was to be paid, whether by the day, week, month, or ton, but that shortly thereafter he learned he was to be paid by the ton. The station agent said he hired plaintiff, and told him his pay would be by the ton. The station agent and night watchman both disclaimed any authority to direct plaintiff in his work. It was also shown that upon occasions plaintiff had hired a neighbor, paying him a pig to help him shovel coal. It appears that as engines came in the engine watchmen would run them to some convenient place in the yards, then draw a car of coal alongside, and plaintiff would then shovel coal into the tender of the engine. It is also shown that the station agent directed the engine watchmen which cars to unload, and the watchmen would then direct plaintiff what cars to unload first, etc.; that plaintiff would assist in switching engines and cars, and in spotting them to be coaled; and that the other employees sometimes assisted plaintiff in his work. The lantern and other instrumentalities for plaintiff's work were furnished by the defendant.

The defendant bases its contention, in the main, that plaintiff was an independent contractor, on the fact that he was paid by the ton for his work, and the evidence of the station agent that he did not give plaintiff any direction or exercise any control over him as to how he unloaded the coal into the tenders. The generally accepted rule of law is 1 Thomp. Neg. (§ 622): "An independent contractor, within the meaning of this rule, is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished. . . . In every case the decisive question is: Had the defendant the right to control, in the given particular, the conduct of the person doing the wrong? Does he reserve to himself the essential powers of a master? It is but another form of language, expressing the same idea, to say that the true test to determine whether one who renders service to another does so as a contractor or not is to ascertain whether he renders the service in the course of an independent occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished. On this question the contract under which the work has been done must speak conclusively in every case, reference being had, of course, to surrounding circumstances. This being so, the mere fact that the agent who did the injury carried on a separate and independent employment will not absolve his principal from liability. 'If such were the rule, a party would be exempt from responsibility even for the negligent acts of his domestic servants, such as his cook, coachman, or gardener.'" And, further, the same author, in discussing the manner of payment as bearing on the relation between the parties, says: "Sec. 629. In determining whether the relation is that of master and servant, or that of proprietor and independent contractor, the courts have sometimes taken into consideration the manner of payment—whether payment was to be made by the day, week, month, etc., with a reservation of the power to discharge, or whether there was to be a payment by the piece or by the entire job. But the mode of payment is not a decisive test by which to determine this question. The test lies in the question whether the contract reserves to the proprietor the power of control over the employee. That the mere fact that the work being performed by an employee at the time he was injured was done by the piece or job—as by payment of a stated price for each car when loaded—does not deprive him of the character of an employee, where he was a mere servant carrying out the employer's will and instructions."

Master and servant—test of relation.

made by the day, week, month, etc., with a reservation of the power to discharge, or whether there was to be a payment by the piece or by the entire job. But the mode of payment is not a decisive test by which to determine this question. The test lies in the question whether the contract reserves to the proprietor the power of control over the employee. That the mere fact that the work being performed by an employee at the time he was injured was done by the piece or job—as by payment of a stated price for each car when loaded—does not deprive him of the character of an employee, where he was a mere servant carrying out the employer's will and instructions."

Among the definitions selected and approved in 4 Words &

Phrases, 3542, we find the following: "An independent contractor is one who, exercising an independent employment, contracts to do a piece of work according to his own methods, and without being subject to the control of his employer except as to the result of the work. Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52; Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray, 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 807."

—independent contractor defined.

It has been seen that the mode of payment—as, in this case, by the ton—is not a test of the relation between the parties; nor is such fact in any way inconsistent with the idea of that relation being one of master and servant. The station agent said that he did not control or direct the method or detail of plaintiff's work, and that other employees in the yard merely designated the cars to be unloaded. But the test is not whether the defendant did in fact control and direct plaintiff in his work, but is whether it had the right under the contract of employment, taking into account the circumstances and situation of the parties and the work, to so control and direct him in the work. Moll, Independent Contractors, § 35; Linnahan v. Rollins, 137 Mass. 123, 50 Am. Rep. 287. A case directly in point is that of Hamilton v. Oklahoma Trading Co. 33 Okla. 81, 124 Pac. 38, and the numerous authorities cited and quoted from. See also Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Gelruth, 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253. In this case, would an officer or manager of defendant, who might have seen plaintiff heaving coal carelessly or wastefully, and loading the tender improperly, have had the right to require him to use a better method? If such manager saw him loading one tender, and preferred that he load another first, would he not have at once commanded and enforced obedience to his wishes, thus changing plaintiff's plan and method of work? Is it conceivable that a railroad, in hiring an unskilled man to perform one of the simplest tasks of hard manual labor, requiring scarcely more than muscle in its performance, yet one that must be constantly performed in the yards to keep trains moving, would absolutely relinquish all right of control and direction? We hardly think so. In Moll on Independent Contractors, at page 76, it is said: "The ground upon which some decisions may be said to have proceeded was that, in view of the humble industrial status of the persons employed, and the simple character of the work to be done, the only admissible inference was that the employers intended to retain the right to give directions in regard to the details of the work"—citing Richmond v. Sitterding, 65 L.R.A. 445, and note (101 Va. 354, 99 Am. St. Rep. 879, 43 S. E. 562, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 616). The same author (Moll) at page 76 continues: "It is held in Massachusetts that the employer's intention to retain the right of exercising control, and hence creating the relation of master and servant, should always be inferred where it appears that the employment was general, and not based on a contract to do a certain piece of work on certain specified terms in a particular manner and for a stipulated price"—citing Brackett v. Lubke, 4 Allen, 138, 81 Am. Dec. 694; Dane v. Cochrane Chemical Co. 164 Mass. 453, 41 N. E. 678, and numerous other cases.

In this case the employment was general. Many or few engines were to be provided with coal according to the demands of business. There was no particular manner of doing the work; no particular place in the yards for it to be done. The work was to be done where and when and as much of it as the needs of the employer might require. If this coal heaver was a contractor, and not a servant, every coal miner in this state occupies toward the company for which he works the same relation. It is common knowledge that the miner furnishes his entire equipment of tools, his oil, and lamp, and his powder, fuse, and caps, and receives a stipulated price per ton for the coal mined; yet we doubt if anyone would now seriously urge in this jurisdiction, where the courts are full of mining cases, that the coal miner sustains that relation to his company. It has been held, however, that he does not sustain such relation. Drennen v. Smith, 115 Ala. 396, 22 So. 442; Lake Superior Iron Co. v. Erickson, 39 Mich. 492, 33 Am. Rep. 423, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 39. We therefore conclude that in this case it is shown that the relation existing between the parties at the time of the injury was that of master and servant.

2. What has been said on the first proposition relieves us of any extended consideration of the second, i. e., that it was reversible error to refuse to submit to the jury the question of whether plaintiff was a contractor or a servant. We think it can be correctly said that, where the contract of employment is in writing, the question of the relation created by it between the parties is ordinarily one of law for the court; but if the contract is oral, and the evidence is conflicting, or where a written contract has been modified by the practice under it, the question should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions. 1 Thomp. Neg. 640; Moll, Independent Contractors, §§ 28, 29, and authorities cited. But although the contract may be oral, if there is no dispute as to its terms, or if but one inference can be drawn from the evidence, then the question whether the relation is that of employer and independent contractor, or that of master and servant, is for the court. Moll, Independent Contractors, §§ 28, 29; Foley v. Felrath, 98 Ala. 176, 39 Am. St. Rep. 39, 13 So. 485, and authorities cited; Drennen v. Smith, 115 Ala. 403, 22 So. 442. The evidence in this case presents no substantial conflict relative to the employment of plaintiff; and, taking into consideration the nature and character of the work, the duties involved, the methods pursued, and the necessary interest and concern of each of the parties in the time, place, and manner of doing the work and in the results to be accomplished, we have no hesitancy in holding that but one reasonable inference could be drawn from the evidence as to the relation of the parties, and that is that such relation was that of master and servant. This being the case, the court very properly, under the facts presented, refused to submit the question to the jury.

Trial—question of law—construction of contract.

3. The remaining point contended for by defendant—that it was not responsible for a negligent loading of the car by the consignor—loses much, if not all, of its force and applicability, when it has once been determined that the plaintiff was its servant. The question, that relation once established, becomes one of safe place in which to work and safe instrumentalities and appliances with which to work, and the doctrine and rules of law relative to the duty of a carrier to the consignor or consignee of freight, or the consignee's servants in unloading the same after a delivery to him, where the question of negligent loading by the consignor is presented, are no longer controlling, if, indeed, applicable at all. We have read Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. v. Wittnebert, 101 Tex. 368, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1227, 130 Am. St. Rep. 858, 108 S. W. 150, 16 Ann. Cas. 1153, cited by defendant, and do not think it in point here.

The duty of the master involved in this case is stated thus in Labatt on Master & Servant, 1st ed. § 14: "The rule defining the nature and extent of the master's obligation with respect to the condition of the agencies of his business may be stated in its most general form as follows: The degree of care required of an employer in protecting his employees from injury is the adoption of all reasonable means and precautions to provide for the safety of his servants while in the performance of their work. What shall be deemed 'due care' is to be 'estimated on a consideration of the facts of each particular case.' It is 'such care as reasonable and prudent men would use under similar circumstances.' The care which such a man is, for the purposes of this rule, assumed to exercise, is that which he would exercise for his own safety if the instrumentality in question was furnished for his own personal use. That is to say, a master is required to furnish 'such [appliances] as a prudent man would furnish, if his own life were exposed to the danger that would result from unsuitable or unsafe appliances.'" See also Thompson, Neg. § 8. And, regarding the instrumentalities and appliances furnished the servant, the same author (Labatt), at § 22a, states as a corollary to the foregoing the following: "The general principle laid down in § 14, supra, involves the corollary that the master is in default as respects his servants, unless the appliances furnished are such as would commend themselves to a reasonably prudent man. He is bound to furnish such appliances as are reasonably safe and suitable—such as a prudent man would furnish if his own life were exposed to the danger that would result from unsuitable or unsafe appliances. In order to discharge this obligation, he must see that the instrumentalities which he furnishes are in 'proper condition;' that is to say, in 'a condition which shall not endanger the safety of the employed,' or in such a condition 'that an employee can perform all the duties required of him with reasonable safety,' or in such a condition that it shall be 'reasonably probable that injury will not occur in the exercise of the employment.' Such being the general character of the master's obligations, the doctrine is now regarded as axiomatic that the employer is bound to furnish adequate materials, and means, and resources suitable to accomplish the work; that is to say, all that is necessary to carry on the business, including premises reasonably safe for that purpose." In this case the car of coal, with its sliding door to be opened, was an instrumentality furnished plaintiff, with which, and about which, to work. There is some evidence that it was in a defective and dangerous condition, and that such condition could have been easily ascertained if any attention had been given to it when it was set out for unloading. The plaintiff went to it to unload it on a dark night, equipped with no light by which he could see and determine conditions, save that of a lantern provided him by the defendant. The question of whether plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence was submitted to the jury, and determined in his favor. The jury were properly instructed that plaintiff could not recover unless they should find that his injury was the direct and proximate result of defendant's neglect to use ordinary care to keep and maintain said car and the door thereof in a safe condition to be unloaded, without injury to those performing the work. While the petition may be subject to some slight criticism in not being sufficiently full and specific in stating defective and unsafe conditions, yet the proof was directed and instructions given on this theory, and we have no doubt but that it was the correct theory of the case. We have read the entire record, and believe there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury, and that no reversible error has been shown.

Master and servant—safety of working place—duty.

The case should be affirmed.

Per Curiam:

Adopted in whole.

Petition for rehearing denied,
December 17, 1912.

ANNOTATION.

Elements bearing directly upon the quality of a contract as affecting the character of one as independent contractor.

I. In general:

- § 1. Scope, 686.
- § 2. Effect of provisions in statutes and municipal ordinances, 686.
- § 3. Identification of contractor and his servants for the purpose of determining the significance of an exercise of control, 687.

II. Stipulations construed as investing the employer with powers of control which do not extend to the details of the work:

- § 4. In general, 687.
- § 5. Stipulations requiring the contractor to satisfy a certain standard, 693.
- § 6. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered in general terms to give directions concerning the work, 697.

II.—continued.

- § 7. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered to give directions with regard to particular matters, 702.
- § 8. Other stipulations importing a reservation of a certain degree of control over the work, 707.
- § 9. Typical contracts relating to various descriptions of work:
 - 1 (a) Work performed for railroad companies, 709.
 - (b) Work with respect to buildings, 709.
 - (c) Construction of sewers, 709.
 - (d) Laying gas pipes, 709.
 - (e) Work with respect to timber, 710.

II. 9—continued.

(f) Operation of quarries, 710.

III. Stipulations construed as investing the employer with powers of control which extend to the details of the work:

- § 10. In general, 710.
- § 11. Stipulations requiring the contractor to satisfy a certain standard, 710.
- § 12. Stipulations by which the employer is authorized in general terms to give directions concerning the work, 712.
- § 13. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered to give directions with regard to particular matters, 719.
- § 14. Typical contracts relating to various kinds of work:
 - 1 (a) Work performed for railroad companies, 721.
 - (b) Work with respect to buildings, 721.
 - (c) Construction of highways, 721.
 - (d) Construction of sewer, 721.
 - (e) Construction of telephone system, 721.
 - (f) Scavenging work, 721.

IV. Oral evidence with respect to the extent of the power of control reserved to the employer:

- § 15. Evidence relating specifically to the nature of the contract as entered into, 721.
- § 16. Evidence as to the conduct or words of the parties during the progress of the work, 725.
- § 17. Same subject; independence of contract predicated, 727.
- § 18. Same subject; independence of contract negatived, 735.

V. Circumstantial evidence bearing upon the quality of the contract:

- § 19. Introductory, 744.
- § 20. Special skill required for the performance of the stipulated work, 745.
- § 21. Humble industrial status of the person employed, 745.
- § 22. Financial irresponsibility of the person employed, 751.

V.—continued.

- § 23. Contractor bound or not bound to perform the work himself, 751.
- § 24. Partition of the work among several contractors, 754.
- § 25. Footing upon which the remuneration of the person employed is computed, 755.
- § 26. Employer entitled to terminate the employment, 761.
- § 27. Employer not entitled to terminate the employment, 765.
- § 28. Contract not terminable without the consent of the person employed, 766.
- § 29. Employer entitled or not entitled to discharge the workmen hired by the contractor:
 - (a) Right vested in employer, 766.
 - (b) Right not vested in employer, 768.
 - (c) Bearing of these circumstances upon the question of special temporary service, 769.
- § 30. Employer empowered to control the employment and discharge of the workmen, 769.
- § 31. Contract not to be assigned or sublet without the employer's permission, 770.
- § 32. Party by whom the wages of the contractor's servants paid:
 - (a) Payment by the contractee, 772.
 - (b) Payment by the contractor, 773.
 - (c) Bearing of these circumstances upon the question of special, temporary service, 774.
- § 33. Contractor bound to furnish the labor required for the work, 774.
- § 34. Contractor bound to furnish the materials and appliances required for the work, 776.
- § 35. Contractor bound to furnish both the labor and appliances, 777.
- § 36. Employer bound to furnish the materials and appliances required for the work, 778.

V.—continued.

§ 37. Employer's surrender or retention of the control of the place of work:

(a) Control surrendered, 781.

(b) Control retained, 784.

§ 38. Arrangements with regard to the medical treatment of the workmen hired by the person employed. 787.

§ 39. Arrangements with regard to insurance against liability, 787.

§ 40. Obligation of contractor to indemnify employer for injuries resulting from the work, 788.

§ 41. Contractor a stockholder in employing company, 789.

§ 42. Contractor a director of employing company, 789.

§ 42a. Contracting company an auxiliary of the employing company, 790.

§ 43. Custom or usage, 790.

I. In general.

§ 1. Scope.

The evidential elements with reference to which the quality of the contract is determinable fall into two categories, viz.:

(1) Those which have a direct bearing upon the question whether the person employed was free from or subject to the control of the employer with respect to the details of the stipulated work.

(2) Those of a circumstantial description, which possess a merely indirect and inferential significance with respect to that question.

¹ In Harper v. Milwaukee (1872) 30 Wis. 365 (earth dug from a trench was left in such a position that the water in a drain was obstructed and diverted onto the plaintiff's premises), the independence of a contract with a city for the building of a sewer was held to be negatived, where the contract was let pursuant to the provisions of a statute by virtue of which the board of public works had full and complete control of the manner of the performance of the work

V.—continued.

§ 44. Miscellaneous facts—tending to show that the person employed was an independent contractor, 790.

§ 45. —tending to prove that the person employed was a servant, 792.

§ 46. —not inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor, 793.

§ 47. —not inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was a servant, 795.

§ 48. —irrelevant or immaterial, 795.

§ 49. Bad faith on employer's part in respect of making a contract independent in form, 795.

§ 50. Virtual identity of employing and employed companies or partnerships, 802.

§ 51. Estoppel of employer to aver independence of contract, 807.

The probative significance which has been ascribed to the various elements belonging to both of these categories is discussed in the present monograph.

§ 2. Effect of provisions in statutes and municipal ordinances.

The independence of a contract for the performance of municipal work is necessarily negatived, where it is made with reference to a statute or ordinance containing a provision the effect of which is to place the contractor completely under the control of some designated agent of the municipality during the progress of the work.¹

by the contractor during the progress thereof, and it was the duty of that board to reserve, in the contract for building the sewer, the right to determine finally all questions as to the proper performance thereof, or the doing of the work therein specified, and, in case of imperfect or improper performance, to suspend the work, to order a reconstruction thereof, or to relet the work to some other party. Wis. Private & Local Laws 1869, chap. 399, §§ 11, 17, chap. 401, § 12. The

§ 3. Identification of contractor and his servants for the purpose of determining the significance of an exercise of control.

In the cases in which the effect of evidence that the employer exercised control over the performance of the work has been considered, the courts have proceeded upon the theory that the contractor is so far identified with his servants that the probative significance of such evidence does not in any wise depend upon whether the control was exercised with respect to the contractor himself, or to his servants.¹ In a logical point of view this theory would seem to be unassailable.

court, not having the contract before it, entertained the presumption that it was made in accordance with the requirements of the statute. See also Kollock v. Madison (1893) 84 Wis. 458, 54 N. W. 725.

In St. Paul v. Seitz (1859) 3 Minn. 297, Gil. 205, 74 Am. Dec. 753 (plaintiff fell into an excavation made in the course of the grading of a street), the intention of the legislature that the city of St. Paul should "retain that supervisory and directory power over the details of the work and the manner of its performance which is so valuable to the citizen in protecting his person and property against the carelessness of irresponsible contractors," was held to be a necessary inference, for the reason that the charter provided as follows: "The said street commissioners shall have power to order and contract for the making, grading, repairing, and cleansing of streets, alleys, public ground, reservoirs, gutters, and sewers within their respective wards, and to direct and control the persons employed therein."

In Seattle v. Buzby (1880) 2 Wash. Terr. 25, 3 Pac. 180, and Smith v. Seattle (1899) 20 Wash. 613, 56 Pac. 389, the independence of the contracts in question was held to be negated by the fact that they were made with reference to ordinances which declared that the stipulated work was to be done "under the supervision" of the designated agents of the defendants. See, however, cases cited in § 12, infra.

In Cooper v. Seattle (1897) 16 Wash. 462, 58 Am. St. Rep. 46, 47 Pac. 887, the charter of the defendant city

II. Stipulations construed as investing the employer with powers of control which do not extend to the details of the work.

§ 4. In general.

The general doctrine is well established, that stipulations which entitle the employer to exercise a certain measure of control over the work, but go no further than to enable him to secure that it shall be properly performed, do not affect the quality of contracts which, apart from those stipulations, would be construed as independent.¹ In other words, the reprovided that such improvements as were made by contractors should be "under the management" of its board of public works. But the decision holding that the contractor was a servant of the city was apparently founded entirely on the stipulations of the contract itself.

See also KALER v. PUGET SOUND B. & O. Co. (reported herewith, ante, 674).

¹ For cases in which the independence of the contract was held not to be destroyed by proof of the exercise of a certain measure of control over the contractor's servants, see Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322 (employer directed driver of contractor's wagon where to haul certain bricks, how to load them, and where to deliver them); Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; App. T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525 (clerk of employer of trucking firm gave directions as to where the drivers were to take the goods.).

¹ "The right of the employer to exercise a limited control over the work, without thereby destroying the independent character of the contract, has been recognized by the courts in numerous cases. The rule seems to be well established that where the control reserved does not apply to the mode or manner of having the work done, and does not in any way take the work out of the hands of the contractor, it will not destroy the independent nature of the contract. . . . In other words, the relation of master and servant is not to be inferred from the reservation by the employer of powers which do not deprive the contractor of his right to use his own methods in accordance with his contract." St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Madden (1908) 77 Kan. 80, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788, 93 Pac. 586.

"The mere fact that a proprietor retains a general supervision over work to be constructed for him by another, for the purpose of satisfying himself that the contractor carries out the stipulations of his contract, does not make him, the proprietor, responsible for the wrongs done to third persons in the prosecution of the work." Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

If the other provisions of the contract are such as render the person employed an independent contractor, he will not be converted into a servant by the insertion of stipulations reserving to the employer "the right to change, inspect, and supervise to the extent necessary to produce the result intended by the contract." Upington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115.

"The mere fact of direction as to things to be done, without control over the methods or means of doing them, does not make a contractor a servant." Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 164—quoted in Powley v. Vivian & Co. (1915) 169 App. Div. 170, 154 N. Y. Supp. 426, 10 N. C. C. A. 835.

In one case the broad rule was laid down that the mere right of the defendant to supervise the work so far as to see whether it was done according to contract does not throw the responsibility, if any, of the contractor, on the employer. Welsh v. Lehigh & W. Coal Co. (1886) 2 Sadler (Pa.) 319, 5 Atl. 48.

"It is now an accepted rule that supervision of such work [i. e., building a railway] may be retained without interfering with the independent action or liability of contractors who have engaged to perform it, or subdivisions of it." Larson v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1892) 110 Mo. 234, 16 L.R.A. 330, 33 Am. St. Rep. 439, 19 S. W. 416.

"Although the employer may have had an agent who supervised the work for the mere purpose of seeing that it was done in conformity to the contract, without interfering as to the particular method in which it was done, or the means by which a given result was to be accomplished, that would not be in law a control and direction of the work by her; and she would not be responsible for the manner in which the work was done." Harrison v. Kiser (1887) 79 Ga. 588, 4 S. E. 320 (language of headnote prepared by the court).

An employer cannot be held liable for the acts of a contractor merely because his engineer has a general supervision of the work, where the power of such engineer is "limited to the manner of its accomplishment, and the time within which it should be finished, rather than the means to be used." Edmundson v. Pittsburgh, M. & Y. R. Co. (1885) 111 Pa. 316, 2 Atl. 404.

A contract is none the less independent because the employer's representative has the right to see that the work is properly done. Murphy v. Ottawa (1887) 13 Ont. Rep. 334.

One of the stipulations which, in Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1919) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477, was held to be independent, was that the contractor should provide facilities for inspection by the employer.

In Reedie v. London & N. W. R. Co. (1849) 4 Exch. 244, 154 Eng. Reprint, 1201, 6 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 184, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 65, a provision by which the employer reserved a general power of watching the work was treated as immaterial. In fact, it was not even contended by counsel that it changed the relation of the parties to that of master and servant.

In Crudup v. Schreiner (1901) 98 Ill. App. 337, the provision which was held not to affect the independence of a subcontractor was contained in the following contract between the principal employer and the contractor in chief: "The contractor must personally superintend the whole of this work at all times in every detail, or appoint a competent foreman to represent him, to whom all necessary orders may be given from time to time during the progress of the work."

In Thurston v. Kansas City Terminal R. Co. (1914) — Mo. App. —, 168 S. W. 236, it was provided by one of the clauses in a contract for the demolition of a building belonging to the defendant company that it should name and furnish a man to look after its interest while the work was in progress, who was to be paid by the other party a sum of not less than $15 per week, until the work was completed. Held, that the provision did not operate so as to repel the inference, deducible from the residue of the contract, that the person employed was an independent contractor.

In Arkansas Natural Gas Co. v. Miller (1912) 105 Ark. 477, 152 S. W. 147, a written contract for the construction of a pipe line, whereby the contractors agreed to furnish the material and do the work for a stipulated price, provided that "all material furnished by the said contractor in the construction and laying of said pipe line, and all work done, should be subject to the inspection and approval of the company, or its duly authorized agent, and that the said inspection shall be made as work progresses, and that any defective materials, or workmanship shall be pointed out by it as soon as the same is discovered, and the said defect shall be at once remedied by the said contractor." Held, that this provision did not operate so as to render the defendant liable for the negligent acts of the contractors or their servants.

In Mason & H. Co. v. Highland (1909) — Ky. —, 116 S. W. 320, an instruction by which the jury were told that the employers were not liable for an injury sustained by the plaintiff, while in the service of an independent contractor, but which contained the qualifying statement that such liability would be predicable if they retained control of the stipulated work, was held erroneous in respect of its not sufficiently informing the jury that the employers might, without destroying the independent character of the contract, retain control of the work, to the extent of seeing that it was done in accordance with the contract.

In Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888, the contract between the water board of New Orleans and a construction company contained the following provision, apparently inserted ex abundanti cantela: "It is well understood that the right of supervision by the general superintendent and other employees of the board will not make the contractor an agent of the board, and that the liability of the contractor for all damages to public or private property arising from the contractor's execution of the work shall not be lessened because of such right of supervision. Such right of supervision is retained in order to insure to the board the completion of the work according to the specifications, and to insure the public in general from all unnecessary inconveniences during the construction of the work." Such a provision was undoubtedly binding, as the court laid down, upon the two parties to the contract. But a stipulation of this sort would clearly be ineffectual to relieve the contractee of responsibility for the contractor's defaults, if the right of supervision reserved by the contract had actually been sufficiently extensive to place the former in the position of a master with regard to the latter.

20 A.L.R.—44.

For other cases in which the doctrine stated in the text has been recognized, see:

Alabama. — Chattahoochee & G. R. Co. v. Behrman (1903) 136 Ala. 508, 35 So. 132.

Arkansas. — St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Knott (1891) 54 Ark. 424, 16 S. W. 9; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gillihan (1906) 77 Ark. 551, 92 S. W. 793; Arkansas Natural Gas Co. v. Miller (1912) 105 Ark. 477, 152 S. W. 147; Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Sechrist (1915) 118 Ark. 561, 177 S. W. 37.

California. — Green v. Soule (1904) 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 8; Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Johnson v. Helbing (1907) 6 Cal. App. 424, 92 Pac. 360; Buckingham v. Commery-Peterson Co. (1919) 39 Cal. App. 154, 178 Pac. 318.

Connecticut. — Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32.

District of Columbia. — Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. —.

Georgia. — Lee v. Atlanta, B. & A. R. Co. (1911) 9 Ga. App. 752, 72 S. E. 165.

Illinois. — Nevins v. Peoria (1886) 41 Ill. 502, 89 Am. Dec. 392; Pfau v. Williamson (1872) 63 Ill. 16; Pioneer Fireproof Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17; Boyd v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1905) 217 Ill. 332, 108 Am. St. Rep. 253, 75 N. E. 496 ("only a right of general supervision and inspection to see that the contract was properly performed"); Bayer v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. (1896) 68 Ill. App. 219; Cary v. Chi-

Chicago (1895) 60 Ill. App. 341; Fitzpatrick v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. (1889) 81 Ill. App. 649, appeal dismissed in (1891) 139 Ill. 248, 28 N. E. 837; Geist v. Rothchild (1900) 90 Ill. App. 324; Bjornson v. Saccone (1899) 88 Ill. App. 6 (contractor agreed to "permit the owners and all persons appointed by them to visit and inspect the said work, or any part thereof, at all times and places, during the progress of the same, and shall provide sufficient, safe, and proper facilities for such inspection"); Vacker v. Yeager (1909) 151 Ill. App. 144; Fell v. Chicago Bldg. & Special Constr. Co. (1914) 187 Ill. App. 286.

Indiana.—New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper (1891) 131 Ind. 363, 30 N. E. 294; Staldter v. Huntington (1899) 153 Ind. 354, 55 N. E. 88; Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 66, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220; Prest-O-Lite Co. v. Skeel (1914) 182 Ind. 593, 106 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 474, 7 N. C. C. A. 724 (contract provided that the owner, through a person called an inspector, should have the authority to examine the materials furnished, and to condemn those which did not conform to the prescribed standard, and that his inspector could also arrest the progress of the work if he found that it was not conforming to the standard prescribed in the contract); Julius Keller Constr. Co. v. Herkless (1915) 59 Ind. App. 472, 109 N. E. 797.

Iowa.—Hughbanks v. Boston Invest. Co. (1894) 92 Iowa, 267, 60 N. W. 640; Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. (1907) 122 Iowa, 635, 98 N. W. 482.

Kansas.—Pottorff v. Fidelity Coal Min. Co. (1912) 86 Kan. 774, 122 Pac. 120 (in syllabus of court).

Louisiana.—Robichaux v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. (1912) 131 La. 727, 60 So. 206; Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

Massachusetts.—Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411; Gorham v. Cross (1878) 125 Mass. 232, 28 Am. Rep. 224; Morgan v. Smith (1893) 159 Mass. 570, 35 N. E. 101.

Michigan.—Bacon v. Candler (1914) 181 Mich. 372, 148 N. W. 194.

Missouri.—Crenshaw v. Ullman (1892) 113 Mo. 633, 20 S. W. 1077; McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co.

(1890) 40 Mo. App. 449; Ege v. Phoenix Brick & Constr. Co. (1906) 118 Mo. App. 630, 94 S. W. 999.

New York.—Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115; Froelich v. New York (1910) 199 N. Y. 466, 93 N. E. 79, modifying judgment in (1908) 129 App. Div. 909, 144 N. Y. Supp. 1127 ("right to change, supervise, and inspect to the extent necessary to produce the result intended by the contract"); Herman v. Buffalo (1915) 214 N. Y. 316, 108 N. E. 451; Hawke v. Brown (1898) 28 App. Div. 37, 50 N. Y. Supp. 1032; Duerr v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1903) 86 App. Div. 14, 83 N. Y. Supp. 714; Carpenter v. New York (1906) 115 App. Div. 552, 101 N. Y. Supp. 402; Jaskoey v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1900) 33 Misc. 790, 67 N. Y. Supp. 976; Gardner v. Bennett (1874) 6 Jones & S. 197; Clare v. National City Bank (1875) 8 Jones & S. 104.

North Carolina.—Denny v. Burlington (1911) 155 N. C. 39, 70 S. E. 1085, 3 N. C. C. A. 922; Hopper v. Ordway (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839; Johnson v. Carolina, C. & O. R. Co. (1911) 157 N. C. 382, 72 S. E. 1057; Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 457, 63 S. E. 740.

Oklahoma.—Bokoshe Smokeless Coal Co. v. Morehead (1912) 34 Okla. 424, 126 Pac. 1033 (coal company reserved the right to inspect, examine, and survey the premises at any time, and it was agreed that all the "workings" on the premises should be done under the general supervision of the company).

Oregon.—Giacconi v. Astoria (1911) 60 Or. 12, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 113 Pac. 855, 118 Pac. 180.

Pennsylvania.—Reed v. Allegheny (1875) 79 Pa. 300; Wray v. Evans (1875) 80 Pa. 102; Welsh v. Parrish (1892) 148 Pa. 599, 24 Atl. 86; Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

Texas.—Simonton v. Perry (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 62 S. W. 1090; Edmundson v. Coca-Cola Co. (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 273.

Virginia.—Bibb v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1891) 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. 163.

Washington.—Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (1905) 39 Wash. 631, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) 283, 109 Am. St. Rep. 917, 81 Pac. 1089; Larson v. American Bridge Co. (1905) 40 Wash. 224, 111 Am. St. Rep. 904, 82 Pac. 294; Cary v. Spark-lation of master and servant is not inferable from the reservation of powers which do not "deprive the contractor of his right to do the work according to his own initiative, so long as he does it in accordance with his contract."²

It would seem that, in the final analysis, this doctrine may appropriately be referred to the consideration that, to every agreement by which one person undertakes to produce certain concrete results for the benefit of another, there is attached an implied condition that the latter person shall have the right of refusing to accept the results finally obtained, if they do not constitute a satisfactory execution of the agreement.³

man & M. Co. (1911) 62 Wash. 363, — A.L.R. —, 113 Pac. 1093; North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017; Watson v. Hecla Min. Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 383, 140 Pac. 317 (stipulation "to do all in a workmanlike and substantial manner, the same to be inspected by the foreman" of the contractee); Johnston v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. (1915) 85 Wash. 551, 148 Pac. 900 (arguendo).

Canada.—Ballentine v. Ontario Pipe Line Co. (1908) 16 Ont. L. Rep. 654 (contract assumed by single judge to be independent); Smith v. Montreal (1917) Rap. Jud. Quebec 52 C. S. 284 (decision of single judge); Smith v. Ulen (1914) — Alberta L. R. —, 17 D. L. R. 400 (decision of single judge).

See also the cases cited in the following sections.

² A phrase used by Rigby, L. J., in Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council [1896] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 335, 353, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196.

In a Canadian case, Osler, J. A., expressed the opinion that the legal criterion for determining the question whether the relation of master and servant existed was whether the alleged master had the power of controlling the work which the alleged servant was doing for him, "in respect to anything not necessarily involved in the proper doing of the work." Saunders v. Toronto (1899) 26 Ont. App. Rep. 265.

³ The logical connection thus suggested is traceable in such a pas-

The courts have also emphasized the special consideration, appropriate, more particularly, to formal contracts of a somewhat elaborate description, that the question whether the person employed was an independent contractor or a mere servant "is not determined solely by the retention of a certain kind or degree of supervision by the employer. It is to be determined by the contract as a whole,—by its spirit and essence,—and not by the phraseology of a single sentence or paragraph."⁴ The effect of applying this test to a stipulation which on its face may be understood as reserving to the employer either a complete power of control over the work, or as confer-sage as the following: "Was there a control or direction of the person in opposition to a mere right to object to the quality or description of the work done? Where this element of personal control is found, then responsibility, either for malfeasance or nonfeasance, for fault or negligence, will attach not only to the servant or workman (he is always liable), but to him who had the personal control over him, who was his superior in the sense of the maxim [i. e., 'respondeat superior']. On the other hand, if an employer has no such personal control, but has merely the right to reject work that is ill done, or to stop work that is not being rightly done, but has no power over the person or time of the workman or artisan employed, then he will not be their superior in the sense of the maxim, and not answerable for their fault or negligence." Stephens v. Thurso Police Comrs. (1876) 3 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 542. This statement of principles was quoted with approval in Saunders v. Toronto (1899) 26 Ont. App. Rep. 265.

⁴ Foster v. Chicago (1902) 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E. 322, affirming (1901) 96 Ill. App. 4, held, with reference to the words "under the immediate direction and superintendence," that the nature of the relationship is to be ascertained "in the light of the entire instrument embracing the contract."

Ridgeway v. Downing Co. (1900) 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 218.

ring upon him merely the right of seeing that certain results are accomplished, will frequently be to create a reasonable certainty that the person employed was an independent contractor.⁵

⁵ In Erie v. Caulkins (1877) 85 Pa. 247, 27 Am. Rep. 642, the trial judge held that a stipulation of this tenor created the relation of master and servant, his conclusion being based upon a remark made by Strong, J., in Painter v. Pittsburgh (1863) 46 Pa. 213, to the effect that a certain clause there under review only gave the employer "the power to direct the results of the work, without any control over the manner of performing it, which control, alone, furnishes a ground for holding the master or principal for the act of a servant or agent." The supreme court, however, said: "The word 'manner,' in the above quotation, is evidently considered as having a meaning so general as to reduce the contractor to the grade of a mere servant or agent. 'Manner' must, in such a case, mean the power to control the work not only as to its character, but also as to the particular means used to accomplish it. This must needs be so, for, as we have seen in the case of Reed v. Allegheny (1875) 79 Pa. 300, a stipulation for general supervision of the work does not reduce the contractor to the grade of an agent, although necessarily, in such case, the engineer must, to some extent, control the manner in which the contract is performed. It is quite obvious that the word 'manner' must be construed with reference to the contract in which it is found. By the agreement under consideration, the work was not only to be done in such manner, but at such times and in such places, as the engineer shall direct; if this were the whole of the contract the matter would be of easy solution; but, turning to the body of the contract, we find that Grant was bound to begin the work on or before the 25th of October, and to finish it by the 25th of December following, so that the engineer's directions as to time must be limited by the periods thus expressed. So as to place; that is fixed between certain points on State street, and whilst the engineer might direct that the work should be done on either side or in the middle of that street, as he might think would best subserve the public welfare, his directions that the work should be done on some other street, or even beyond the points indicated on State street, would be utterly nugatory. Just so with reference to the manner in which the work is to be performed; that is carefully prescribed in the specifications, and within these prescriptions the engineer may direct, but not beyond them. If he does require and direct something which is not found therein, he must then act as arbiter between the contracting parties, and fix the rate of compensation for the work thus required, and that rate becomes part of the contract. This, in itself, exhibits two independent contracting parties who have provided themselves with an arbiter to settle their disputes. It is not thus with mere agents, or servants, for they themselves are but parts of the means used by the master to accomplish his design, and that he may choose to alter the theory or plan of the work before it is begun, or during its progress, is of no moment to them. This contract contemplates the accomplishment of a certain result; the means, so far as they are deemed necessary to give the work its proper character, are carefully specified; the province of the engineer was to see that these means were properly applied; in other words, to see that proper materials and methods were used to produce the required result. But in all this the contractor was supreme, for he had but to comply with his contract in delivering to the city a good job according to the terms of that contract."

In Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383, the trial judge, in an opinion adopted as correct by the supreme court, said: "'Noncompliance with the directions of the engineer' must be construed in connection with other parts of the contract. It evidently means noncompliance with his directions in such matters as, under the agreement, he had the right to direct. It does not, either expressly or by inference, give him the right to interfere with the means Stark chose to use to accomplish the work. Such right is not reserved in the agreement, and it was not within the contemplation of the

The general doctrine above stated obviously applies only to cases in which the reserved right of supervision has relation to "results, and not to the method of doing the stipulated work."⁶

An express stipulation to the effect that no control over the person employed is reserved by the employer with respect to the performance of the work, except as to the results to be accomplished, is an element proper to be considered.⁷ But manifestly it will not avail to protect the employer from liability to a third person, if the contract is otherwise of such a tenor as to require the conclusion that he was invested with the power of controlling the details of the work.⁸

§ 5. Stipulations requiring the contractor to satisfy a certain standard.

The general doctrine stated in the preceding section is illustrated, in one of its aspects, by the cases in which it has been held that the inclusion of such stipulations as the following does not destroy the independence of a contract:

That the work is to be done "under the supervision, and subject to the approval," of the employer or his agent.¹

That the work shall be "subject to approval and acceptance."² parties that the engineer could compel a forfeiture of the agreement by assuming, at his will, to give directions in matters over which the agreement did not give him jurisdiction."

⁶ Stagg v. Taylor (1916) 119 Va. 266, 89 S. E. 237—laying down the law with reference to a new trial.

In Harger v. Harger (1920) 144 Ark. 375, 222 S. W. 736, the court thus commented upon the fact that the lessor of the mine in question had reserved the right to send inspectors to see that the property was cared for and not injured: "The reservation of this right did not make the lessor liable for the failure of the lessee to keep the premises in good repair, for one of the essentials of a contract to have work done independently is that the work is to be done in the course of an independent occupation, according to the methods and under the direction of the contractor himself, and that he represents the will of the owner only as to the result of the work done."

⁷ In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 66 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342, where the person employed was held to be an independent contractor, a stipulation of this tenor was treated as one of the elements upon which that conclusion was based.

For cases in which contracts which included a similar provision were held to be independent, see Barton v. Studebaker Corp. (1920) — Cal. App. —, 189 Pac. 1025; Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. (1916) 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 36; Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849.

⁸ In Tiffin v. McCormack (1878) 34 Ohio St. 638, 32 Am. Rep. 408, 2 Mor. Min. Rep. 194, where such a contract was under review, the court laid it down that "a master cannot exonerate himself from responsibility to third persons, which the law imposes on him, for injury resulting from the misconduct of the servant, by contracting with the servant that he will not exercise any control over him."

In CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT (reported herewith) ante, 678, where the independence of the contract under review was deemed to be deducible from its other clauses, the court held that this conclusion was not negated by the fact that it also embraced the following clause: "It is hereby agreed and understood that the contractor shall be deemed and held as the original contractor, and the railway company reserves and holds no control over him in the doing of such work, other than as to the result to be accomplished."

¹ Vosbeck v. Kellogg (1899) 78 Minn. 176, 80 N. W. 957, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 86; Eaton v. European & N. A. R. Co. (1871) 59 Me. 520, 8 Am. Rep. 430; Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383; Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Alabama Midland R. Co. v. Martin (1893) 100 Ala. 511, 14 So. 401.

² Montain v. Fargo (1917) 38 N. D. 432, L.R.A.1918C, 600, 166 N. W. 416, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 826; Bain v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. (1909) 223 Pa. 96, 72 Atl. 279.

That the work shall be done in conformity with the contract and the rules of the employer.³

That the work shall be done in accordance with the plans and specifications.⁴

That the work shall be done "in accordance with the plans and specifications furnished" by the employer, "or such person as he may appoint."⁵

That the work shall be done "in accordance with the specifications and drawings and instructions that have been or may later be given."⁶

That the work shall be done "according to the employer's plans, and to the satisfaction" of his representative.⁷

That the labor, materials, machinery, etc., required for the performance of the contract, shall be provided in accordance with the plans and specifications.⁸

That the work shall be done "to the ³ Porter v. Tennessee Coal, Iron, & R. Co. (1912) 177 Ala. 406, 59 So. 255. The actual words of the contract are not stated in the report.

⁴ Morning v. Cramp & Co. (1909) 170 Fed. 364; Johnson v. Helbing (1907) 6 Cal. App. 424, 92 Pac. 360; Long v. Moon (1891) 107 Mo. 334, 17 S. W. 810; Crenshaw v. Ullman (1893) 113 Mo. 633, 20 S. W. 1077; Omaha Bridge & Terminal Co. v. Hargadine (1904) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 418, 98 N. W. 1071, second appeal (1906) 76 Neb. 729, 107 N. W. 864; Hopper v. S. S. Ordway & Sons (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839 (work was to be finished complete to the intent and meaning of the specifications, and the plans and details); Allen v. Willard (1868) 57 Pa. 374; School Dist. v. Fuess (1881) 98 Pa. 600, 42 Am. Rep. 627; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902 ("work to be done by the said contractors to the satisfaction of the engineer of the railroad company, according to the said specifications, plans, profiles, and sections, and according to such working plans and explanatory drawings and instructions as may from time to time be furnished by said engineer"); Morris v. Salt Lake City (1909) 35 Utah, 474, 101 Pac. 373; Cary v. Sparkman & M. Co. (1911) 62 Wash. 363, — A.L.R. —, 113 Pac. 1093.

In Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495 (writ of error denied by supreme court), one of the provisions in a contract held to be independent was to the effect that, if the work was not sufficiently explained by the drawings and specifications, the contractor was to apply to the architect for such further drawings and explanations as might be necessary, and was to comply with the same so far as consistent with the original drawings and specifications, the decision of the architect being conclusive, in case of doubt, as to the meaning of the drawings and specifications.

Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan (1909) 174 Ind. 1, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 85, 87 N. E. 215, 90 N. E. 65, 68, 91 N. E. 503; St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Willis (1888) 38 Kan. 330, 16 Pac. 728.

⁵ Hunt v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1866) 51 Pa. 475. The court held that the word "instructions," used in the agreement, referred to the kind of structure, design, materials, combinations, and all matters pertaining to the planning of the building to be erected, but that, as to the mode of accomplishing the work which the contractor undertook, he was left to his own skill and judgment.

⁶ Bain v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. (1909) 223 Pa. 96, 72 Atl. 279.

⁷ Allen v. Hayward (1845) 7 Q. B. 960, 115 Eng. Reprint, 749, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 99, 10 Jur. 92, 4 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 104; Philadelphia & R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. —.

⁸ Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

In Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 196, — A.L.R. —, it was stipulated as follows: "The contractor is to provide all manner of labor, materials, apparatus, machinery, appliances, power, light, and all other things needful or necessary for the performance of the work in strict accordance with the attached drawings and specifications forming a part of this contract, and to the satisfaction of the chief engineer of the railroad company."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542, the contract under review contained the following clause: "Said labor, teams, tools, engines, machinery, and mate-satisfaction" of the employer or the employer's agent.⁹

That the work shall be done "to the satisfaction and acceptance" of the employer's agent.¹⁰

That the men and appliances furnished under the contract shall be acceptable to the designated agent of the employer.¹¹ rials to be furnished, and the said work to be done, by said contractors, to the satisfaction of the engineer of the railroad company, according to said specifications, plans, profiles, and sections, and according to such working plans and explanatory drawings and instructions as may from time to time be furnished by said engineer."

⁹ United States.—New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Hanning (1873) 15 Wall. 649, 21 L. ed. 220; 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 309.

Georgia.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542; Lampton v. Cedartown Co. (1909) 6 Ga. App. 147, 64 S. E. 495; Lee v. Atlanta, B. & A. R. Co. (1911) 9 Ga. App. 752, 72 S. E. 165.

Illinois.—Crudup v. Schreiner (1901) 98 Ill. App. 337.

Massachusetts.—Connors v. Hennessey (1873) 112 Mass. 96; Eldred v. Mackie (1901) 178 Mass. 1, 59 N. E. 673.

Michigan.—Holbrook v. Olympia Hotel Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 597, 166 N. W. 876.

Missouri.—Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16.

Nebraska.—Omaha Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Hargadine (1904) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 418, 98 N. W. 1071, second appeal (1906) 76 Neb. 729, 107 N. W. 864.

Ohio.—Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461.

Oregon.—Giaconi v. Astoria (1911) 60 Or. 12, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 113 Pac. 855, 118 Pac. 180.

Pennsylvania.—Wray v. Evans (1875) 80 Pa. 102; Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

Tennessee.—Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. (1890) 88 Tenn. 692, 17 Am. St. Rep. 925, 13 S. W. 691; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Texas.—Ewing v. Litzmann (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 742.

Washington.—Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (1905) 39 Wash. 631, 1

That the work shall be done under a specified municipal ordinance "to the full satisfaction and acceptance" of the municipality.¹²

That suitable material is to be furnished, and a specified structure erected, subject to the daily approval of the employer's engineer.¹³

That the labor and material used

L.R.A.(N.S.) 283, 109 Am. St. Rep. 917, 81 Pac. 1089; Johnston v. Seattle Taxicab & Transfer Co. (1915) 85 Wash. 551, 148 Pac. 900.

Wisconsin.—Smith v. Milwaukee Builders' & T. Exchange (1895) 91 Wis. 360, 30 L.R.A. 504, 51 Am. St. Rep. 912, 64 N. W. 1041.

The liability of the employer was denied, where the contractor had offered to do the work of excavation for "$645, lump job," and the defendant had accepted the offer in a letter, in which, among the other terms given, it was stated that "the excavation was to be done absolutely in accordance with the drawing," and "to the full satisfaction of the architect," and that the lines of the excavation were to be given by their engineer. Hunt v. Vanderbilt (1894) 115 N. C. 559, 20 S. E. 168.

¹⁰ Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. (1909) 174 Ind. 1, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 85, 87 N. E. 215, 90 N. E. 65, 68, 91 N. E. 503 ("satisfaction and acceptance"); Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411.

¹¹ Montain v. Fargo (1917) 38 N. D. 432, L.R.A.1918C, 600, 166 N. W. 416, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 826.

¹² Ibid.

¹³ Casement v. Brown (1893) 148 U. S. 615, 37 L. ed. 582, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 672. The court said: "This constant right of supervision, and this continuing duty of satisfying the judgment of the engineers, do not alter the fact that it was a contract to do a particular work, and in accordance with plans and specifications already prepared. They did not agree to enter generally into the service of the companies, and do whatever their employers called upon them to do, but they contracted for only a specific work. The functions of the engineers were to see that they complied with this contract. . . . They were to see that the thing produced and the result obtained were such as the contract provided for."

by the contractor shall be subject to the "approval" of the agent designated by the contractee.¹⁴

That no work shall be commenced until the drawings therefor are approved by the engineer of the employer.¹⁵

That the employer may inspect the work at any time, and direct changes to be made in work which has not been done, or is not being done, in accordance with the contract.¹⁶

That the contractor shall remedy all defects in the work or materials, when ordered to do so by a designated agent of the employer.¹⁷

That the employer's agent shall have the right of rejecting unsatisfactory materials.¹⁸

Some of the stipulations tabulated in the next section contain words which would render it possible, as a matter of classification, to place them under the same category as those specified above.

¹⁴ Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132; Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888; Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16.

¹⁵ Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (Ill.) supra.

¹⁶ Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740.

¹⁷ Arkansas Natural Gas Co. v. Miller (1912) 105 Ark. 477, 152 S. W. 147 (defective materials or workmanship, to be remedied, "as soon as the same is pointed out"); Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439 (defective work and material to be remedied to the satisfaction of the employer's engineer); Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32 (any materials or implements brought on the ground which the employer's agent "shall deem to be of improper description, or improper to be used in the work," shall be removed "forthwith"); Prest-O-Lite Co. v. Skeel (1914) 182 Ind. 593, 106 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 474, 7 N. C. C. A. 724 (employer's inspector empowered to condemn materials not conforming to the prescribed standard); Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1919) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477 (contractor "shall remove after notice all materials condemned by the architect"); Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888 (contract empowered the employer's agent to require the contractor to discontinue the use of machinery which, in the agent's judgment, was not adapted to the purpose for which it was being used, and also to remedy all neglected portions of the work, and all improperly constructed work, on notice in writing from the employer's engineer.

Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16 (contractor shall, "upon being so directed by the engineer," remove, rebuild, or make good, at his own cost, any work which the "latter shall decide to be defective"); Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115 (any "materials or implements brought upon the ground" which the engineer "shall deem to be of improper description, or improper to be used in the work," shall be removed forthwith); Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495 (contractor to take down "all portions of the work condemned" by the architect as unsound, or improper, or not conforming to specifications and drawings"); Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863 (contractor required to remove any work defectively done, whenever "directed" to do so); Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 143 Pac. 408 ("all imperfect or insufficient work or material, when pointed out by the engineer of the company, shall be immediately remedied and made good and sufficient by the contractor, at his own cost and expense, to the satisfaction of said engineer"); McGrath v. St. Louis (1909) 215 Mo. 191, 114 S. W. 611 (employer's engineer shall have power to condemn work and require it to be reconstructed); Ewing v. Litzmann (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 742 (contractor shall remove all materials condemned by the employer's architect, and discontinue all portions of the work condemned by him).

¹⁸ Fitzpatrick v. Chicago & W. I. R. Co. (1889) 31 Ill. App. 649 (words of clause are not stated). Appeal dismissed in (1891) 139 Ill. 248, 28 N. E. 837.

§ 6. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered in general terms to give directions concerning the work.

The extent to which the courts have gone in refusing to infer the existence of the relation of master and servant is shown in a still more striking manner, by the decisions with respect to stipulations investing the employer or his representative with the right to give "directions," "orders," or "instructions," concerning the performance of the work.¹ This principle of interpretation has been deemed to warrant the inference that a contract is none the less independent in its character, because it contains one or other of the following provisions:

That the work was to be done "in accordance with instructions" from the employer.²

That the person employed shall "conform to all the instructions" of the employer's agent "as to the mode of doing the work."³

That the employer's agent shall "superintend the work, and give such instructions from time to time as the necessities of the work shall demand."⁴

¹ That there was at first a disposition on the part of judges to construe such a stipulation to the disadvantage of the employer may, perhaps, be inferred from some remarks of Lord Denman, in Allen v. Hayward (1845) 7 Q. B. 960, 115 Eng. Reprint, 749, 4 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 104, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 99, 10 Jur. 92. Referring to a clause of the contract which required that all such parts of the work as were not specified and described in the contract, or plans and specifications, should be executed in such manner as the surveyor of the works should direct, he said that this provision appeared to take power from the contractor, and keep it in the hands of the commissioners, or their surveyor. But it was held not to be applicable to the facts under discussion, and its actual effect was not determined.

² Smith v. State Workmen's Ins. Fund (1918) 262 Pa. 286, 19 A.L.R. 1156, 105 Atl. 90.

³ McGrath v. St. Louis & H. Constr. Co. (1908) 215 Mo. 191, 114 S. W. 611.

That the person employed shall "at all times conform to, and comply with, such instructions as may be given by the employer's agent."⁵

That the work shall be performed "in such manner as shall be directed."⁶

That the work shall be done, and the materials furnished, "as directed" by the employer's agent.⁷

That the work shall be done "subject to the inspection and direction" of the employer's agent.⁸

That the employer's agent shall "supervise and direct the work."⁹

That the work shall be executed "under the supervision" of the employer's agent, and "as he may direct."¹⁰

That the materials and work are to be furnished and done "according to the plan and under the direction and supervision" of the employer's agent.¹¹

That the work shall be done "under the direction and supervision" of the employer's agent.¹²

That the employer shall have the right of supervising, by his agents, the execution of the work, and of giving directions with respect to it.¹³

⁴ Robinson v. Webb (1875) 11 Bush (Ky.) 464.

⁵ Pearson v. M. M. Potter Co. (1909) 10 Cal. App. 245, 101 Pac. 681.

⁶ United States v. Driscoll (1877) 96 U. S. 421, 24 L. ed. 847 (case involving a workman's claim for extra compensation).

⁷ Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

⁸ Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411.

⁹ New Orleans M. & C. R. Co. v. Hanning (1873) 15 Wall. (U. S.) 649, 21 L. ed. 220, 7 Am. Neg. Cas. 309.

¹⁰ Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

¹¹ Allen v. Willard (1868) 57 Pa. 374.

¹² Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439; Montain v. Fargo (1917) 38 N. D. 432, L.R.A.1918C, 600, 166 N. W. 416, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 826.

¹³ Weber v. Buffalo R. Co. (1897) 20 App. Div. 292, 47 N. Y. Supp. 7.

That the work shall be done "as directed" by the employer or his designated agent.¹⁴

That the work shall be done "under the direction" of a designated agent of the employer.¹⁵ In one of the cases in which the contract contained a provision of this tenor, there was the further statement that the decision of the agent "as to the true construction and meaning of the drawings and specifications shall be final."¹⁶

That the work shall be done "according to the drawings prepared by the employer's architect, and under the architect's direction."¹⁷

That the work shall be done "ac-ording to plans and specifications, under the supervision" of the employer's architect.¹⁸

That the work shall be done "under the direction" of the employer's architect, and "in conformity to" certain drawings and specifications.¹⁹

That the contractor is to complete the work in conformity with plans, "in strict obedience to the directions which from time to time will be given by the city engineer, or his authorized agents, in accordance with certain specifications."²⁰

That the work shall be done "under the direction and to the satisfaction" of the employer's agent.²¹

¹⁴ Kirby v. Lackawanna Steel Co. (1905) 109 App. Div. 334, 95 N. Y. Supp. 833.

In LaGroue v. New Orleans (1905) 114 La. 253, 38 So. 160, the words "as directed," in a contract by which a man agreed to plant trees in a street, were construed as referring to the particular places at which the trees were to be planted, and not as importing that the board was to supervise the mode of planting. "This was left to the superior knowledge of the contractor, and the board and city were protected by his guaranty."

¹⁵ Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. v. Brennan (1909) 174 Ind. 1, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 85, 87 N. E. 215, 90 N. E. 65, 68, 91 N. E. 503; Scharff v. Southern Illinois Constr. Co. (1905) 115 Mo. App. 157, 92 S. W. 126; Burke v. Ireland (1898) 26 App. Div. 487, 50 N. Y. Supp. 369.

¹⁶ United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 105 C. C. A. 486, 182 Fed. 620.

¹⁷ Scharff v. Southern Illinois Constr. Co. (1905) 115 Mo. App. 157, 92 S. W. 126.

¹⁸ Jansen v. Jersey City (1897) 61 N. J. L. 243, 39 Atl. 1025, 4 Am. Neg. Rep. 313.

¹⁹ Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1918) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477.

²⁰ Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16.

²¹ Frassi v. McDonald (1898) 122 Cal. 400, 55 Pac. 139, 772; Ridgeway v. Downing Co. (1900) 109 Ga. 591, 34 S. E. 1028; Pioneer Fireproof Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17, affirming (1897) 69 Ill. App. 659, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 16; Foster v. Chicago (1902) 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E.

322; Bjornson v. Saccone (1900) 88 Ill. App. 6; Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132; Prest-O-Lite Co. v. Skeel (1914) 182 Ind. 593, 106 N. E. 366, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 474, 7 N. C. C. A. 724; Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray (1897) 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803; Kelly v. New York (1854) 11 N. Y. 432; Slater v. Mersereau (1876) 64 N. Y. 138.

In Humpton v. Unterkirchner (1896) 97 Iowa, 509, 66 N. W. 776, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 595, a clause which provided that the work was to be done "under the direction of the defendants and their architect, and to their entire satisfaction, approval, and acceptance" was thus commented upon: "It is manifest that this direction, approval, and acceptance had reference to the time within which it should be performed, with reference to other parts of the work, and to the results to be accomplished, and not to the method or manner in which it should be performed. Defendants had no control over the men who should be employed by either of these contractors. They could not say who should be employed or who discharged. They had the right, under their contracts, to say what should be done, but not how it should be brought about, or who should do it. . . . Appellant relied largely upon the use of the word 'discretion,' as employed in the contracts referred to. We do not regard this as in any sense conclusive. When we look at the whole contract, it is apparent that the only direction the architect or the owner could give was as to what should be done to accomplish the ends aimed at by the contract. He could

That certain portions of the work are to be done "as directed" by the inspector or superintendent of the employer, and that the whole work is to be done "subject to the direction" of the superintendent at all times.²³

That the work shall be performed "as ordered by the employer's engineer and to his satisfaction."²³ not dictate the means or methods to be employed. This is the interpretation which has uniformly been placed upon such contracts."

A provision in a building contract that the work shall be performed in accordance with the plans and drawings, and executed under the direction and to the satisfaction of the owner's architect, does not authorize the latter to modify the plans, so as to relieve the contractor from doing the work called for by the contract; and the owner cannot be held liable for injuries to an employee of a subcontractor from the fall of the building during erection, owing to a change in the specifications by the architect. Burke v. Ireland (1898) 26 App. Div. 487, 50 N. Y. Supp. 369.

²³ United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 105 C. C. A. 486, 182 Fed. 620.

²³ Gagnon v. Saraguay Electric Light & P. Co. (1909) Rap. Jud. Quebec 36 S. C. 227.

²⁴ Foster v. Chicago (1901) 96 Ill. App. 4, affirmed in (1902) 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E. 322. In an opinion, adopted by the supreme court as being a correct statement of principles, the court of appeals said: "The requirement that the time and manner of doing the work must be satisfactory to the city's commissioner of public works does not include the means employed, and is limited by the provisions of the contract. The direction and superintendence provided for do not relieve the contractor of responsibility, or permit the city to change or modify the terms of the written instrument. The contractor agrees to do all work necessary to fully complete the sewer in the manner required by the contract, as well as in a manner satisfactory to the city. Provided he reaches a satisfactory result in building such a sewer as the contract calls for, the contractor is not prevented from using his own methods. The specifications require the sides of a trench, like that where the caving

That the work shall be done "under the immediate direction and superintendence," of the employer's representative, and "to his entire satisfaction, approval, and acceptance."²⁴

That the work shall be done "subject to the direction and acceptance" of the employer's agent.²⁵

That "the work shall, at every stage occurred, 'to be effectually supported with suitable planks and timbers by the contractor without expense to the city.' The method of using such planks and timbers for such purpose is left to the contractor. The contract does not include the direction, management, and control by the city of every detail of the work. The contractor was not required to take his orders, day by day, from the city. He was to be guided by the contract and the specifications constituting a part thereof. He was not a mere servant and employee. He was an independent contractor, the city retaining such supervisory powers as it might, from time to time, find it necessary to exercise to insure compliance with the contract, and to obtain the result called for thereby."

²⁵ In Hooe v. Boston & N. Street R. Co. (1904) 187 Mass. 67, 72 N. E. 341, where the trial judge was held to have properly declined to instruct the jury that certain employees engaged in the work in question were not servants of one Farnum, but of the railway company for which he had undertaken to perform the work, the court thus commented upon the terms of the written agreement between Farnum and the company: "It was a contract which gave Farnum the legal right to provide all the necessary labor and materials to complete the subgrading and ballasting of the proposed line of railroad. By the terms of the writing he was to have 'the general direction of the work,' and he could be displaced only in case the progress made on the work was 'not satisfactory to the railroad company,' in reference to the time when he agreed to have it completed. The expression, 'subject to the direction and acceptance of the engineer,' is similar to the common provision in building contracts, which gives the architect a right to represent the owner in determining whether the work is in accordance with the requirements of the contract. In this case the work to be done is described of its progress, be subjected to the direction, inspection, and acceptance of the employer's engineer."²⁶ In one of the cases in which this phraseology was used in the contract, it was also provided that the engineer "shall determine what, in any case, is a fair construction of the contract, and what such construction requires to be done by either party."²⁷

That the contractor shall comply with the "directions" of the employer's superintendent of construction as to the time and manner of performing the work, the precautions to be taken, and the quality of the materials and workmanship.²⁸ in the agreement very generally. Probably something as to the details of construction was understood to be left to the determination of the engineer or agent. But this did not give to the engineer any right of control or direction as to the execution of the work, after he had indicated to the contractor what was to be done and what materials were to be furnished. This further right was to determine whether the work done by the contractor was acceptable."

In Vacker v. Yeager (1909) 151 Ill. App. 144, it was laid down that the contract in question, in so far as it provided that the work should be done under the direction of the defendants or their authorized foreman, and accepted by the architects or their authorized representative, conferred upon the contractor merely the right of inspection, and that the reservation of such right of inspection was not a reservation of the power to control the method of doing the work.

²⁶ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902; Madisonville, H. & E. R. Co. v. Owen (1912) 147 Ky. 1, 143 S. W. 421.

²⁷ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542.

²⁸ Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508. Discussing the contention that the defendants were denied the control of the work and the mode of performing it by this provision, the court said: "This is a misapprehension of the effect of this clause of the agreement. The contract provides that the work shall be completed in two weeks, and the specifications require the materials to be the best of their respective kinds, and the entire work 'to be constructed and finished in every part in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, according to the accompanying drawings and this specification.' It is apparent, therefore, that the clause of the agreement just referred to conferred on the owner's superintendent of construction only such supervisory powers as would enable him to see that the defendants were performing the work in compliance with the provisions of the contract and specifications, and gave him no authority to direct the workmen as to the methods of executing the details of the work. If he discovered, on inspection, that the defendants' employees were neglecting or not properly constructing the work, it was not his duty to instruct them how to do it, or to require them to do it in a proper manner, but to notify their employers, the defendants, of their conduct, and, upon failure of the defendants to have the work satisfactorily performed, the owner was authorized by the agreement, at the cost and expense of the defendants, to 'employ on the work such mechanics, overseers, and laborers, . . . and purchase such materials, as may . . . be necessary' to make up or correct the shortcomings, omissions, or delinquencies of the defendants, who were liable to the owner for damages caused by their default. This view of this clause of the contract in question is supported by the language of the agreement immediately preceding the clause, which declares that the defendants shall provide safe and proper facilities for the inspection of the work by the owner's superintendent of construction." There is a seeming conflict between this decision and Herrington v. Booth (1916) 252 Pa. 70, 97 Atl. 178. See § 12, note 22, infra.

In Romaniuk v. Grand Trunk P. R. Co. (1914; C. A.) 24 Manitoba L. R. 797, 20 D. L. R. 301, the plaintiff, a workman in the service of M. & M., a firm of contractors employed by the defendant company to fill a bay with rocks in order to protect the railway track, was injured by a rock which rolled down on him while engaged in loading the boat by which the materials for the filling were conveyed to the bay. The provisions of the contract regarded as material in the case

That the work is to be conformed to such "further direction" as shall be given by the employer's agent.²⁰ were as follows: (5) The engineer (i. e., the chief engineer of the defendants) may, at any time before the completion of the work, order extra work done, or make any changes he may deem expedient therein, and may furnish other plans, either by way of supplement, or in substitution of the plans referred to, etc. (6) The contractor shall, at his own expense, furnish all the labor, materials, and tools necessary for the said work, prosecute the same in a skilful and efficient manner and under the control and supervision of the engineer, to whose direction he shall at all times conform; afford every facility for inspection and testing by the engineer of the work as done, and being done, and of the materials provided therefor; re-execute any work that, in the opinion of the engineer, is not in accordance with the plans and specifications, removing materials objected to by the engineer, and replacing same with other material to his satisfaction; and in all respects follow and observe the instructions of the engineer, whose authority shall be paramount in and about the construction of the said work. (7) The engineer shall be sole judge of work and material in respect of both quantity and quality, and his decision on all questions in dispute with regard to work or material shall be final. (8) The contractor shall keep a competent foreman on the ground, during all working hours, to receive orders of the engineer, such foreman to be engaged and retained only with approval of the engineer. Held, that the contract did not operate so as to render M. & M. the servants of the company, and consequently that the plaintiff could not maintain an action against it for the injury sustained by him. Commenting on the provisions of clause 6, which were considered the most important, the court said: "This plainly intends to give the engineer complete authority over the construction, but does not extend that authority to the manner of procuring the material and bringing it to the place where it is to be used. The clear intention is to give the engineer full supervision and authority over the actual construction, and to make his decision final in respect of the quality of the material and the proper performance of the work. The engineer has no control over the contractor as to where or how the latter procures the material. An engineer of the defendant, who appears to have superintended the work in question, states that the contractors selected the quarries from which the rock was to be taken, and that these were satisfactory to him. He also states that the rock was taken from the defendants' property with the defendants' permission. There was nothing, however, to prevent the contractors from obtaining the material in any other place, as long as it was suitable for the work. There is nothing to show that the defendants exercised any supervision or control over the manner in which the quarries were worked, or over the means taken for bringing the material upon the work." From the following passage in the judgment, however, it would appear that the conclusion of the court would have been different if the accident had occurred while the plaintiff was engaged in the actual work of filling the bay: "Here the injury complained of was not caused by anything done, or any negligence that occurred, during the actual construction of the work, over which construction the engineer was given such wide power of supervision and control. The accident took place while the contractor was procuring and taking out material for use on the work, an operation over which the engineer had no such power."

That the work shall be done "as described in the specifications, and agreeably to the direction, from

²⁰ Pack v. New York (1853) 8 N. Y. 222. The court said: "This clause . . . is nothing more than a stipulation for a change of the specifications of the work as stated in the contract, at fixed prices provided therein. It does not, as the court below held, make Riley [a subcontractor] the immediate servant of the defendants, or give to them any control over him as to the manner, or otherwise, in which he should conduct the blasting. The defendants may change the grade by new specifications from that provided in the contract, and the duty is then imposed upon Foster to make his grade accordingly; but as to the manner in which he shall proceed in his blasting to make the grade, or do the time to time," of the employer's agent.³⁰

That the employer's engineers shall have full power to decide as to the manner of conducting and executing the work in every particular, and that the contractor shall follow the instructions or orders of any person designated by the employer.³¹

That any orders or directions given by the agent delegated to superintend the work on behalf of the contractor, or by his duly appointed representative, "shall be immediately and strictly obeyed by the contractor or any overseer in charge of the work."³²

That "the entire work shall be done in full accordance with the directions and instructions" of the employer's agent.³³

That the person employed shall "obey and follow every direction to be given by the employer's engineer, and in all respects carry out his requirements."³⁴

That the person employed shall "follow at all times, without delay, all orders and instructions of the employer's engineer in the prosecution and completion of the work."³⁵ work, he is as perfectly independent of the defendants as a man ever was while engaged in doing his own work."

³⁰ Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461. The court said that when the whole contract (see § 22, note 1 (a) of the monograph appended to Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq.), was considered, it was quite clear that "the directions of the engineer or his assistants," thus referred to, were those only which were specially named in the specifications.

³¹ Smith v. Ulen (1914; Alberta Sup. Ct.) 28 West. L. R. 136, 6 West. Week. Rep. 678, 17 D. L. R. 400 (per Beck, J., sitting alone).

³² Engler v. Seattle (1905) 40 Wash. 72, 82 Pac. 136, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 49. The second provision, unsuccessfully relied upon as being incompatible with the independence of the contract, was: "Whenever the contractor is not present on the work, orders will be given to the superintendent or overseer who may have immediate

That "all explanations and directions necessary to the carrying out and completing satisfactorily the different descriptions of work contemplated and provided for under the contract will be given by the employer's engineer."³⁶

That whenever the contractor is not present at the work, and at such time instructions become necessary, the designated agent of the contractee "may give the necessary orders to the superintendent" in charge of the work.³⁷

That the agents of the employer "shall have full power to decide as to the manner of conducting and executing the work in every particular, and the contractor shall follow the instructions or orders" of any person designated by the employer.³⁸

§ 7. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered to give directions with regard to particular matters.

The following provisions of this tenor have been held not to affect the independence of a contract:

That certain specified things shall be done "according to instructions," and "as may be desired," and "as may be required."¹ charge thereof, and shall by them be received and strictly obeyed."

³³ Hopper v. S. S. Ordway & Sons (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839.

³⁴ Carpenter v. New York (1906) 115 App. Div. 552, 101 N. Y. Supp. 402.

³⁵ Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

³⁶ Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115.

³⁷ McGrath v. St. Louis & H. Constr. Co. (1908) 215 Mo. 191, 114 S. W. 611; Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16; Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863; Engler v. Seattle (1905) 40 Wash. 72, 82 Pac. 136, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 49.

³⁸ Smith v. Ulen (1914; Alberta Sup. Ct.) 28 West. L. R. 133, 6 West. Week. Rep. 678, 17 D. L. R. 400.

¹ Roper v. Hussey-Freke [1915; Ct. of App.] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 222, [1915] W. N. 261, 31 Times L. R. 507, 84 L. J.

That certain portions of the work shall be performed in accordance with the "directions" of a designated agent of the employer.³

K. B. N. S. 1351, 113 L. T. N. S. 635, 59 Sol. Jo. 596, 8 B. W. C. C. 604.

³In Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132, the specifications provided, inter alia, that the girders of the bridge in question should be spaced as required by local circumstances and "directed" by the engineer of the defendant railroad company.

In Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411, a contract for the construction of a sewer contained the following provisions: That, "if the material was unsuitable for forming the bottom, a further depth was to be excavated, as directed by the superintendent or inspector in charge;" that only such length of trench was to be opened at once "as directed by the inspector;" that all sewers or drains were to be connected with the work "as directed by the superintendent or inspector;" and that the work should be performed so as to permit the passage of street cars, "unless by special direction of the superintendent."

In Callahan v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. (1867) 23 Iowa, 562, where a contract for the grading of a railroad provided that certain perishable materials on the right of way should be removed "as the engineer might direct," an action for damages caused to plaintiff's property by fire which spread from piles of wood, etc., which the defendant's engineer had ordered a contractor to burn on its right of way, was held not to be maintainable. The court said: "The clearing of the ground was the work to be done,—the end to be attained,—and could be done in one of two modes, at the option of the defendant. In the exercise of that option, burning was chosen as the mode of accomplishing the end. But with the manner of burning defendant had nothing to do, and over it exercised no control. It could not direct that the combustible materials should be gathered in large or small heaps, or on one side of the roadway or the other, or that the act of burning should be prudently and carefully done, and proper precautions of watchfulness be exercised in order to prevent danger to the property of others—all relating to the manner of doing the work required by the contract to be done."

In Vosbeck v. Kellogg (1899) 78 Minn. 176, 80 N. W. 957, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 86, the contract between a telephone company and one K. provided that K. should furnish "all necessary labor, skill, material, apparatus, supplies, and machinery" to construct and complete the line, that the "telephones and switchboard were to be installed, located, and placed as and where directed" by the telephone company, and that the work should be under the supervision of the company and its agent. Held that K. was an independent contractor; at least, in respect to stringing the wires on the poles.

In Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16, the following specifications were included in a sewer contract held to be independent: That certain tests for the purpose of determining the quality of the cement should be complied with, "except on such portions of the work as the city engineer might otherwise direct," and that it should be prepared in a certain manner, "unless otherwise ordered by the city engineer;" that the surplus earth excavated for the sewer should be removed to such distance "as may be designated by the engineer;" that the contractor should not blast any rock without taking such precautions as would prevent damage to person or property; and that the house connections of the sewers should be worked into the casing "in such manner as the engineer might direct."

In Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115, it was provided in a sewer contract held to be independent that the city engineer was to "have the right to regulate the excavation," and that "not more than 400 feet of trench" were to be opened at one time, without his permission.

In Gay v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. (1909) 148 N. C. 336, 62 S. E. 436, it was assumed that a provision in a contract by which a firm employed to cut timber agreed to load it on railroad cars "in a proper manner, the logs being secured to stand transportation by the railroad, and the loading to be done according to directions as given" by the railroad company, did not negative the inference deducible from the other provisions that the

That a designated portion of the work is to be done according to the plans, and "in accordance with the directions," of the employer's engineer, and another portion "under the immediate supervision and direction" of such engineer.²

That the person employed shall "conform to the directions" of the employer's agent as "to the order of time in which different parts of the work shall be done."⁴

That all work shall be "commenced and carried on at such times, and in such places, and in such manner, as the employer's engineer shall direct."⁵

That the whole of the work "shall be commenced and carried on when and where the employer's agent shall direct."⁶

That the work shall be "prosecuted at and from as many different points on the line of the work as the employer's agent may, from time to time, during the progress of the work, determine."⁷

That the contractor shall "carry on and prosecute the work in such manner, at such time, and at such places or points, as the chief engineer of the employer shall direct," and shall "complete any portion of the work that may be required" by the employer's engineer.⁸

The employer's engineer shall have the right to give directions as to the quantity of work to be done.⁹

firm were independent contractors. The same position was taken with regard to a provision that the firm should "cut the timber in proper and workmanlike manner, and as close as the [employer] may direct, and to cut all and every suitable tree into logs before leaving any one location."

In Hopper v. S. S. Ordway & Sons (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839, the specifications provided that "mortar should be composed of two parts clean sharp sand, and one part of Rosendale cement, of such brand as the engineer may approve, and mixed in such manner as he may direct."

In Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849, it was provided that the rock to be quarried should be taken from the places "directed."

See also Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461 where the contract contained a large number of provisions reserving to the defendant's engineer a right of direction as regarded various matters. In discussing paragraph (5) of the contract, the court said: "The power of the engineer to direct, under this clause, is limited to cases where waste earth from an excavation is thrown out over the top slope of the excavation, into spoil banks, and as to the manner in which such spoil banks shall be made to slope backward from the excavation. Conceding that the railway company would be liable for an injury from the mode and manner in which such spoil banks might be constructed, under the direction, or without the direction, of the engineer, it is not claimed that the plaintiff was so injured. In wasting the earth, which resulted in plaintiff's injury, the contractors were acting on their own responsibility, without any control, or right of control, on the part of the engineer, as to the mode or manner of doing the work."

² Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32.

⁴ McGrath v. St. Louis & H. Constr. Co. (1908) 215 Mo. 191, 114 S. W. 611.

⁵ Erie v. Caulkins (1877) 85 Pa. 247, 27 Am. Rep. 642.

⁶ Foster v. Chicago (1902) 197 Ill. 264, 64 N. E. 322, affirming (1901) 96 Ill. App. 4.

⁷ Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32.

⁸ Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472. The court took the position that, when construed in connection with all the other provisions of the contract, this stipulation must be understood as not being intended to give any control to the company over the individual employees of the contractor, or any control over the details of the work to be done by the contractor, or the means, mechanical or otherwise, by which the work was to be accomplished.

⁹ The fact that a subcontract for the laying of a railroad track contains a provision to the effect that the track is to be laid as far as it shall be ordered by the chief engineer of the general contractor does not render the general contractor liable for the negligence of the subcontractor. Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. (1890) 88

That the contractor shall follow the "directions" of the employer with respect to the number of men employed, the work they should do, and the rate of wages to be paid.¹⁰

That the work "shall be prosecuted with such force as the employer's engineer may deem adequate for its completion within the time specified."¹¹

That the "amount of force employed by the contractors is at all times subject to regulation, and must be increased or diminished as required by the engineer."¹²

That the contractor shall increase the force "whenever required by the employer's engineer."¹³

That the employer's chief engineer may, on giving notice in writing, suspend operations, or reduce the working force from time to time, at any particular point or points, or upon the whole work.¹⁴

That the engineer of the employer

"shall have power to direct the application of the forces to any portion of the work which, in his judgment, requires it, and to order the increase or diminution of the forces at any point he may indicate."¹⁵

That the work shall be executed "at such places and in such order of precedence as the engineer of the employer shall direct."¹⁶

That the work was "to be proceeded in or suspended on any portion, when required by the employer's engineer."¹⁷

That the work of handling the materials to which the contract has relation shall be performed at the place specified by the employer.¹⁸

That the employer's agent shall "prescribe the order in which the materials shall be placed."¹⁹

That certain materials shall be delivered or deposited at the places designated.²⁰

That the contractor "shall com-

Tenn. 692, 17 Am. St. Rep. 925, 13 S. W. 691.

¹⁰ Kirby v. Lackawanna Steel Co. (1905) 109 App. Div. 334, 95 N. Y. Supp. 833.

¹¹ Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461.

¹² Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542.

That a stipulation by which a contractor undertaking to sink a shaft was required to maintain three shifts of workmen continuously did not destroy the independence of the contractor was held in Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740.

¹³ Rogers v. Florence R. Co. (1889) 31 S. C. 378, 9 S. E. 1059.

¹⁴ Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472.

¹⁵ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542. See also Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439, where a similar provision was involved.

¹⁶ Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

¹⁷ Wray v. Evans (1876) 80 Pa. 102.

¹⁸ Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342 (person employed by railroad company was to unload wood and sand at the points designated by it).

¹⁹ Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

²⁰ In O'Hara v. Laclede Gaslight Co. (1912) 244 Mo. 395, 148 S. W. 884 (reversing (1908) 131 Mo. App. 428, 110 S. W. 642, for error in instruction) where the plaintiff's minor child was killed by a gas pipe which certain boys had set rolling from a pile deposited by the Uffman Company, a contractor to which the defendant had left the work of delivering pipes at the places where they were to be laid, the contract as to the delivery contained the following clause: "The party of the first part hereby agrees to haul such quantities of cast iron from cars to streets or lots designated by the party of the second part, or from storage lots to streets, and to distribute such pipes along the streets as required by the second party." The court, in denying the right of action, said: "We can see no reason why the doctrine of independent contractor should not apply to this case. The defendant had to designate the streets upon which pipes were 'required' by the contract. Whether such pipes were to be placed on the north side of the street, or the south side of a particular street, the contract is silent. That was a matter mence work at such points as the employer's engineer may direct, and shall conform to his directions as to the order of time in which the different parts of the work shall be done, as well as to all his other instructions as to the mode of doing the same."³¹

That the work shall be conformed to the lines given by the employer's engineer.³²

That the contractor shall be guided in the work by the lines staked, and the instructions given to him by the engineer of the employer contractor.³³

That the employee shall have the power to "modify, alter, or vary the works, or any part thereof, and also to alter or vary the description of the materials to be used from time to time."³⁴ left solely to the Uffman Company. Whether they should be blocked to prevent them from rolling was a matter relating to the unloading of the pipes in the street, and was under the control of the Uffman Company."

³¹ Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 316, 145 S. W. 16; Ege v. Phoenix Brick & Constr. Co. (1906) 118 Mo. App. 630, 94 S. W. 999.

For a case in which stipulations requiring the contractor to commence work at such places as may be directed were involved, see Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863.

³² Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017; Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888; Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411; Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461; Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383; Murphy v. Ottawa (1887) 13 Ont. Rep. 334.

³³ Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

In Winniford v. MacLeod (1913) 68 Or. 301, 136 Pac. 28, the contract, after providing that the first party should furnish, on application of the second party, such additional information as might be required for the guidance and information of the second party in the conduct of the work,

That the designated agents of the employer shall have the power "to vary, extend, or diminish the quantity of work during its progress, without vitiating the contract."³⁵

That the employer shall have the right, at any time during the progress of the work, to "make any alterations, deviations, or omissions from the contract."³⁶

That the employer's agent shall have the power to "change, at his discretion, the amounts of all the various kinds of work, and materials, and structures."³⁷

That the employer shall have the right to order alterations or additions to the work as specified in the contract.³⁸

Reference may also be made in this connection, to a case in which it was continued: "And the second parties agree to make all cuts and fills in accordance with such staking, and in each and every instance to dress the streets and slopes to the true line and surface without back filling. . . . But, whether in excavation or in embankment, they shall in all cases conform to the staking of the first party, and to any request which the first party may from time to time, during the progress of the work, make of the second parties."

³⁴ Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council [1896; C. A.] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 335, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196.

³⁵ Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115.

³⁶ Frassi v. McDonald (1898) 122 Cal. 402, 55 Pac. 139, 772.

³⁷ Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115.

³⁸ Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Secrist (1915) 118 Ark. 561, 177 S. W. 37; Green v. Soule (1904) 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 8; Buckingham v. Commary-Peterson Co. (1918) 39 Cal. App. 154, 178 Pac. 318; Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppeley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 66, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220; Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508; Bain v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. (1909) 223 Pa. 96, 27 Atl. 279; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902 ("engineer shall

held that, if the provisions of a contract between the owner and the driver of a cab are otherwise such as to show that the relationship created between them is that of bailor and bailee, the conclusion thus indicated will not be repelled by other provisions which merely limit the fares to be charged, fix boundaries, prescribe the uniforms to be worn, require cleanly and sober habits, and deal with other incidental matters.²⁹

§ 8. Other stipulations importing a reservation of a certain degree of control over the work.

Stipulations which, although they import a reservation of a certain degree of control over the performance of the work, have been treated as being not inconsistent with the conclusion that the contractor was independent are the following:

That if the contractor neglects to do the work, or furnish the material therefor, in accordance with the agreement, the employer shall be at liberty to provide such labor or materials, and to proceed with the completion of the work.¹

That if the work is not "satisfactory" to "the employer's" agent, he may employ men at the expense of the contractor to make the necessary change."² have the right to make any alteration that may be hereafter determined upon by him as necessary or desirable, in the location, line, grade, plan, form, or dimensions of the work, either before or after the commencement of the same"); Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495; Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408 (mining company reserved, in contract for construction of tunnel, the right "at any time, either before or during the construction of the work, or any portion thereof, to order any additional work to be done, and to make any changes in the work contracted for, or in its location or position, either in line or grade, which it may deem expedient, or which the engineer of the company may direct"); Romanink v. Grand Trunk P. R. Co. (1914; Ct. of App.) 24 Manitoba L. R. 797, 18 Can. Ry. Cas. 170, 29 West. L. R. 766, 7 West. Week. Rep. 399, 20 D. L. R. 301.

In Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16, the contract, which was one for the construction of sewers, contained both a general clause of the tenor stated in the text, and also a special provision to the effect that the manholes and catch basins might be changed as regards location, or might be omitted altogether, "if deemed best by the city engineer."

Compare also Giaconi v. Astoria (1911) 60 Or. 12, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 113 Pac. 855, 118 Pac. 180, where the resolution of a municipal council with regard to the grading of the street in question provided that "any matter of construction and drainage found necessary to make the improvement safe or substantial shall be done by the contractor, whether specified or not, without extra charge." There, however, the effect of the provision was not considered with reference to the question whether the contract was one of an independent character.

The doctrine entertained in Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894, with regard to the effect of a provision of this type, is apparently different from that reflected by the above cases.

²⁹ McColligan v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1905) 214 Pa. 229, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 544, 112 Am. St. Rep. 739, 63 Atl. 792, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 471, the court said: "The conditions and regulations—incidents of the contract of letting, in some instances, it is true—are consistent with the relation of master and servant, but not inconsistent with that of bailor and bailee. If the company, in order to protect its property and give the traveling public modern conveniences and suitable accommodations, has deemed it advisable to embody in the contract of letting certain reasonable regulations, no legal or business reason can be properly assigned why the real relation of the parties should be changed thereby."

¹ Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508. The contract under review in Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383, contained a similar provision, but the precise terms are not stated. See also Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495.

² Washington Natural Gas Co. v.

That, if the contractor "fails to prosecute the work with due diligence," the employer may finish the same and charge it to the contractor."³

That if the contractor "shall refuse or neglect to prosecute the work with a sufficient force," the employer's engineer "may employ such a number of workmen, laborers, and overseers," as may, in his opinion, be necessary to insure the completion of the work within the time specified.⁴

That additional workmen may be employed by the contractee's engineer, and the amount of their wages charged to the contractors, whenever the contractor is not prosecuting the work with the force which, in the opinion of such agent, is necessary for its completion within the time specified.⁵

That, in the event of the contractor's failing to provide a sufficient number of skilled workmen, the employer shall have the right to employ such labor, and charge to the contractor all damages occasioned by the default.⁶

That, if the contractor shall at any time neglect or refuse to provide a sufficiency of materials and workmen to execute the work properly, the employer may himself furnish such materials and workmen, proceed with the execution of the work, and charge to the contractor the expenses thus incurred.⁷

That the employer shall be at liberty to provide the necessary labor and materials, if a sufficiency thereof is not supplied by the contractor, after he has been notified by a designated agent of the employee to do so.⁸

That the work may be suspended under certain specified circumstances.⁹

That the contractor shall "comply with the ordinances of the city" with which the contract is made.¹⁰

Wilkinson (1885) 1 Sadler (Pa.) 637, 2 Atl. 338.

³ Ibid.

⁴ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902. For other cases in which similar provisions were contained in the contracts under review, see Raxworthy v. Heisen (1915) 191 Ill. App. 457, 8 N. C. C. A. 819, affirmed (1916) 274 Ill. 398, 113 N. E. 699; Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461; Wray v. Evans (1876) 80 Pa. 102; Washington Natural Gas Co. v. Wilkinson (1885) 1 Sadler (Pa.) 637, 2 Atl. 338.

⁵ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902. See also Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439 (contractor might be required, on pain of suffering a forfeiture of the contract, to increase the force and equipment to the necessary extent); Hopper v. S. S. Ordway & Sons (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839.

⁶ Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1918) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477.

⁷ Pioneer Fireproof Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17; Wray v. Evans (1876) 80 Pa. 102; Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461; Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am.

Neg. Rep. 383; Rogers v. Florence R. Co. (1889) 31 S. C. 378, 9 S. E. 1059.

⁸ Ewing v. Litzmann (1916) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 188 S. W. 742.

⁹ Prest-O-Lite Co. v. Skeel (1914) 182 Ind. 593, 106 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 474, 7 N. C. C. A. 724 (employer's inspector empowered to arrest progress of work, if he found it was not conforming to the standard prescribed in the work); Julius Keller Constr. Co. v. Herkless (1915) 59 Ind. App. 472, 109 N. E. 797 (work was to be suspended in winter, if such suspension should be required by weather conditions); Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16 (clause as to suspension during freezing weather was supplemented by a statement that the engineer of the contractee "should have the right to direct that the work should be continued under such conditions as he should prescribe," and by a provision that, during the suspension of the work from any cause, the same should be suitably covered and the trenches filled, "if the engineer so directed").

¹⁰ Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32; Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411; Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16; Uppington v. New

That the employee shall have the right to make a certain use of what is produced by the work, while it is in course of performance.¹¹

The significance of other stipulations is discussed in §§ 27–31, infra.

§ 9. Typical contracts relating to various descriptions of work.

For the purpose of enabling the York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115 (contractors were required to observe all the ordinances of the common council in relation to obstructing the streets, and "in all cases of rock blasting the blast" was "to be carefully covered with heavy timber, according to the ordinances of the common council" relating to the subject, "which ordinances shall be strictly observed"); Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863 ("ordinances, in so far as they may affect his employees or the disposition or transportation of the materials").

See, however, Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894, where a different construction was placed on a stipulation of this character.

In Ware v. Dominion Exp. Co. (1908; Montreal Ct. of Rev.) 13 Rev. L. N. S. (Quebec) 358, reversing 14 Rev. L. N. S. 398, where a child was injured through falling into an excavation made for a building, the construction contract provided that "all the work, labor, and materials were to be rendered, furnished, and performed according, subject, and conformably to the plans of the architects, or, in their absence, to the direction of whomsoever they might appoint; that the contractor should "observe and conform to all the laws, ordinances, and regulations of the city of Montreal and province of Quebec relating to the use and obstruction of streets, . . . protection of the public from danger, and all other matters whatsoever." Lynch, J., took the position that the wording of the contract "certainly relieved the proprietor from all liability for any damages which the contractor might occasion. The architect had complete direction of the building operations, but he was concerned merely with the results of the work, and not with the means by which those results were obtained. In my opinion, the defend-reader to examine some typical contracts of a detailed and comprehensive character, which embrace stipulations of the various descriptions tabulated in the preceding sections, it will be advisable to cite the cases in which the contents of such contracts have been particularized by the courts.¹

ant exercised no control whatever over the work." With this view Pagnuelo, J., agreed, remarking that the French decisions were not binding upon the court.

¹¹ Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408, where, in a contract relating to the construction of a mining tunnel, the company reserved the right, "at any time during the prosecution of the work," to run drifts, etc., and to conduct and carry on such other mining operations through and from the said tunnel as it might desire," provided that they did not interfere with the reasonable prosecution of the work by the contractors.

1 (a) Work performed for railroad companies.

(The cross-references are to the sections of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168, et seq.)

Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. — (see § 22, note 1 (a)); Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472 (see § 22, note 1 (a)); Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461 (see § 22, note 1 (a)); Rogers v. Florence R. Co. (1889) 31 S. C. 378, 9 S. E. 1059 (see § 22, note 1 (a)); Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902 (see § 22, note 1 (a)).

(b) Work with respect to buildings.

Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1919) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477 (see § 22, note 1 (b)).

(c) Construction of sewers.

Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32 (see § 22, note 1 (e)); Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411 (see § 22, note 1 (e)); Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115 (see § 22, note 1 (e)).

(d) Laying gas pipes.

Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council

III. Stipulations construed as investing the employer with powers of control which extend to the details of the work.

§ 10. In general.

In the following sections will be found a statement of the effect of various stipulations which have been construed as reserving to the employer that full control over the work which places him, with relation to the person employed, in the position of a master.

A comparison of the cases cited in this and the preceding subtitle discloses a fundamental divergence of views with respect to the significance of identical and virtually identical stipulations. This conflict of opinion is, doubtless, a natural consequence of the fact that the phraseology of several of the stipulations discussed in both subtitles, is on its face, susceptible of two diverse interpretations—one importing a control which extends to details, and the other a control which has relation merely to the results of the work. But the actual state of the authorities which has resulted from the inconsistencies produced by this cause is extremely unsatisfactory, and, in view of the fact that all the stipulations with regard to which there is so much disagreement are found in written contracts, furnishes a singular, and by no means edifying, commentary upon the doctrine that the construction of such contracts is assigned to the courts for the purpose of securing uniformity in the decisions.

In a case where a person employed to superintend construction work had inserted in certain subcontracts for the supply of materials, clauses to the effect that the deliveries should meet his approval, it was unsuccessfully contended that the inclusion of such provisions showed that his interest in the subcontracts was that of an independent contractor.¹

§ 11. Stipulations requiring the contractor to satisfy a certain standard.

The following provisions have been construed as being inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor:

That the contractor shall execute all the works mentioned in the specifications and certain plans, according to such explanatory drawings and instructions as may be furnished to him by the employer's surveyor.¹

That the work shall be performed "in a manner satisfactory to" the employer.²

That the work shall "be carried on [1896] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 335, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196 (see § 18, note 1 (dd)).

(e) Work with respect to timber.

Gay v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. (1908) 148 N. C. 336, 62 S. E. 436 (see § 22, note 1 (j)).

(f) Operation of quarries.

Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849 (see § 34, note 1 (e)).

¹Manton v. H. L. Stevens & Co. (1915) 170 Iowa, 495, 153 N. W. 87, the court said: "It was appropriate and consistent to make such provision for the benefit of the Martins. The very purpose of their employment of Stevens & Company as architects and engineers and superintendents was that they might have the benefit of their experience, knowledge, and judgment. It was entirely consistent, therefore, that the contracts in their behalf should meet the approval of Stevens & Company as a condition precedent to acceptance."

¹Penny v. Wimbledon Urban Dist. Council [1898] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 212, 67 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 754, 78 L. T. N. S. 748.

²In Stroka v. Halliday (1916) 39 R. I. 119, 97 Atl. 965, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 961, the members of a municipal committee managing a 4th of July celebration, which included a display of fireworks, were sued for an injury occasioned to a boy through the explosion of an unexploded bomb which he had picked up, after the celebration, on land adjacent to the place where the fireworks were exhibited. Under its contract the fireworks manufacturing company agreed "to furnish the fireworks . . . in accordance with the program, . . . and in a manner satisfactory to said 4th of July com-

under the supervision, and according to the direction of the (mine) manager, or his duly authorized agent, and to his satisfaction as to the manner of doing said work, and as to the limit and extent thereof."^{2a} mittee." Having expressed the opinion that it was to be inferred, from the "whole wording of the contract, that it was the intention of the parties thereto that all the firing should be done by the members of the company, or its employees," the court thus commented upon the second of the conditions imposed upon the contractor: "This clause, then, applies to everything to be done—not only to the quality and extent of the exhibit, but also to the manner of doing the firing; and it seems to us to be unwarranted to say that, under this language, the committee or any member thereof did not have full authority to control the 'manner' of doing anything which had to be done. If it had been observed in any portion of this display, during the day or evening, that the bombs or other fireworks were being discharged in such a manner as to be dangerous to property or to persons, or so as to show that the man engaged in the work of firing was incompetent, reckless, or negligent, it would have been not only the right, but the duty, of the committee or any member thereof, or of the subcommittee or any member thereof, to have stopped the firing, and either to have forbidden the continuance of the display entirely, or to have insisted that the incompetent, reckless, or negligent person in charge should be removed, and that a man or men competent for the work should be substituted. We are of the opinion that, by the terms of the contract itself, the 'manner' of doing the work was subject at all times to the full control of the defendants, who authorized the contract, and who were personally responsible, as we have shown, and that the fireworks company was not an 'independent contractor' in the sense used in the books. The mere fact that the fireworks company was permitted by the committee to conduct this display through a member of the firm, with such assistance as he found necessary, and entirely without interference by the committee or any member thereof, was entirely immaterial."

That "the amount due is to be paid when the entire work is completed to the satisfaction of the employer's engineer."³

That "all material furnished and work done, not in accordance with the

In Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740, one of the clauses regarded as negating the independence of the contract was to the effect that the work was "to be done to the satisfaction" of the employer.

^{2a} Kelley v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 426, 113 Atl. 419, decided with special reference to the Pennsylvania Act of June 2, 1891, P. L. 176, and the amending Act of June 1, 1915, the latter of which provides that the owner "shall have supervision, direction, and control of the mine foreman." In the contract under review there was a general clause to the effect that, "except as herein specifically provided, all matters pertaining to the works . . . shall be under the sole supervision and control of the mine foreman, . . . and the contractor and all his employees shall be subject to the order and directions of said mine foreman pertaining to all matters under the control of said foreman as provided by existing laws." Discussing the effect of this clause with relation to the particular provisions of the contract, the court said: "It will thus be seen that the contract specifically provides for the control of the means of performance by the mine foreman, that the manner of doing the work shall be to the satisfaction of the manager, that the defendant shall have the right to suspend or terminate the work without notice to the contractor, with the right to remove from the work any workmen who, in the opinion of its manager, are incompetent, careless, or for any other reason unsatisfactory, and that the interpretation of the contract . . . shall be by the manager, whose decision shall be conclusive. It is, therefore, manifest that, through the manager and mine foreman, full control over the means and manner of performance was reserved to defendant, and there was left in the contractor no independence whatever in manner and means of performance."

³ GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662.

specifications," shall be removed by the contractor, at his own expense, within a certain number of hours after notice from the designated agent of the contractee.⁴

That the sanction of the employer to the closing of all proposed sales of the employer's properties should be obtained by the person employed to make such sales.⁵

Some of the stipulations referred to in the next section may also be assigned to the same category as those above tabulated.

⁴ Thillman v. Baltimore (1909) 111 Md. 131, 73 Atl. 722. In this case, where the defendant was held liable for damage caused by water deflected into the plaintiff's cellar by reason of negligence with respect to the work of repaving an alley, the conclusion that the tort-feasor was not an independent contractor seems to have been mainly based upon the reservation of the right conferred by a provision of this tenor. But the court also relied upon the effect of certain provisions (not quoted) which gave the engineer of the contractee "more or less control over the work," particularly a specification which had a direct relation to the conditions which occasioned the injury complained of, viz., that "all soft and spongy material below the subgrade [of the alley to be repaved] be removed, and filled with some material satisfactory to the city engineer."

See also Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866, where a contract held not to be independent included a provision requiring the contractor to remove all condemned materials, etc., within a specified time after he received notice to do so.

⁵ Brown v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 174 Cal. 457, 163 Pac. 664. The court was of opinion that this stipulation "necessarily implied the power of designating and directing in advance the terms upon which each lot must be sold."

¹ Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866.

² Smith v. Seattle (1899) 20 Wash. 613, 56 Pac. 389 (defendant held liable for injury caused to his property

§ 12. Stipulations by which the employer is authorized in general terms to give directions concerning the work.

The following stipulations have been held to negative the independence of a contract in which they were inserted:

That the work shall "at all times be subject to the supervision" of the employer's engineer."¹

That the work shall be done "under the supervision" of the employer's agent.²

That the work shall be conducted "under the superintendence" of the employer's agent.³

by the removal of lateral support consequent upon the grading of a street); Flynn v. Philadelphia (1901) 199 Pa. 476, 49 Atl. 249 (in opinion of judge of first instance which was adopted by the supreme court).

From provisions of a contract which showed that the city retained a supervisory control over the work, and had power to dismiss any person employed by the contractors on the work, and that the dismissals of the board of public works, which represented the city, were final and conclusive in every case that might arise under the contract, the court drew the inference that there were "dependence" and "serviency" in the contractors. Chicago v. Joney (1871) 60 Ill. 383. The phraseology of the clauses as to supervision is not stated.

In Cunningham v. Penn Bridge Co. (1912) 131 La. 196, 59 So. 119, the court after referring to a passage in Thompson on Negligence, continued thus: "We will state that from the same commentator we gather: 'When the owner maintains control on a given particular of the work, the contractor is not an independent contractor.' The city certainly retained some control over the construction." As the provisions which were regarded as being indicative of a "retention of control" are not mentioned in the report, it is impossible to say under which of the paragraphs of this section the case should be placed.

³ Nisbitt v. Dixon (1852) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 973.

In Scott v. Springfield (1899) 81 Mo. App. 312, it was held that a contract containing the following provision was not independent: The word "engineer," as herein employed, shall

That the employer shall have the "direction and constant supervision" of the work.⁴

That the work shall be "under the superintendence" of the defendant's engineer, and "any orders or directions given by him shall be respected, and immediately and strictly obeyed by the contractor."⁵

That "except as herein specifically provided, all matters pertaining to the work shall be under the sole supervision and control of the mine foreman, and the contractor and all his employees shall be subject to the orders and directions of said mine foreman, pertaining to all matters under the control of said mine foreman as provided by existing laws."^{6a}

That the employer shall have the right to "direct the manner in which the work shall be carried out."⁶

That the contractor "shall carry on the work during suitable weather, as the employer's engineers shall direct."⁷

That the work shall be performed "under the direction" of the employer's agent.⁸

That the work shall be done "ac-

be construed to mean such person as shall be designated by the city council, whose duty it shall be to superintend the work in all its details, pass upon and reject such material as may not be in conformity with these specifications, designate when work shall begin, and how it shall be conducted, discharge incompetent or disobedient employees, and pass upon all questions as to the intent and meaning of these specifications. The engineer, subject to approval of the sewer committee, may appoint and place upon the work such inspectors as he may see fit, fully authorized to act for him in his absence.

⁴ Bechnel v. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. (1876) 28 La. Ann. 522.

⁵ Cooper v. Seattle (1897) 16 Wash. 462, 58 Am. St. Rep. 46, 47 Pac. 887.

^{6a} Kelley v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 426, 113 Atl. 419.

⁶ Beal v. Champion Fiber Co. (1910) 154 N. C. 147, 69 S. E. 834.

⁷ Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Gelruth (1911) 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253.

⁸ Williams v. National Cash Register Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112; Delmonico v. New York (1848; Super. Ct.) 1 Sandf. (N. Y.) 222; Harmon v. Ferguson Contracting Co. (1912) 159 N. C. 22, 74 S. E. 632; Schade Brewing Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 651, 140 Pac. 897.

In Burger v. Philadelphia (1900) 196 Pa. 41, 46 Atl. 262, the purport of a contract for the reconstruction of sewer inlets was thus summarized by the court: "The contract under which the work was done was a contract to furnish the material and labor for the reconstruction of sewer inlets in any part of the city of Philadelphia, during the year 1896, as required by the department of public works, and subject to its direction and approval. For a part of the work a fixed price was to be paid, as for stone, bricks, or iron inlets of different patterns, for iron gratings, man-holes, terra-cotta pipe, etc., but in most cases the work was to be paid for at a fixed price per foot or yard, as excavating, masonry, curving, paving, etc. No particular work was specified, and none might be ordered. When ordered, the work was to be done in the presence of an inspector, and the department reserved the right of absolute control and direction. There was no evidence that the department exercised any right except that of supervision, or that the contractor received any directions from anyone acting for the city." As there was evidence that the defendant's agents had accepted the work with notice of the defects which caused the plaintiff's injury, the court declined to consider whether, in view of the exceptional character of the contract, the city was relieved of liability for the negligence of its contractor, under the ruling in Painter v. Pittsburgh (1863) 46 Pa. 213, and the line of cases which followed it.

In Nashville v. Brown (1871) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 1, 24 Am. Rep. 289, the court seems to have considered that the fact of its having been provided, by a contract for certain street work, that it was to be done "under the direction of the city engineer, and to the satisfaction of the street committee," was an element which in itself showed that the relation created was that of master and servant. But the main ground of the decision was the rule which declares the keeping of a street in a safe condition to be a non-delegable duty.

cording to the directions of the supervising architect, whose decisions on all points shall be final.⁹

That the work shall be "done and finished agreeably to the directions and orders" of the employer's engineer.¹⁰

That the contractor shall be "subject at all times, during the progress of the work, to the direction" of the employer's engineers.¹¹

That "all directions and instructions given by the engineers, etc., of the employer, must be fully carried out" by the contractor.¹²

That the contractor must strictly follow without delay all orders and instructions from the chief engineer or his authorized assistants in the prosecution and completion of the work and every part thereof.^{12a}

That the employers "may submit to the contractor such orders, directions, and instructions as they wish for the proper carrying out of the contract, and the contractor shall obey the same."¹³

That the work shall be done under "direction" of the employer's designated agents, who "shall have entire control over the manner of doing, or shaping, all and every part of the work."¹⁴

That the work shall be carried on, "in its several parts and branches, in such manner, at such times, and at such places, as the employer may from time to time direct."¹⁵

⁹ Faren v. Sellers (1887) 39 La. Ann. 1011, 4 Am. St. Rep. 256, 3 So. 363 (workman injured). The court said: "The nature of the work was such that nothing else but the method of doing it required the supervision of the architect. . . . If the architect had directed or permitted Lynch to strip the building, as actually done by defendants, before removing the spans, Lynch would have been the servant of defendants quoad the adoption of this method, and they would have been responsible for any injury resulting therefrom. A fortiori are they responsible when they themselves adopt this method and do this part of the work themselves."

¹⁰ GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662.

¹¹ Carlton County Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Foley Bros. (1912) 117 Minn. 59, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 175, 134 N. W. 311.

¹² Ibid.

^{12a} Flynn v. Philadelphia (1901) 199 Pa. 476, 49 Atl. 249 (in opinion of judge of first instance which was adopted by the supreme court).

¹³ Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Geruth (1911) 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253.

¹⁴ Covington v. Geyler (1892) 93 Ky. 275, 19 S. W. 741 (plaintiff's house injured by removal of lateral support).

¹⁵ Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866 (servant of contractor injured while working on a building); Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Delaney (1900) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 55 S. W. 538.

In Morrissey v. Cincinnati (1911) 33 Ohio C. C. 541, affirmed in (1913) 87 Ohio St. 525, 102 N. E. 1121, which involved a similar provision, not containing the words "at such times," an action was held to be maintainable for damage caused to a building by explosions of dynamite used in excavating a trench for a sewer. The lower court (consisting of three circuit judges) said: "The excavation for the sewer was part of the work contracted for, and we think it clear that, under the provision just quoted, the city engineer or inspector had the right to control the manner of making the excavation, and to determine whether same should be by pick and shovel, blasting, steam shovel, or otherwise, such right to be exercised reasonably and with a proper regard for the welfare of persons and property likely to be affected, as well as for the advantage of the contractor in the adoption of such method or manner as would cheapen and facilitate the execution of the contract. It seems to us that the contract secures such right to the city without ambiguity. If any aids to construction were necessary, we think all the circumstances—the character of the ground, depth of excavation, power and duty of the city with reference to streets, contiguous buildings—all make such reservation on the part of the city appear reasonable and necessary." The court was of opinion that the clause in question was to be construed in the same sense as the one considered in Cincinnati v. Stone (1855) 5 Ohio St. 38.

That the contractor shall "conform in all respects to the directions and instructions" of the employer's engineers, relative to the work, and shall progress with the same at such time or times, in such manner, and at such particular points on the line of the work as the engineers shall direct."¹⁶

That the contractor shall be subject at all times during the progress of the work to the "direction" of the employer's agent as to the mode and manner of doing it, and shall prosecute the work in such manner and at such points as he may direct.¹⁷

That "all of the work, material, and apparatus shall be performed, done, located, and placed, at such place, and in such manner, as shall be designated or required" by the employer's engineer.¹⁸

That the employer's engineer "will designate the order of time in which the different parts of the work shall be done, as well as the mode of doing the same."¹⁹

That the instrumentality to be used for the work shall be "under the direction and supervision" of the employer, and do certain specified parts of the work "in the manner" to be indicated by him.²⁰

That the work shall be done "under the supervision and according to the direction" of the employer's engineer, and that he shall have power "to reject or condemn any work."²¹

That the work shall be done "in the manner" prescribed by the employer, and that his "orders shall be obeyed" by the contractor and the contractor's employees.²²

That the work shall be done "as ordered."²³

That the contractor shall be "under

In Denver v. Rhodes (1886) 9 Colo. 554, 13 Pac. 729, the retention by the defendant municipality of control over the work was held to be a necessary inference, where a power had been reserved to make alterations in the manner, extent, and plan of the work, as it progressed, and to relet the work in case the terms of the contract were not complied with, and, among other reservations of authority and control over the work, was the following: "The contractor shall commence the work at such points as the engineer and sewer committee may direct, and shall conform to their directions as to the order of time in which the different parts of the work shall be done, as well as to all the engineer's other instructions as to the mode of doing the same, including the length of street or alley that may be taken up in advance of the back filling."

¹⁶*Carlton County Farmers Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Foley Bros.* (1912) 117 Minn. 59, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 175, 134 N. W. 311.

¹⁷*North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co.* (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017.

¹⁸*Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co.* (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894.

¹⁹*Pressley v. Sallisaw* (1916) 54 Okla. 747, 154 Pac. 660.

²⁰*Perkins v. Blauth* (1912) 163 Cal. 782, 127 Pac. 50, where an action was held to be maintainable against the trustees of a reclamation district for damage sustained by the plaintiff's land, in consequence of the failure of a dredger company to protect his land from the waters of a river, after a levee had been cut for the purpose of enabling the dredger to pass through it and reach the place where the work for which it had been hired was to be done. Stress was laid upon the circumstance that the negligence complained of had relation to certain particular matters in respect of which the right of control had been reserved. But it is reasonably clear from the language of the court that this consideration was regarded as being merely corroborative of an inference deemed to be deducible from the general provision, which was applicable to the work as a whole.

²¹*Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. Van Dorn* (1885) 1 Ohio C. C. 292, 1 Ohio C. D. 160.

²²*Herrington v. Booth* (1916) 252 Pa. 70, 97 Atl. 178. As the precise tenor of the contract under review is not stated in the report, it is impossible to say whether this decision is really in conflict with Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508, which is seemingly inconsistent with it. See § 6, note 28, supra.

²³*Porter v. Withers Estate Co.* (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109.

the immediate order" of the employer's agent, and that the work shall be performed "to his entire satisfaction."²⁴

That "the work shall be prosecuted at such time and in such manner as the employer's engineer may direct."²⁵

That the work shall be done "under the direction" of the employer's engineer, who shall have "entire control over the manner of doing and shaping all or any part of the same," and whose directions are to be "strictly obeyed."²⁶

That the person "employed" is to perform the stipulated work according to the "instructions" of the employer.²⁷

²⁴ Stephens v. Thurso Police Comrs. (1876) 3 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 542.

²⁵ Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894.

²⁶ Cincinnati v. Stone (1855) 5 Ohio St. 38.

²⁷ A clause of this purport was treated as the controlling element in Linguist v. Hodges (1911) 248 Ill. 491, 94 N. E. 94, where Hodges employed B. and R. to superintend the masonry and the concrete and carpentry work for a factory building, and agreed to "lease from them all tools and equipment necessary for the completion of the work." Hodges was held liable for the negligence of a workman, whereby injury was inflicted on the plaintiff, another workman, but not a fellow servant of the tortfeasor.

The above case was followed in Fetzer v. Noel Constr. Co. (1912) 175 Ill. App. 401, where, in an action brought by a servant of an elevator company to recover for an injury by the negligence of a servant of the Armored Company, in allowing a plank to project into the shaft in which a car on which plaintiff stood was being operated, the contract between the Armored Company and the Noel Company, the general contractor for the construction of the building in which the accident occurred, was held to import that the Armored Company was to act as superintendent for the Noel Company. The only provisions specifically mentioned by the court were that the compensation

That the work is to be carried on "under the instructions" of the employer's foreman.²⁸

That the person employed shall be "governed by the printed instructions on the back of this contract."²⁹

That the work shall be done under the general supervision of the employer's agent, that such agent shall have authority to direct the order in which and the points at which it should be prosecuted, and that the contractor shall immediately comply with all the instructions given by the engineer.³⁰

That the work shall be done "according to the plans and directions of the employer's chief engineer."³¹

That the work shall be done "in accordance with the plans and speciwas to be 10 per cent "for the superintending of the work," and that there was also to be paid, as additional compensation, a certain percentage of the amount by which the cost of the labor, etc., should fall short of a certain amount.

In Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866, one of the clauses which were adverted to as destroying the independence of the contract was to the effect that all the work should be carried out strictly in accordance with the plans which would be furnished, and specifications and instructions which would be given from time to time by the architect, engineer, or inspectors of the contractee. On the principle, "noscitur a sociis," however, it would seem preferable, in this instance, to construe the word "instructions" as connoting merely supplementary directions of the same character as "specifications," and not directions concerning the details of the work.

²⁸ Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996.

²⁹ Gahagan v. Aermotor Co. (1897) 67 Minn. 252, 69 N. W. 914, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 92.

³⁰ McCarthy v. Clark (1911) 115 Md. 454, 81 Atl. 12 (pedestrian stumbled over a manhole frame left on a sidewalk by a servant of a firm engaged in constructing a sewer).

³¹ Veazie v. Penobscot R. Co. (1860) 49 Me. 119.

cations, and as directed" by the employer's agent.³³

That the work shall be done "under the direction and subject to the approval" of the employer.³³

That the work shall be done "under the directions, and to the satisfaction," of the designated agents of the employer.³⁴

That the work shall be done "according to the plans and specifica-

³³ DePalma v. Weinman (1909) 15 N. M. 68, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 423, 103 Pac. 782 (excavation on adjacent lot caused plaintiff's wall to collapse). The court quoted some of the language used in New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Hanning (1872) 15 Wall. (U. S.) 649, 21 L. ed. 220, and continued thus: "The contract in this case seems as broad in its terms. In superintending and directing there is no limitation upon the power of La Driere [architect], so long as he stayed within the plans and specifications. He could direct where every stone should be laid and every shovelful of dirt should be taken out. Grande [contractor] was, therefore, a servant of Barnett, who, though he was to receive a stipulated price for his work, executed it under the direction and superintendence of his employer." The decision rendered on the subsequent appeal of this case in (1911) 16 N. M. 302, 121 Pac. 38, was affirmed in (1914) 232 U. S. 571, 58 L. ed. 733, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 370, in which, although a merely cursory reference to the terms of the contract was made, the position of the lower court with regard to the effect of the clause quoted in the text was evidently approved.

³³ In Linnehan v. Rollins (1884) 137 Mass. 123, 50 Am. Rep. 287, the trial judge, on a charge to a jury which was held by the supreme court to be a correct statement of principles, thus commented on a contract which provided, in substance, that one Elston was to take down the entire building, or so much thereof as the employer might request: "This contract gives the defendants the right to control and direct the action of Elston. It is not simply a provision that the work must finally meet their approval before they pay him, but it is a provision that, in the first instance, he is to take down just so much of it as they desire, and that he is to do the work of taking down under their direction. There is no other mode of construing it than so as to mean that he, by this contract, was subject to their orders as to the time, and manner, and mode of doing this work; that they had the right to step in and say to him: 'You are not doing this as we directed you to do it. We direct you thus and so, and we direct you to do this in the other way.' That seems to me, as far as the contract is concerned, to bring the case within the relation of master and servant so far as Elston and the defendants are concerned."

³⁴ Parrott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1905) 127 Iowa, 419, 103 N. W. 352. The court argued thus: "No plans and specifications were attached to the contract, and nothing in it indicated the result to be attained, save that the earth was to be taken from the cuts and placed in the fill. To what elevation or line was the fill to be raised? To what depth or width were the excavations to be made along the right of way? The contract contains no answer to these inquiries, save in stipulating that the 'grading shall be done under the direction, and to the satisfaction, of the chief engineer of the company and his assistant.' The word 'grading,' as used, is not synonymous with 'filling,' for the contractor promised to furnish the work, tools, etc., to do 'all the grading required for filling.' The earth to be used is described as 'material for filling,' not grading, and the fill, when completed, is designated as an 'embankment,' not a grade. Manifestly, the word was not employed in the technical sense of bringing the surface at the bridge to a line or grade, but in the broader sense of including the excavating and filling contemplated by the agreement of the parties. See Ryan v. Dubuque (1900) 112 Iowa, 284, 83 N. W. 1073. Otherwise the company must be held to have authorized the contractor to excavate from its right of way in any manner or to any extent he might choose—a thing inconsistent with its duty to the public, and inconceivable in the protection of its own interests. As he was to do the grading (that is, excavate and fill) under the direction of defendant's agents, the engineer, Stoddart was not an independent con-tions, and under the direction, superintendence, and approval" of the designated agent of the employer.³⁵

That the work shall be done "under the control" of the employer's superintendent, and "to his satisfaction."³⁶

That the work "shall at every stage of its progress, from beginning to end, be subject to the direction, inspection, and acceptance of the engineer" of the employer.³⁷

That the work shall be done "under the direction and supervision" of the employer as to times, places, and quantities, and "according to his approval."³⁸

That the work is to be done as ordered by "the designated agent of the employer, and "to his satisfaction."³⁹ tractor, but the servant of the company, and it is liable for any damages occasioned by the removal of the soil from plaintiff's land."

Compare also Hill v. Caverly (1834) 7 N. H. 215, 26 Am. Dec. 735, where the liability of the owner of a saw-mill for damages caused to the plaintiff's land through the bursting of a defective dam, constructed by the "lessee" of the mill, was affirmed on the ground that such lessee, having agreed "to follow the directions of the lessor in everything relating to the stoppage or flowage of the water in the mill pond," was a mere servant.

³⁵ Harold v. Montreal (1867; Q. B.) 11 Lower Can. Jur. 169. The court also laid stress upon the fact that the contract embraced a provision authorizing the defendant corporation to set it aside after twenty-four hours' notice given. But the decision was evidently based upon the provision specified in the text.

In Pelletier, J., Groleau v. Quebec C. R. Co. (1895; Quebec Cir. Ct.) 1 Rev. de Jur. 54, it was laid down that a railway company which contracts for the construction of a line for a fixed price, but nominates its own engineer as an arbiter between itself and the contractors, for the purpose of determining the quantity and quality of the work performed, and of giving the certificate required by the contract as a condition precedent to the payment of sums of money on account of the total cost of the undertaking, and which obligates itself to furnish the right of way, exercises thereby such superintendence and control over the work as to render itself responsible to a third person for any injury inflicted by the undertakers. This ruling goes much further than the other Quebec case cited above. But it was made by a single judge of first instance, and its authority as a precedent is doubtful.

³⁶ Speed v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 303.

In Schwartz v. Gilmore (1867) 45 Ill. 455, 92 Am. Dec. 227, where the existence of a contract of service was held to have been properly inferred, the court thus commented upon the language of an instruction: "Here, although Daegling was erecting the walls under a contract, he was, by its terms, to carry forward the work under the control of the superintendent, and 'to remove all improper work or materials upon being directed so to do by the superintendent,' to whose judgment, both as to work and materials, he agreed to submit, and whose acts the owner agreed to recognize. The owner also reserved the right to change his plan, and the architect was declared to be the superintendent for the owner."

³⁷ Madisonville, H. & E. R. Co. v. Owen (1912) 147 Ky. 1, 143 S. W. 421, holding that the jury had been correctly instructed that a company which had taken the construction contract embracing this provision was a servant of the defendant railroad company, and that the latter company was liable for the damages resulting to the plaintiff from the obstruction of a stream by logs which the former company had thrown into it. The contention of the defendant that this provision reserved to the railroad company no more than the right to pass on the finished work was rejected.

³⁸ Wooton v. Dragon Consol. Min. Co. (1919) 54 Utah, 459, 181 Pac. 593.

³⁹ Gagnon v. Saraguay Electric Light & P. Co. (1909) Rap. Jud. Quebec 36 C. S. 227.

In Porter v. Withers Estate Co. (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109, where the court went no further than to hold that a provision obligating the contractor to perform all work of a certain kind, "as ordered by" the employer, should, when considered with reference to some of the other clauses of the contract, be construed as importing an exercise of full control.

§ 13. Stipulations by which the employer is empowered to give directions with regard to particular matters.

The independent character of the contract is clearly destroyed, pro tanto, by a provision which invests the employer with the right of control in respect of a certain portion of the stipulated work. In this point of view any torts of the contractor which are incidental to his performance of that portion are imputable to the employer, irrespective of whether the contract is one which would, so far as its other provisions are concerned, be classed as independent. Whether liability is predicable on this ground is obviously a matter to be determined from a consideration of the tenor of the provision in question, and the nature of the tort complained of.

Some of the particular provisions with reference to which the independence of contracts has been denied are the following:

That the contractor shall "observe all lines, grade stakes, reference points, and other location details."¹

That "all movements of the contractor's equipment over the employing railroad company's main and side tracks shall be under such rules and

¹ Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Gelruth (1911) 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253.

In Goldschmid v. New York (1897) 14 App. Div. 135, 43 N. Y. Supp. 447, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 508, where the defendant city was held to be liable for the injury caused by a retaining wall which a contractor for the grading of a street had built beyond the boundary line of the plaintiff's lot, and constructed of such poor materials that it bulged over his land, the facts which were held to show that the city had reserved the right to specify the place where the wall should be built, and the manner of its construction, were thus stated: "It was expressly provided in the contract that the retaining walls should be built where they were indicated on the plan, or where they were directed by the engineer to be built, and that the manner in which the walls should be built was to be determined by the engineer. It was further agreed in the contract that, during all the time while the work was in progress, the materials used in it should be subject to the examination of the commissioner of street improvement, and should be immediately removed if not satisfactory to him. It was proved upon the trial, by the evidence of the witnesses produced on the part of the city, that an inspector was present all the time the work was going on, and that he gave directions as to the stone that was put in the wall. It was also proved, and not disputed, that the place where the wall was located was designated by the engineer employed by the city, and that the trench was dug and the wall was built precisely in the place where the city's engineers directed it to be done."

In Stork v. Philadelphia (1901) 199 Pa. 462, 49 Atl. 236, the undisputed evidence showed that, in the prosecution of the work of constructing a subway on a street, it became necessary to tear down a house adjacent to that of plaintiff; that the city had reserved the right to determine when any underpinning or shoring up of foundations should be done by the contractors; that it had refused to authorize the shoring up of plaintiff's house, when the excavation was first made; and that this resulted in serious damage to the property. Held, that there was evidence on which the case must have gone to the jury, and consequently that, under the agreement of the parties as to the amount of the damages recoverable, if there was any evidence from which the jury could infer negligence, the trial judge had properly entered judgment for the plaintiff.

In Norris v. Philadelphia (1912) 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 641, the defendant entered into an agreement with a contractor for the laying of a water main. The execution of the work involved the cutting of a very large and deep trench in front of plaintiff's property, and the municipal officers located the line of that trench near the sidewalk on plaintiff's side of the street. During the progress of the work the earth excavated from the trench was all thrown upon the side thereof next plaintiff's property, and covered a large part of the lawn in front of her house, destroying her fence, the grass sod upon her lawn, her shrubbery and vines, and a number of trees. The contract contained the following clause: "All materials excavated shall be placed where directed by the chief of the bureau of water, and restrictions as the company's division superintendent may prescribe."²

That the employer's agent "may at any time change form of plan, grade

footways shall be kept clear for a width of 4 feet next to the house line, . . . unless special permission to the contrary be granted by the director of the department of public works." By other provisions the sale and removal of the material excavated from the pipe trenches, and the operation of refilling them, were placed under the control of the director of the department of public works. Counsel for the defendant argued that the contractor who did the work and placed the materials upon plaintiff's land had no right, under his contract, to do this, and that he and not the city should be held liable. But the court said: "With these provisions in the contract it is idle to assert that the city did not retain the absolute control, through its officers, of the disposition of the material taken from the trench, and the return of that material to the trench, for the purpose of refilling, after the water main had been laid. If the contractor had disregarded the instructions of the city officers, and, in violation of their instructions, deposited it upon the property of some individual, the city would not have been liable for injuries resulting from that unauthorized act; but the plaintiff produced evidence which would have warranted a finding that the contractor heaped the dirt upon plaintiff's sidewalks and lawn in accordance with the express direction of the chief of the bureau of water, and that all that was done was under the direction of the proper city officials. If this testimony was true, the contractor only did with the material what his contract with the city required him to do—deposited it in the place directed by the chief of the bureau of water; and the city was liable for any injury to property which resulted from the act."

In Quanah, A. & P. R. Co. v. Goodwin (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 177 S. W. 545, where the plaintiff's horse took fright at a pile of rails deposited in a street by a subcontractor, his right to hold the defendant, the principal contractor, liable for the resulting injury, was predicated on the ground that the defendant had reserved the right to select the place of or section, elevation or location of the work."³

That the work "shall be prosecuted with such force as the employer's en-deposit, and had received a promise from the contractor to deposit the rails at the point in question.

In Northern P. R. Co. v. Tillotson (1915) 84 Wash. 678, 147 Pac. 423, the defendant who had taken a subcontract for the construction of a part of a highway, was charged by a railroad company with having felled trees so negligently as to endanger its telegraph wires and the operation of its trains, and to damage its track, one of the specifications provided: "If any work or service be required to be done which, in the opinion of the engineer, does not come within the class of work to be measured under the contract, he shall be at liberty to direct the contractor to perform the same by day labor, and the contractor when required by him shall furnish such force and materials and perform such work in the manner directed.

. . . The engineer shall be at liberty to discharge any inefficient or unsuitable workman who shall be placed on such work, and the work so performed shall be subject to his approval before payment is made therefor." Held, that this provision, being applicable only to the extra work specified, did not destroy the independent character of the contract.

Where the contract for laying a line of pipes provided that they "were to be deposited in such continuous lines as might be pointed out, in such manner as not to interfere with the traffic, and to the satisfaction of the officer who might be present," and the plaintiff was injured by falling over a pipe which had been deposited by a carter in such a manner as to project over a crossing, one of the judges was of opinion that the public board which had made the contract for the distribution of this and other pipes along the highway had retained a discretionary power to indicate, by the direction of their officer, the places at which the pipes were to be deposited. O'Brien v. Board of Land & Works (1880) 6 Vict. L. Rep. (L.) 204, 2 Austr. L. T. 22.

² Callahan Constr. Co. v. Rayburn (1915) 110 Miss. 107, 69 So. 669.

³ Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Gelruth (1911) 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253.

gineer may deem adequate; if said party shall fail to prosecute the work with sufficient force in the opinion of said engineer, the latter, or such agent or agents as he may designate, may proceed to employ such number of workmen, laborers, and overseers as may be necessary to insure completion" at the time specified.⁴

The significance of other stipulations is discussed in §§ 27-31, infra.

§ 14. Typical contracts relating to various kinds of work.

For the purpose of enabling the reader to examine some typical contracts of a detailed and comprehensive character, which embrace stipulations of the various descriptions tabulated in the preceding sections, it will be advisable to cite the cases in which the contents of such contracts have been particularized by the courts.¹

IV. Oral evidence with respect to the extent of the power of control reserved to the employer.

§ 15. Evidence relating specifically to the nature of the contract as entered into.

Some of the decisions which turn upon the significance of evidence of this description illustrate the circumstances which are regarded as pointing to the conclusion that the employer's powers of control did not extend to the details of the work.¹

⁴GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662.

1 (a) Work performed for railroad companies.

(The cross-references are to the sections of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq.)

New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Han-ning (1872) 15 Wall. (U. S.) 649, 21 L. ed. 220 (see § 20, note 1 (a)); GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662; Foehr v. New York Short Line L. R. Co. (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 7 (see § 24, note 1 (a)); North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017 (see § 24, note 1 (a)); Schade Brewing Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1914) 79 Wash. 651, 140 Pac. 897 (see § 30, note 1 (a)).

(b) Work with respect to buildings.

Chicago v. Murdock (1904) 212 Ill. 9, 103 Am. St. Rep. 221, 72 N. E. 46, affirming 113 Ill. App. 656 (see § 24, note 1 (b)); Bissell v. Ford (1913) 176 Mich. 64, 141 N. W. 860 (see § 24, note 1 (b)); Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866 (see § 24, note 1 (b)); Beal v. Champion Fiber Co. (1910) 154 N. C. 147, 69 S. E. 834 (see § 24, note 1 (b)).

(c) Construction of highways.

East St. Louis v. Murphy (1900) 89 Ill. App. 22 (see § 24, note 1 (c)).

(d) Construction of sewer.

Hamill v. Territilli (1915) 195 Ill. App. 174 (see § 24, note 1 (d)); Pressley v. Sallisaw (1916) 54 Okla. 747, 154 Pac. 660 (see § 24, note 1 (d)); First Presby. Congregation v. Smith 20 A.L.R.—46.

(1894) 163 Pa. 561, 26 L.R.A. 564, 43 Am. St. Rep. 808, 30 Atl. 279 (see § 24, note 1 (d)).

(e) Construction of telephone system.

Larsen v. Home Telephone Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894 (see § 24, note 1 (e)).

(f) Scavenging work.

Stephens v. Thurso Police Comrs. (1876) 3 Sc. Sess. Cas. 4th series, 542 (see § 36, note 1 (k)).

¹In Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Secrist (1915) 118 Ark. 561, 177 S. W. 37, the evidence which was held to show that the plaintiff's immediate employer was an independent contractor, and that he was consequently not entitled to recover against the principal employer for an injury received in the course of his employment, was thus stated: "Allen testified that the appellant company had nothing to do with the work, except to see that the shed was constructed in accordance with the plans, and that the appellant company had nothing to do with employing or discharging the labor, and that it had no authority to give, and did not give, any orders or directions to any of the laborers in regard to the manner of performing their work, but that any suggestions or directions concerning the work, made by appellants, were given either to him or his foreman, and were given for the purpose of conforming the work to the plans. He testified that the lumber company furnished the plans and specifications to go by, and that certain changes were made by its superintendent in the

Under this head it will be advisable to refer specially to the rulings which have proceeded upon the theory that, where a contract for the transportation of goods is shown by the rest of the evidence to be independent, its quality is not altered by evidence to the effect that the employer is entitled plans, but such changes were indicated on the blue print; that on one occasion the superintendent made some changes in the material to be used, but no directions were ever given by any representative of the appellant company to the men about their work, but that he and his foreman at all times had sole authority and supervision over the appellee and all other laborers. It is shown, however, that appellant's general manager and superintendent were both about the work once or twice a day, and sometimes oftener; and Allen's foreman and one of the laborers both testified, on cross-examination, that it was their duty to do as they were told by appellant's superintendent, and that they were subject to his orders in the performance of their duties. But a consideration of all the evidence given by these witnesses makes it plain that they only intended to say that the superintendent had the right to prescribe plans for the building, and that it was their duty to execute these plans."

In Richards v. Consolidated Lighting Co. (1916) 90 Vt. 552, 99 Atl. 241, the plaintiff relied upon certain evidence of the following purport: The defendant's representative gave the plaintiff a plan of the coal conveyer in question, and told him to build it—in the plaintiff's own language: "We first looked at the plan, and then they (defendant's representatives) said, 'We will leave it to you to go and put it on.'" Held, that the contract was an independent one.

In Kettleman v. Atkins (1917) 229 Mass. 89, 118 N. E. 249, the right of the plaintiff to recover for an injury caused by a piece of molding which fell from a building, for the erection of which the defendant had contracted, turned upon the meaning to be ascribed to his own testimony, which is thus summarized in the opinion: As a witness called by the plaintiff, he testified upon direct examination that he "'sublet the carpentry, painting, and plastering.' He further testified, 'I had a contract to do all the work. I hired the carpenter and painter and looked after their work, and was daily on the job to see what the painter, or the carpenter, or anybody else, did about their work.' He then was asked by the plaintiff's counsel the following questions, and replied as follows: 'Q. And they worked under your direction? A. Yes, under the contract. Q. While you sublet it to different people, they all worked under your direction? A. Yes. Q. They had to do what you said? A. Yes. Q. And whoever did that work were all under your direction? A. Yes.' Upon cross-examination he testified 'that he sublet the carpenter work and the plastering work, and had contracted with the carpenter to do the carpenter work. And when he said that the carpenter did the work under his direction he meant he did it under the terms of his contract with him, and that he was there to see that the carpenter lived up to the terms of the contract with him, and to see the quality of the work. He did no carpenter work himself. His own work was masonwork, and the masonwork had all been finished at that time. So far as he was concerned, he was doing no work on his own account on that December 30. The work that was being done was being done under contract with various subcontractors, holding contracts under him.'" The contention of the plaintiff that the answers given by the defendant, in reply to direct questions put to him by the plaintiff's counsel, were evidence in the nature of an admission that the defendant was in charge of the carpenter work upon the building at the time the plaintiff was injured, was rejected, on the ground that these answers "were given in connection with the defendant's previous testimony that he had sublet the carpenter work and certain other work upon the building." The court then proceeded as follows: "The only fair inference from the testimony of the defendant to the effect that all the men who worked on the building so worked under his direction is that the subcontractors so worked as he had previously testified. It would be manifestly unfair, in considering this testimony, to deal with the defendant's answers, disregarding what he said with reference to having sublet the carpenter work. The only reasonable inference leads to the conclusion that, when he said that all the men who worked on the building so to give directions with regard to such matters as these:—the particular articles which are to be transported,² the places from which they are to be taken,³ or the places at which they are to be delivered.⁴

worked under his direction, he referred to the subcontractors, and not to the men in their employ. So construed, there is no evidence to warrant a finding that the piece of molding which struck the plaintiff was thrown or fell from the building by reason of the negligence of any workman for whom the defendant was legally responsible."

In Miller v. Moran Bros. Co. (1905) 39 Wash. 631, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 283, 109 Am. St. Rep. 917, 81 Pac. 1089, where the contract was held to be independent, evidence that the person employed was to have control and supervision of the workmen was mentioned as one of the elements on which the conclusion was based. But obviously this fact is indecisive, unless the control and supervision contemplated by the parties were exclusive.

In Reisman v. Public Service Corp. (1911; Err. & App.) 82 N. J. L. 464, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 922, 81 Atl. 838, the inference that persons who had undertaken to give an exhibition of fireworks were independent contractors was held to be proper, where the testimony showed that they were uncontrolled as regards the manner of performing the contract, except that the employer fixed the time when, and the place where, the fireworks were to be set off.

In Coolidge v. State (1908; Ct. Cl.) 61 Misc. 38, 114 N. Y. Supp. 553, the independence of the contract was predicated upon evidence to the effect that the contractor "had the supervision of his men and the direction and control of the work."

In Mayhew v. Sullivan Min. Co. (1884) 76 Me. 100, testimony that the plaintiff, "in his work, was to be under the direction" of the defendant's superintendent, was held not to rebut the conclusion deducible from the written contract of the parties, viz., that the person employed was not a servant.

In Muldry v. Fromherz (1917) 142 La. 1087, 78 So. 126, a finding of fact that the only right reserved was with regard to seeing that the work was done was construed as importing that the contract was an independent one.

In other cases the evidence was considered to be inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor.⁵

From evidence which merely shows that the employer made some sugges-

² See cases cited in § 17, note 10, infra.

Where a person entered into an absolute contract with a railway company to draw its cars, and furnished the horses and drivers, and assumed the entire control, it was held that the fact that the company could give directions as to which cars were to be hauled, the stations to which, and the time at which, they were to be hauled, did not disprove the independence of the contract. Schular v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 38 Barb. (N. Y.) 653.

³ Echert's Case (1919) 233 Mass. 577, 124 N. E. 421.

In Saunders v. Toronto (1899) 26 Ont. App. Rep. 265, reversing (1898) 29 Ont. Rep. 273, the evidence showed that a man whom the defendant city had employed, with his horse and cart, to remove street scrapings, was free from the control and direction of the city, except that he was directed where to load and where to unload. Held, that he was not a servant of the city, so as to render it liable for injuries negligently inflicted by him upon a third person, while he was taking a load to the dumping ground.

Where it has been shown, in an action against A for the negligence of B, that A was working under a contract to haul sand at so much a load from B's lot, a witness cannot be asked by whose orders A left off drawing sand from another lot of B, and whether B could have directed A to stop hauling from the lot in question. Such evidence has no tendency to show that the employer reserved control over the manner of doing the work. Fink v. Missouri Furnace Co. (1884) 82 Mo. 276, 52 Am. Rep. 376, reversing (1881) 10 Mo. App. 61.

⁴ See Schular v. Hudson River R. Co. (N. Y.) note 2, supra, and cases cited in § 17, note 9, infra.

⁵ In Employers' Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 74, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 850, 160 S. W. 914, the facts and the conclusion based upon them were thus stated by the court. "Appellee operated its mines chiefly through one McBrayer, its mine foreman, and through him entered into a tions regarding the manner in which the work was to be done, it cannot be inferred that the person employed was a servant.⁶

verbal contract with one Ramsey, whereby it was agreed that Ramsey was to get out coal from a certain part of appellee's mine, and deliver the coal to a sidetrack, and keep up a certain part of the entry, at the price of 70 cents per car. The part of the mine from which Ramsey was to take the coal included the entry and six or eight rooms, and he was to lay his own track, prop the rooms, and remove the slate, and the company was to furnish the cars and mules, and feed them; but the right was reserved to the mine foreman, upon behalf of the company, to see that the work was done according to the rules of the company, and to protect the property of the company, and the work was to be done so as to meet all legal requirements of the company. While Ramsey was to employ his own men and immediately supervise their work, it was all to be done under and within the rules of the company."

In Barrett v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866, the evidence held insufficient to show that one Barrett, a subcontractor for the brickwork of a building, was a servant of the defendant, is thus stated: The superintendent of the brickwork testified that it was his duty to oversee the work, including the cleaning and pointing of the walls; that if he saw that Barrett was doing a "streaky job," he would call his attention to it; that he had no authority to make him do it over; that that would be left to the architect, but it would have to be satisfactory before the work would be acceptable; and that if Barrett had replaced brick, or done other extra work of that nature, the superintendent would inspect it, and either accept it or report to the office.

In Simmons v. John L. Rope Lumber Co. (1917) 174 N. C. 220, 93 S. E. 736, the inference that a person employed for logging work was a servant was held to be warranted by his testimony that the employer's vice principal "told him where to work, and how to work, and where to put the logs, and so forth."

In Doharty v. Boyd [1909] S. C. 87, 46 Scot. L. R. 71, 2 B. W. C. C. 257, the employer testified that the claimant was under his orders as to where to work, and subject to dismissal. Held, that the claimant was not an independent contractor. But it is apprehended that all courts would not regard such evidence as negating the independence of a contract.

The same criticism is also applicable to Murphy v. Ottawa (1887) 13 Ont. Rep. 334, where evidence which showed that the duties of the defendant's inspector with regard to the work of laying a sewer pipe were, principally, to lay off the direction of the drain, paying particular attention to its depth and grade, taking the depth every fifth foot, and seeing that the pipe was properly cemented, was held to be inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor.

In Greene County v. Schertzer (1920) — Ind. App. —, 127 N. E. 843, the court took the position that testimony to the effect that the person employed "was his own boss" was to be construed with relation to the rest of the testimony, and that, when so construed, it did not necessarily prove that he was an independent contractor.

In Manton v. H. L. Stevens & Co. (1915) 170 Iowa, 495, 153 N. W. 87, the fact that the recommendations of the persons employed were followed in every case throughout the construction work which they were supervising, and that at no time did their employers overrule or change those recommendations, was also relied upon as showing that they had the actual control of the method of construction. But the court said: "The question at this point is not so much what the Martins [employers] did do in that regard, as what they had a right to do. It is undisputed that every item of cost, both for labor and material, was incurred under the eye of the Martins. . . . They were free to increase or reduce the cost; to follow the original plans, or to change them. Their right in this respect was not affected by the fact that no friction or difference of opinion arose between them and their architects in the prosecution of the work."

⁶ Norton v. Day Coal Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 905.

§ 16. Evidence as to the conduct or words of the parties during the progress of the work.

The absence of any testimony warranting the inference that the employer actually exercised control over the work while it was in progress has frequently been adverted to as an element which tended to prove that he had no right to exercise such control, and consequently that the person employed was an independent contractor.¹ Having regard to the circumstances under which work of most of the descriptions discussed in this treatise is ordinarily performed, it may be said that the omission of the party by whom the independence of the contract is denied to offer such testimony must usually be decisive.

Evidence which shows that the employer did, as a matter of fact, interfere with, or give directions concerning, certain particulars of the work, has a material bearing both upon the rights and liabilities of the parties to the contract and upon the enforceability of claims in respect of injuries caused by acts done in the course of the work. Such evidence is susceptible, according to circumstances, of being considered under two different aspects.

(1) It may be regarded as tending to establish the general conclusion that the employer's acts were done in pursuance of a right reserved by him at the time when the contract was made, or acquired by him with the consent of the contractor after the commencement of the stipulated work, and that he consequently occupied the position of a master with respect to the person employed.² In this point of view the evidence has sometimes been spoken of as being indicative of a "practical construction of the contract in the performance of the work."³ To negative the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor, it is not necessary that the directions actually given should have embraced every detail in the execution of the work.⁴

(2) It may be regarded as tending to establish the particular conclusion, appropriate only to cases in which the injury was a direct result of the employer's interference or orders, that he was a principal tort-feasor, and responsible as such, whatever may have been the nature of the contract as a whole.

The decisions cited in the present subtitle are those which, having regard to the facts involved, and the language used in the opinions, may with reasonable certainty be included in the category of those which illustrate the significance of the evidence in the former of these points of view. But in some instances the theory with reference to which they were rendered is more or less doubtful.

¹ See, for example:

Alabama. — Massey v. Oates (1905) 143 Ala. 248, 39 So. 142.

Arkansas. — St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley (1890) — Ark. —, 13 S. W. 333.

California. — Houghton v. Loma Prieta Lumber Co. (1908) 152 Cal. 574, 93 Pac. 377.

Illinois. — Galatia Coal Co. v. Harris (1904) 116 Ill. App. 70; Boyle v. Weber (1914) 189 Ill. App. 184, 9 N. C. C. A. 351.

New York. — Benedict v. Martin (1862) 36 Barb. 288.

Rhode Island. — Lake v. Bennett (1918) 41 R. I. 154, 103 Atl. 145.

Texas. — Simonton v. Perry (1901) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 62 S. W. 1090.

² By Georgia Civ. Code 1911, § 4415 (3819), it is provided that the employer is liable for the negligence of a contractor, "if he retains the right to control the time and manner of executing the work."

³ Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902, citing Powell v. Virginia Constr. Co. (1890) 88 Tenn. 692, 17 Am. St. Rep. 925, 13 S. W. 691, where similar language was used. See also Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342 (phrase used in opinion of trial judge, quoted by Supreme Court); De Perri v. Motor Haulage Co. (1918) 185 App. Div. 384, 173 N. Y. Supp. 189.

⁴ Sullivan v. Dunham (1898) 35 App. Div. 342, 54 N. Y. Supp. 962, affirmed in (1900) 161 N. Y. 290, 47 L.R.A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274, 55 N. E. 923, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 126.

So far as regards that class of cases in which the claimant is the injured servant of the person whom the defendant alleges to be an independent contractor, it is clear that, apart from the question whether he was entitled by the terms of the contract to exercise control over that person, his liability in respect of the injury may be predicated on the ground of the general principle that, "if an employer in fact assumes the relation of master to the servants of one whom he has engaged to produce a given result, the duties and responsibilities which the law imposes upon such a relation attach."⁵

It is manifest that, where the acts relied upon as evidence of the exercise of an actual control over the details of the work were done by an agent of the principal employer, liability cannot be imputed to the latter on account of these acts, unless it appears that the acts were within the scope of the agent's authority.⁶

In a case where the essence of the plaintiff's claim is simply that the person employed was not an independent contractor, and, in the alternative, that if he was such a contractor, the work which he was called upon to perform under his contract was inherently dangerous to others, so that the independence of the contract did not shield the employer from liability, an instruction embodying the general rule as to the nonliability of an employer for the negligence of an independent contractor is not open to exception on the ground of its failing to state the effect of the employer's interference in the methods of performing the stipulated work.⁷

It should be mentioned that evidence of the description considered in this and the following sections may be adduced, not for the purpose of showing the general character of the contract of employment, but for the purpose of proving that the principal employer had, as a result of his having assumed the immediate control and direction of a particular portion of the stipulated work, become the master ad hanc vicem of the servant or servants by whom it was performed.⁸

⁵ Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Loosley (1907) 76 Kan. 103, 90 Pac. 990.

⁶ In United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 105 C. C. A. 486, 182 Fed. 620, where the contract for the reconstruction of a building contained the provision that the work should be done "under the direction of the architects named, acting as counsel" for the principal employer, the court observed: "Had the architects undertaken to direct or control the work, they would have been outside the line of any duty they owed the gas company, and any such unauthorized acts would not make the architects its agents in that respect."

⁷ Alexander v. R. A. Sherman's Sons Co. (1912) 86 Conn. 292, 85 Atl. 514. The court said: "It was only necessary to give a charge adapted to the facts and claims in the case. To excuse the defendant from liability under the charge given, the jury must have found that under the contract between the defendant and O'Neil, which was by parol, the latter was employed to do, independently or without subordination to the defendant, the work in question, and that he was to have the selection and control of the workmen and other agencies employed, and to have control over the whole work, and be responsible to the defendant only for the result. If they found this to be the contract, it excluded the right of the defendant to control the work, and, under the authorities cited above, made O'Neil an independent contractor. In view of the claims made in the case, we think the charge upon this point was sufficient."

⁸ In McBride v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co. (1912) 173 Mich. 248, 138 N. W. 1077, the evidence was held insufficient to show that this situation existed.

Evidence that the defendant's representative hired other laborers on a gang besides its foreman, that he had previously discharged and taken back the whole gang, that he refused employment to some men, and that he directed men when to go on and stop work, will warrant a jury in finding that the defendant was the master of the foreman and the laborers on the gang. Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 102, 16 N. E. 690.

For a case in which the evidence re-

The actual exercise of control over the person employed has sometimes been regarded as evidence bearing upon the question whether the contract was made in good faith.⁹

§ 17. Same subject; independence of contract predicated.

Both on principle and authority it is clear that the existence of the relationship of master and servant between the employer and person employed is not established by evidence which merely shows that the former exercised over the latter a limited control, similar in kind and degree to that which is indicated by such oral evidence as that referred to in § 15, supra, or to that which is imported by those formal provisions which, as has been shown in §§ 4 et seq., supra, may be reserved in a written contract without affecting its independent character.¹

In some of the classes of cases in which the decisions were rendered with reference to this doctrine, the evidence was to the effect that the employer gave such directions as were appropriate for the purpose of insuring its performance in accordance with the terms of the contract.² The lied upon by a workman who had originally been hired by a subcontractor was held to be sufficient to warrant the inference that, at the time when he was injured, the contractor in chief had assumed control on the work, so as to render him the plaintiff's master, see Anderson v. Foley Bros. (1910) 110 Minn. 151, 124 N. W. 987.

⁹*Bokoshe Smokeless Coal Co. v. Morehead* (1912) 34 Okla. 424, 126 Pac. 1033. See § 49, infra.

¹In Clark v. Tall Timber Lumber Co. (1916) 140 La. Ann. 380, 73 So. 239, a portion of the evidence which was held to establish the independence of the contract was to the effect that the employer had nothing whatever to do with the manner in which the person employed performed the stipulated work of getting out ties, except to see that they were made according to specifications.

²In Curtis v. Plumptre (1913; C. A.) W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 195, 6 B. W. C. C. 87, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., is stated in one of the reports to have remarked: "A landowner who employs an independent contractor with a gang of men does not exercise control if he goes down to the work, and, seeing some man doing something which he considers injurious, tells him not to do it, or to do it in some other way. That does not amount to an order given by a master to his servant, but is a direction by the landowner to a man employed by the contractor." Considering that the remedial rights of the claimant depended, not upon the mere fact that the direction was given, but upon the character of the direction as an element bearing upon the extent of the controlling powers reserved by the employer, this language is, to say the least, lacking in precision—so much so that it seems questionable whether the words of the learned judge are correctly stated. According to the other report, the sort of instruction referred to was described by him as a "piece of advice." This is a still more unsatisfactory version, for it is difficult to believe that he could have used such a phrase to characterize a direction which the employer was entitled to give. If he had no right to give the direction, it manifestly had no juristic significance with respect to the nature of the relationship.

In Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342, the agent of the defendant railway company testified that the contractor was "directed by him what to do," was "under his supervision and control all the time," and "performed his duties in accordance with what the agent directed him to do." The witness also answered in the negative the question, "Did you have anything to do with directing him in detail as to how he performed the terms of his contract?" Held, that the lower court has erred in treating this evidence as proof that the employer had exercised over the work a degree of control which showed that he considered the contractor to be a servant.

In Cox v. Philadelphia (1908) 165 Fed. 559, it was held that no such control over the work of building a subway under a street as would render the defendant liable for the negligence of the builder was shown by evidence that the defendant city had an inspector on the ground, watching the progress of the work, and that he pointed out to the construction company from time to time what he considered to be unsafe places, whereupon the construction company gave the matter such attention as seemed to be needed.

cases cited under this head should be collated with those which involve the effect of written provisions re-

In United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 105 C. C. A. 486, 182 Fed. 620, one of the grounds upon which the liability of the defendant was denied was that "all of the acts which are cited to show such assumption [of control] are attributable to that supervision and inspection which the contract provided the architects should exercise to insure the work being done according to the terms stipulated."

In Johnson v. Helbing (1907) 6 Cal. App. 424, 92 Pac. 360, the evidence showed that the defendant was present at the building in question every day; that he watched the progress of all the work, and saw that it was done according to his plans and specifications and contract; but that he did not direct the company's workmen in their work, or interfere with them in any way.

In Bellamy v. F. A. Ames Co. (1910) 140 Ky. 98, 130 S. W. 980, where a servant of a contractor for the brick work of a building was injured by the collapse of a wall, the evidence showed that the president and the superintendent of the defendant company were frequently, almost daily, upon or about the building, watching its progress and the character of the work; but they testified that their presence and inspection were due to the fact that the company was having done by its own laborers certain parts of the work, which they were looking after in a general way, and that they were in no case interfering with or directing the work being done by the contractor. Held, that the owner's presence and acts detailed did not, under the circumstances, amount to such an assumption of control as to destroy the independence of the contract, and consequently that the defendant was not liable for the plaintiff's injury.

The fact that a superintendent of the employer "occasionally would visit the work, to ascertain whether the contractor was performing it according to specifications," was held in Carey v. Baxter (1909) 201 Mass. 522, serving the right of supervision. See § 4, supra.

In other cases the purport of the 87 N. E. 901, to be insufficient to destroy the independence of the contract.

In McBride v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co. (1912) 173 Mich. 248, 138 N. W. 1077, the defendant's superintending agent testified that the contractor himself "had the sole direction" of cutting the lumber in question, and of hauling, and placing it on the ground designated. In answer to the inquiry whether he had any work to do, or instructions from the company with respect to that work, he said: "Why, no more than to go and look around and see how they were getting along." Held, that the control thus exercised did not destroy the independence of the contract.

The fact that a landlord, when employing a plumber to make some repairs, informs him that a tenant on the premises will show him what to do, has no tendency to prove that the defendant reserves the right to direct how the work shall be done. Burns v. McDonald (1894) 57 Mo. App. 599.

In Denny v. Burlington (1911) 155 N. C. 33, 70 S. E. 1085, 3 N. C. C. A. 922, evidence held to be insufficient to show that the defendant, at any time during the progress of the work, assumed control thereof, or of any part of it, was thus reviewed: "There are to be found, to be sure, expressions from witnesses to the effect that Kueffner, the city engineer, was present now and then when the work was going on; but, when the evidence touching upon this feature of the case is justly and properly considered, it amounts to no more than proof that he was there, in the interest of the city and under instructions from it, for the purpose of seeing that the work was done according to the contract, and not to give any instructions as to how it should be done, or to supervise or control it. He made a suggestion, it is true, as to how some of it should be done, but it was not made while in the exercise of any power or control over those doing the work, and was merely the gratuitous expression of an opinion, which any outsider might have given, and it was entirely optional with Rodden, foreman of Russell & Harris, whether to adopt or accept this advice."

In Coates v. Chapman (1900) 195

evidence was that the employer gave, with regard to particular matters, directions similar in character to those which are the subject of the express stipulations discussed in §§ 6 and 7, supra. It has been held that the independence of the contract is not negatived by testimony tending to show these facts:

That the employer gave directions concerning the order in which certain portions of the work should be performed.³

That the employer gave the person employed directions with regard to the particular places at which the stipulated work was to be performed.⁴

Pa. 109, 45 Atl. 676, it was arranged by a person who had undertaken to build houses on his own property that some portions of the work should be performed by his own servants, and the remainder by contractors. He appointed a general superintendent of the whole work to see that the various contracts were complied with, but no control was exercised by such superintendent over the contractors and their work, except by calling their attention to the requirements of the contract. In an action brought by one of the owner's servants against one of the contractors, to recover for injuries caused by the negligence of a workman in the defendant's employ, it was held that the plaintiff was not a fellow servant of the tort-feasor.

In Polluck v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1917) 40 S. D. 186, 166 N. W. 641, the testimony unsuccessfully relied upon as being indicative of independence was that if the workmen of one who had contracted to keep coal chutes on a railroad filled "did not keep the coal shoveled, as he had agreed to do, the railroad company's agent would complain to him that it was not done."

For other cases which sustain the statement in the text, see:

United States. — Salliotte v. King Bridge Co. (1903) 65 L.R.A. 620, 58 C. A. 466, 122 Fed. 378, certiorari denied in (1903) 191 U. S. 569, 48 L. ed. 306, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 841; Morning v. Cramp & Co. (1909) 170 Fed. 364.

Alabama. — Hubbard v. Coffin (1914) 191 Ala. 494, 67 So. 697.

California. — Fay v. German General Benev. Soc. (1912) 163 Cal. 118, 124 Pac. 844.

Indiana. — Marion Show Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220.

Kentucky. — Pine Mountain R. Co. v. Finley (1909) — Ky. —, 117 S. W. 413; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith (1909) 134 Ky. 47, 119 S. W. 241.

Louisiana. — Clark v. Tall Timber

Lumber Co. (1916) 140 La. Ann. 380, 73 So. 239.

Massachusetts. — Davis v. John L. Whiting & Son Co. (1909) 201 Mass. 91, 18 A.L.R. 782, 87 N. E. 199.

Michigan. — Lenderink v. Rockford (1904) 135 Mich. 531, 98 N. W. 4.

New York. — Lubelsky v. Silverman (1905) 49 Misc. 133, 96 N. Y. Supp. 1056; Freund v. Composite Realty Co. (1917) 165 N. Y. Supp. 951.

Texas. — Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495.

In White v. Oliver Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107, evidence that the employer's superintendent had, once or twice during the progress of the work, made some objection to the manner in which it was being done, was held to be not inconsistent with the supposition that the person employed was an independent contractor. But this statement seems open to criticism if it is to be understood as importing that such a fact has no tendency whatever to prove that the person employed was a servant. That it possesses some relevancy in that regard would seem to be quite clear.

³*STORM v. THOMPSON* (reported herewith) ante, 658.

⁴In The Satilla (1916) 148 C. C. A. 552, 235 Fed. 58, affirming (1915) 221 Fed. 949, the president of the stevedoring company for whose negligence, resulting in injury to one of its servants, it was sought to hold the ship in question responsible, testified that the superintendent of the shipowner gave him orders when he wanted the cargo; how quickly he wanted the ship discharged or loaded; when the ship had got to go; if he wanted the company to work nights or days; and where he wanted the cargo. The contention that, under the circumstances thus stated, the stevedoring company was a servant, was rejected. The remarks of the lower court with respect to this part of the evidence were as follows:

"It does not alter the case to say that those in control of the ship pointed out in a general way the work to be done by the contractors. The direction given by the ship people was merely to indicate the work to be done and where the load was to be stored. In no other sense did they control the contractors, for neither the contractors, nor the men who tied the rails together, nor the winchmen, were subject to the general orders of the agents of the ship."

In See v. Leidecker (1913) 152 Ky. 724, 154 S. W. 10, the owner of a wagon and team, who contracted for a specified sum to transport a boiler from a railroad station, the exact place of delivery to be designated by contractee, was held to be an independent contractor, although, at the time when the boiler was being unloaded, he followed directions given by the employer with the view of securing that it should be deposited at a particular place and set in a particular way. That the ruling of the court in this regard was entirely correct cannot be disputed, for it was in accord with the authorities as a whole; if there was no more in the case than this, no exception could be taken to the decision. But the report states that for the purpose of holding the boiler, or as a means for pulling it off the wagon, Leidecker directed See to put a chain round the boiler, and for the purpose of connecting it he told See "to pass the chain under the boiler and hand it up on the other side." It seems clear that, in this state of the evidence, the only possible conclusion is that Leidecker was directing See "how to do" this portion of the work, or, in other words, controlling the means by which it was performed. If so, the relationship of master and servant was created ad hanc vicem, and for the injury in suit, which was caused by the boiler's toppling over onto See while he was carrying the chain under it, Leidecker might properly have been held answerable, if the evidence was such as to warrant the inference that he had failed to fulfil a master's obligation with regard to the maintenance of a safe place of work. As this aspect of the case was not brought to the attention of the court, the decision was, to say the least, unsatisfactory, as ignoring a ground upon which See's right of recovery might possibly have been predicated.

In Vogemann v. American Dock & Trust Co. (1909) 131 App. Div. 216, 115 N. Y. Supp. 741, affirmed in (1910) 198 N. Y. 586, 92 N. E. 1105, the owners of certain goods, which were thrown into the water owing to the collapse of the defendant's pier while the steamship of which the plaintiffs were charterers was being discharged by stevedores, recovered judgments against the plaintiffs. In an action brought to recover the amount of those judgments, together with the reasonable expenses incurred in the litigation, the plaintiffs alleged that the damage was caused, in part, by the negligence of the stevedores in improperly loading the cargo upon the pier. The evidence which was held to have warranted the jury in finding that these stevedores were independent contractors, and upon which, in the opinion of the court, the trial judge might well have ruled that this was their relationship to the defendants, was to the effect that they were regularly employed by the plaintiffs for unloading cargoes and were paid a regular contract price by the ton, with extra charge for tiering above the ordinary height, and that the work was done by their own men, under the supervision of a foreman employed by them. Under such circumstances, the mere fact that the plaintiffs' tally clerk was present to keep track of the work, or that he gave directions where to put the cargo, or for extra tiering, did not change the case. The plaintiffs were concerned only with the result, not with the means or methods employed by the stevedores to attain it.

In Giaconi v. Astoria (1911) 60 Or. 12, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1150, 113 Pac. 855, 118 Pac. 180, the court laid stress upon the absence of any evidence showing that any direction was given by defendant's officers or agents respecting the performance of the work, except that the contractor was required to place a box flume in the fill to be constructed—a duty imposed upon him by a resolution of the city council—whenever necessity demanded a drain.

In Southwestern Teleg. & Teleph. Co. v. Paris (1905) 39 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 87 S. W. 724, where the agent in charge of a building occupied by a telephone company indicated the particular rooms in which the work of one who had undertaken to paper the

That the employer's engineer gave the levels necessary for the execution of grading work.^{4a}

That the employer gave certain entire building should be carried on at certain times, it was observed that these directions were for the purpose of preventing, as far as practicable, an interference with the operation of the telephones. Commenting upon the testimony of the person employed that the work "was not done as he would have done it, had he been left to himself," the court said: "Whether this applies to the method and manner of putting on the paper and paint, or to the moving around from room to room at the suggestion of McDuffie, is not shown. If he intended it should apply to the method and manner of putting on the paper and paint, then he failed to specify or detail wherein McDuffie was superintending."

In Texas Traction Co. v. George (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 149 S. W. 438, where the plaintiff's decedent was killed while assisting in the work of installing a transformer and of making the framework connections, in a traction company's substation, the court refused to ascribe any weight to the fact that the officers of the company directed where the transformer should be located in the building, and that the framework to be constructed and installed by the contractor should conform in size and color to the framework belonging to the company, which had been already erected in the substation.

In Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408, the court assumed that the independence of a contract for the construction of a tunnel was not destroyed by the fact that the employer's engineer furnished the course and grade of the tunnel, designated the places requiring timbering, and the places where the track and pipe were to be laid, and, at places, required the widening of the tunnel and the performance of extra work to support the roof of the tunnel with reinforced concrete.

In Lawton v. Morgan, Flidner & Boyce (1913) 66 Or. 292, 131 Pac. 314, 134 Pac. 1037, evidence which showed that a contractor's foreman directed a subcontractor concerning the places where piles should be driven, and indicated where it was necessary to instructions with regard to the dimensions of a portion of a structure.⁵

That the employer specified the places at which certain materials were to be placed.⁶

place one pile on top of another, in order to force them to the depths necessary to insure an adequate support for the foundation to be laid upon them, was held not to disprove the independent status of the subcontractor.

In Farmer v. St. Croix Power Co. (1903) 117 Wis. 76, 98 Am. St. Rep. 914, 93 N. W. 830, the court observed: "Obviously the mere fact that employees of a person having a distinct portion of contract work to do take directions to some extent, as the work proceeds, from the principal contractor, does not change the status of their employer from that of a subcontractor to that of an employee of the principal contractor. The circumstances in regard to who directed the teamsters where to unload material from their wagons has nothing to do with the question of whether their employer was an employee or a subcontractor. That must be determined by the nature of his contract itself."

^{4a} In Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383, one Stark, who had undertaken to grade the defendant's railroad, testified that all the authority possessed by the defendant's engineer was to put in the grade stakes and say to him. "These are your grade stakes." Held, that the witness meant by this answer that the work to be supervised by the engineer was the manner of its completion, not the manner of its execution. This view as to import of the evidence was corroborated by the testimony of the defendant's chief engineer that the company did not reserve any right or power to control the performance—only that Stark "was to grade the track and lay the rails, subject to his approval in every respect."

⁵ Connolly v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 405, 160 Pac. 239; Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Secrist (1915) 118 Ark. 561, 177 S. W. 37 (length specified for posts which had to be adapted to the level of the top of a foundation wall built by employer for the house erected by the contractor).

⁶ In Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919)

That the employer superintended the adjustment or arrangement of portions of a structure.⁷

That the employer gave orders that stronger materials should be used for a certain portion of a structure.⁸

That the employer specified the 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740, it was held that the existence of the relation of master and servant was not shown by evidence to the effect that after men employed to perform mining work had been for some time dumping the waste rock and material in a circular form around the collar of the shaft on which they were working, the employer's superintendent instructed them to dump it at another place.

⁷In Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132, the evidence introduced by plaintiff tended to show that defendant's engineer, J., was present nearly every day during the erection of the bridge in question; that upon one occasion, when it had been set up so that one end was lower than the other, J. told the workmen that they had better block it up, or the bridge would slide off; that upon other occasions he told them to keep the bridge square and to put the beams in; that he noticed the rivets to see if they were bolted up thoroughly; and that when the plaintiff was engaged in taking the ends off a couple of bolts, J. told him "not to take the nuts clear off, or the end of the crossbeam would drop down." Held, that there was nothing in what was said and done by J. that substantially supported the averment in the declaration that the plaintiff was the servant of the defendant.

In Klages v. Gillette-Herzog Mfg. Co. (1902) 86 Minn. 458, 90 N. W. 1116, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 488, one of the facts in evidence was that the employer had superintended the work of putting into place certain plates which formed part of the structural iron to which the contract had relation.

⁸*Wood v. Watertown* (1890) 58 Hun, 298, 11 N. Y. Supp. 864.

⁹*Bray v. Kirkpatrick* [1919; Ir. C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 151; Pace v. Appanoose County (1918) 184 Iowa, 498, 168 N. W. 916, 17 N. C. C. A. 682; Wadsworth Howland Co. v. Foster (1893) 50 Ill. App. 513, affirmed in (1897) 168 Ill. 514, 48 N. E. 163; Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; App.

destinations to which articles were to be conveyed by a person employed for transportation work.⁹

That the employer's foreman directed the person employed and his driver, with regard to the particular materials which were to be hauled under the contract in question.¹⁰

T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525; Powley v. Vivian & Co. (1915) 169 App. Div. 170, 154 N. Y. Supp. 426, 10 N. C. C. A. 835 (taking of sand and gravel).

The fact that the owner of a store points out the goods to be carted, and their destination, to a man in the employ of a cartage company which is under contract to do all the cartage of the former at a specified price, does not show that the owner of the store exercised control over the manner in which the goods were to be transferred to the trucks, or over the route by which they were to be taken to their destination. Riedel v. Moran, Fitzsimons Co. (1894) 103 Mich. 262, 61 N. W. 509.

In Moore v. Stainton (1903) 80 App. Div. 295, 80 N. Y. Supp. 244, affirmed on opinion below in (1904) 177 N. Y. 581, 69 N. E. 1127, where Stainton, a truckman, was held to be an independent contractor, a portion of the evidence consisted of the testimony of a member of the employing firm to the effect that Stainton had to do the stipulated work, "not only to our satisfaction, but according to our direction;" but he also stated: "We do not give any directions whatever to Mr. Stainton, except to hand him the written delivery order for the goods."

In Reer v. Babcock (1920) 230 N. Y. 106, 129 N. E. 224, reversing (1919) 187 App. Div. 925, 174 N. Y. Supp. 914, a portion of the evidence on which the court based its ruling that a truckman was not a servant was thus stated: "The practice was to deliver to a truckman a slip indicating the place of delivery after the coal had been weighed, but no directions were given as to the route to be traversed to make a delivery; neither did Babcock & Company have or exercise jurisdiction over them after they left the yard."

¹⁰*Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury* (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721; Flickenger v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1919) 181 Cal. 425, 19 A.L.R. 1150, 184 Pac. 851.

That the employer designated certain materials for use in a structure.¹¹

That the employer specified a particular portion of his property as being excepted from the operation of the contract.¹²

That the employer directed the person employed to give special attention to one particular portion of the work.¹³

That the employer or his agent gave directions concerning the materials to be used in an article which the person employed had undertaken to manufacture.¹⁴

That the employer's agent gave directions with regard to the time at which the work was to be performed.¹⁵

That the operation of construction trains used by a contractor for the purposes of his work was regulated to some extent by the railroad company.¹⁶

¹¹ In Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1918) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477, the court said that the marking of the stones to be set in a building was "simply an indication of the place where the cutting had to be done, in order that they might conform to the specifications and fit in the proper places."

¹² Scales v. First State Bank (1918) 88 Or. 490, 172 Pac. 499 (trees marked to be left on tract where timber was to be cut).

¹³ Litts v. Risley Lumber Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 321, 19 A.L.R. 1147, 120 N. E. 730 (painter directed to scrape off and paint well the rusty spots on a smokestack).

¹⁴ Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. (1904) 122 Iowa, 635, 98 N. W. 482 (filling of mattresses).

¹⁵ In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Madden (1908) 77 Kan. 80, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 788, 93 Pac. 586, where the plaintiff's property was injured by a fire which escaped from a railroad company's right of way, on which a man had contracted to burn a fire guard, the evidence which was relied upon for the purpose of affecting the railroad company with liability, and which was held insufficient, was that the fire escaped from the control of the contractor by reason of the high wind, and that but for the order and direction of the company's foreman, given two days previously, the fire would not have been set out on the day selected. The court reasoned thus: "It is not reasonable to presume that, when the foreman directed Gregory to begin the work on the following Monday, it was the intention thereby to deprive him of the use of all discretion in the matter, or that the order meant that he should begin the work on that day, regardless of wind and weather." The present writer ventures to express the opinion that the decision in this case was erroneous, as having been referred to an improper theory regarding the effect of the evidence. It is submitted that the questions which the evidence indicated to be controlling were: (1) Whether the order given by the foreman was one which the defendant was authorized to give by the specific terms of the contract as originally entered into; (2) whether, if the order was not so authorized, the contractor was warranted, on other grounds, in treating it as one which he was bound to obey; (3) whether the injury complained of was occasioned by acts done in compliance with the order. Supposing the first and third of these questions, or the second and third, to be answered in the affirmative, it seems clear that the injury would have been simply one which was occasioned by obedience to instructions which the contractor was obliged to follow, and that the precise nature of the relationship created by the contract would be an entirely immaterial element. In this point of view, the motion upon which the decision is largely based, viz., that the contractor had a discretion in respect of obeying the order, became, even if conceded to be correct, quite irrelevant. The only question, so far as a third person, like the plaintiff, was concerned, would be whether the fire which caused the damage was kindled in pursuance of instructions given by an agent of the company, within the scope of his powers.

¹⁶ In Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Loosley (1907) 76 Kan. 103, 90 Pac. 990, where it was sought to hold a railway company liable for an injury caused by the negligent operation of a construction train, a portion of the evidence was thus discussed: "It may be conceded that the superintendent of the railway company made statements which, if taken literally, might indicate that he had complete dominion over every movement of the construction company's trains and every detail of their work at Carmen, and the plaintiff had the right to go to the jury upon them. But a fair inference from his testimony as a whole is that the construction company's trains were under his jurisdiction, and subject to the time cards, rules, and regulations of the railroad company, merely to the extent necessary to prevent conflict and confusion from the joint use by the two companies of the same tracks and yards; that the railroad company was not doing the work of the construction company in any sense; that it was not, pro tanto, building its own road; that all the details in the prosecution of that work were left to the full discretion of the construction company; that the superintendent could not say when a train should take out material, or when it should return to the material yards, or prohibit it from going or returning, or say how it should be handled, or who should handle it, and so generally, respecting the manner and means of carrying out the construction company's contract; and the defendant had the right to go to the jury upon this theory. If the jury had taken this view, they might have found that the railway company had 'control' over the plaintiff's train in the sense that it was on a track turned over under the contract, that it was subject to the railway company's time cards, rules, and regulations, and that it was under the jurisdiction of the railway company's superintendent, and yet they rightfully might have returned a verdict for the defendant."

That the employer's foreman gave directions which amounted to specifying the size of the charge to be used in blasting.¹⁷

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Smith (1909) 134 Ky. 47, 119 S. W. 241, it was held that the independence of a contract for the construction of a railroad culvert was not negated by the fact that, while the work was in progress, the railroad company kept a man upon the ground whose function was to see that the track was kept safe for the passage of trains.

¹⁷*Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Newland* (1917) 176 Ky. 166, 195 S. W. 415. The court reasoned thus: "While it is true that plaintiff and his nephew say that plaintiff was subject to the directions of Applegate, who told him exactly how to do the work, yet, when

That a person employed to deliver newspapers was instructed not to exceed the legal limit of speed.¹⁸

(It should be pointed out that, in

asked to tell what these directions were, plaintiff said that Applegate told him 'to put in so many sticks of dynamite for the first spring, and so many for the second, and so many for the third, and so on,' and then 'to shoot them,' and his nephew said: 'He (Applegate) told us how many to put in, as I have stated before, and if he seen we wasn't doing it according to the way that he wanted it done, that he had the right and the authority to stop us.' . . . The purpose of the work was to change the physical condition of the fill, so as to prevent it from slipping. Hence the mere firing of the shots was not the object sought by the company, but the blasting of the holes with charges of dynamite sufficient to prove effective for the purpose intended. Every contract reserves to the employer the right to see that the contract is performed according to the specifications. . . . Here the directions with reference to the particular 'springs,' and the amount of dynamite to be used in each 'spring,' were mere specifications intended to accomplish a particular result, and the fact that the company reserved the right to end the contract if the work was not done according to the specifications does not tend to show that it reserved any control over plaintiff as to the manner of doing the work. The only control reserved was the right to demand that the plaintiff should fire only such blasts as were prepared in accordance with the directions which constituted a part of the contract. Upon this showing the court concludes that the evidence tending to show that plaintiff was a servant of the defendant was insufficient to take the case to the jury, and that the trial court should have held, as a matter of law, that he was an independent contractor." This decision deals with conditions which lie very close to the border line between "details" and "results," and, if correct,—a point which certainly seems to be arguable,—illustrates the extreme difficulty of differentiating, under some states of facts, between those categories.

¹⁸*Gall v. Detroit Journal Co.* (1916) 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 38.

some cases, the right of the claimant to recover on the ground of acts and words betokening the exercise of a limited measure of control has been denied, not with reference to their bearing upon the nature of the relationship between the employer and the contractor himself, but with reference to their bearing upon the nature of the relationship between the employer and the contractor's servants);¹⁹

¹⁹ In Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322, the plaintiff, a passenger on a street car, was injured as a result of its collision with a wagon driven by a man whose immediate employers were K. & D., a firm engaged in the stone business on their own account, and also in the business of teaming for others. At the time of the accident the wagon was conveying a load of bricks for the defendant brick company, with which the firm had made an oral contract to do a portion of the teaming on the terms that they were to be paid a certain price per load according to the distance it was hauled. Other circumstances adverted to by the court, as having a bearing upon the nature of the relationship created by the contract, were the following: The wagons and horses were kept at defendant's yards in sheds belonging to it, but they were maintained by K. & D., and were in charge of their employees. One H. was shipping clerk and yardman for the defendant at the yards from which the load in question was sent out. If K. & D. desired to use their horses and wagons in their own business, they communicated with H. to find out whether he could spare any of their teams, because, under the contract with the defendant, it was to have the preference in use of the teams to do its hauling before K. & D. could use them for others, or in their stone business. The drivers were employed and paid by K. & D. with their money, the evidence warranting the conclusion that, on the occasions when the money was handed to the men by H., and the money furnished by the defendant, this was done as a matter of accommodation for K. & D. It was deemed to have been established by a clear preponderance of the evidence that H. had no power to hire or discharge the teamsters; that he had no control over their actions further than to direct them when to haul brick, how

§ 18. Same subject; independence of contract negatived.

Facts which have been treated as inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor are the following:

(1) That the employer gave directions with regard to the manner in which various portions of the work were to be performed.¹ A comparison between the cases collected in the

they should load it, and where it should be delivered; and that he did not direct their teamsters as to the way they should go, or in any way as to how they should drive the teams. A verdict for the plaintiff was set aside and a new trial ordered.

In Jahn v. W. H. McKnight & Co. (1904) 117 Ky. 655, 78 S. W. 862, it was held that a driver regularly in the employ of a firm of truckmen engaged by the defendant to deliver packages, was not their servant, where they had no right to direct him, except to the extent of seeing that the packages were delivered to the proper addresses.

¹ In McNally v. Fitzgerald (1914) 48 Ir. L. T. 4, a claimant under the Workmen's Compensation Act was a plumber who had been called in to effect some repairs in a hotel, the materials for the job being supplied by the proprietor. Holmes, L. J., said: "I think, as a rule, when you send for a plumber to do work, he comes to do it as a contractor, because it is a business the ordinary man does not know much about, and it is left in the plumber's hands; he supplies all the materials necessary, and does the work on that basis, and he is usually paid for the whole work when finished. Here a man, having to a certain extent found out what was wrong, sent for a plumber carrying on business in a small country town; he gave directions to remove the obstruction, pointing out where it was located. He came back from time to time to see how the work was going on, and a servant of his held a candle for the plumber. In addition to this, there is positive evidence that the owner of the hotel was not an ordinary employer; he was a man anxious to give a great deal of assistance; a man who understood a great deal about the business; and that he was not only present, but gave directions which would not be given to an independent contractor." All the members of the court expressed doubts as to the correctness of the decision of the county court judge, awarding compensation, but were of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to support it.

In Sacchi v. Bayside Lumber Co. (1910) 13 Cal. App. 72, 108 Pac. 885, where plaintiff's land was inundated by the water of a river in which an obstruction was created by logging and quarrying operations, the contention that the persons performing the work were independent contractors was rejected on the ground that while they were, under their contracts, "to receive specific compensation . . . not in the nature of wages, each, nevertheless, prosecuted his work in conformity with the general directions of the defendant."

In Connell v. Harris (1913) 23 Cal. App. 537, 138 Pac. 949, where the plaintiff's automobile came into collision with the rear end of a wagon loaded with timber upon which no light was displayed, the evidence showed that the driver was a teamster, who had contracted with the defendant to haul the timber to another city for $6; that, as the wagon of the teamster himself was too small to carry the timbers, a larger one belonging to the defendant was used, and drawn by the teamster's horses; that the defendant showed the teamster the way to the yards where the timbers were, helped to load them, and rode with him for some distance, and personally procured a white light after nightfall, and assisted to place it on the wagon. Held, that the evidence indicated the retention by the defendant of a sufficient degree of control over the manner of performing the work to destroy the independence of the contract.

In Easton v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 Pac. 288, the fact that the driver of a baker's wagon was not directed by his employer as to where he should go, or as to whom he should sell bread, was held to have some tendency to show that he was not a servant.

In Aisenberg v. C. F. Adams Co. (1920) 95 Conn. 419, 111 Atl. 591, where a salesman was held to be an "employee" entitled to claim under a Workmen's Compensation Act, the circumstance that the employee "made the terms of all sales" was stated to be a "very important feature of control."

In Mumby v. Bowden (1889) 25 Fla.

455, 6 So. 453, where the goods of the tenants of a building were injured through the negligent manner in which an employee of the landlord had repaired a gutter over a party wall, the evidence relied upon as showing that the employee was under the control of the defendant, and therefore, in "legal contemplation," his servant, comprised the following facts: That the job was a light one; that the defendant had not surrendered the premises while the work was being done; that he had instructed the employee not to do the work when rain was threatened; and that he had ordered the employee to "go ahead" when the latter explained what he thought best to be done.

In St. Johns & H. R. Co. v. Shalley (1894) 33 Fla. 397, 14 So. 890 (fire negligently started damaged property of adjoining landowner), the court thus commented on the evidence which, in its opinion, negatived the contention of the defendant that the laborers whose carelessness produced the injury were independent contractors: "The proof shows that these graders were employed directly by the railroad company, and were paid by the company at the rate of so much per cubic yard of earth removed, and an agreed price for all stumps removed. The graders were common laborers, and the defendant company seems to have been carrying on the general work of constructing its road within itself, and not, as is often customary, through the instrumentality of an independent contractor for the various branches of its work. Its witness, C. R. Knight, who was its engineer, as he says, 'in charge' of the extension of the road to Palatka, undertakes in his evidence to represent these graders as being independent contractors; but he testified that their work was staked out for them by the engineer in sections, and the 'yardage' computed, and that then a 'foreman' let out the sections to those who applied for the grading of them; and that the next duty of the foreman was to accept or reject the work upon its completion, and, in case of doubt as to whether the work was well done, he called on the engineer for the levels necessary to determine the doubt as to whether the grader had 'properly and faithfully, and in accordance with his contract, done his work.' He testified further that the foreman had the right to take the work away from them when, for any cause, they neglected to perform it within a reasonable time, and to relet any uncompleted portion, paying pro rata for the part performed; and that whenever the foreman's attention was called to any specific violation of the 'contract,' he had the right to annul the contract or to compel the grader to do the work as he had contracted to do it; and that the foreman pointed out to the grader the 'amount and nature' of the work, directing him as to the width and height of the embankment, and where the earth was to be taken from, etc., etc. In other words, what this witness termed the 'stipulations of the contract' with the graders were evidently nothing more than directions from the foreman and engineer to the graders as to the mode and manner of doing their work, and if it was not done in accordance with those directions, the grader was forced to comply with them, or else be dismissed without pay for the uncompleted or imperfect work. Under these circumstances we think these graders, instead of being independent contractors in the sense that would relieve the employer company from responsibility for their negligence, are sunk to the level of ordinary laboring servants to the company, which was their master, and that the company was properly held to be liable for the damage resulting from their negligence in the performance of the work they were put by the company to perform for its use and benefit."

In International Agri. Corp. v. Suber (1919) 24 Ga. App. 445, 101 S. E. 300, where the plaintiff's minor son was injured as a result of the breaking of a rope which supported a scaffold used by the immediate employer of the injured person for the purpose of performing a contract made for the painting of the defendant's building, a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained on the ground that the defendant's vice principal not only interfered with the manner in which the independent contractor and his employees were painting the building—prohibiting them from hanging the hooks on the roof of the building—but went further, and directed where and how the hooks should be hung, and furnished them with a rope with which to hang the scaffold as directed by him. The right of action was affirmed with reference both to common-law principles and to the Civil Code 1910, § 4415, subsec. 5, 20 A.L.R.—47.

which provides that the employer is liable for the negligence of the contractor, if he "interferes and assumes control so as to create the relation of master and servant, or so that an injury results which is traceable to his interference."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tow (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 408, 66 L.R.A. 941, 63 S. W. 27, where the plaintiff, while seeking employment, was injured by a blast set off without warning by the workmen of a contractor engaged to construct a railroad tunnel, a verdict negating the independence of the contract, and finding the railroad company liable, was held to be warranted by evidence to the effect that the railroad company's section men were assisting in the manual labor; that an employee of the company was showing the way in which the blasting should be done; that the engine which hauled the cars used for the work belonged to the company; and that various employees of the company were aiding in the control and management of the work generally.

In Ballard & B. Co. v. Lee (1908) 131 Ky. 412, 115 S. W. 732, it was held that the question whether the defendant company was liable for the death of a servant of a contractor employed by it should have been submitted to the jury, where the evidence introduced by the plaintiff's administrator tended to show that the defendant's superintendent of the work was frequently about the place where it was going on; that sometimes, in the absence of the contractor, he would not only tell the laborers what to do, but how to do it, directing them as to the manner of doing the work right, and correcting them when wrong; that he kept an account of the wages due to the contractor as well as the laborers, and looked after the payments; and that he also exercised a general superintendence over the contractor.

In Moffet v. Koch (1901) 106 La. 371, 31 So. 40, the evidence showed that the defendant had contracted to erect a brewery, and that he let out to one W. the contract for general work, including the hoisting into position of the iron required in the building; that W. employed and discharged his own mechanics and laborers; and that the defendant communicated with him, and not with the men employed by him. The court remarked that there was, upon the one hand, an uncertainty as to the precise limitations of the contract, and, upon the other, a certainty that the defendant was continually on hand, and in control, even though his directions as to how the work should be done were given to W. The conclusion arrived at, therefore, was that W. was not an independent contractor in such a sense as to relieve the defendant of liability for his conduct in the prosecution of that work.

In Keyes v. Second Baptist Church (1904) 99 Me. 308, 59 Atl. 446, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 526, the evidence which was held to show that one Nelson who had contracted to make certain alterations in a church building was a servant was thus stated by the court: The defendants "not only reserved the right of access, but exercised it. They furnished an architect. The committee was in daily attendance. The plans were not made in advance, 'not settled at any one time, but grew as time and the work went on,' as the chairman of the committee testified. He further says that he frequently consulted about the work with Mr. Nelson, and that they 'frequently brought the architect in to settle questions which we could not, such as how the work should be accomplished,—and that he had authority to control Mr. Nelson.' We need not quote further. The evidence, taken in connection with the written contract of Nelson, conclusively shows that Nelson, instead of 'not acting,' did act, under the direction and control of his employers, and did not determine for himself in what manner the work should be done. He was compelled to so act if he worked at all, and did so act. We are unable to see any reason why, at any time if they so desired, the defendants could not have discharged Nelson and all his men, without subjecting themselves to any liability whatever for breach of contract. Nelson was not an independent contractor, and the ruling of the presiding justice must stand."

In Hanrahan v. Baltimore (1911) 114 Md. 517, 80 Atl. 312, the liability of the defendant was inferred from certain undisputed evidence (not reported) that the contractors were under the supervision of the city, and that the division sewer engineer was in control of the work.

In Christianson v. Lannin (1913) 215 Mass. 322, 102 N. E. 419, where a covered pipe in which a watercourse crossed the plaintiff's land was obstructed, while the defendant's land, near which the pipe opened, was being graded by one M., the plaintiff's right to retain a verdict for the damage occasioned to his property by the overflow resulting from the obstruction was affirmed, upon evidence which tended to show that the defendant made a contract with M. to "do all rough grading as directed;" that M., although he let the grading to a subcontractor, caused the work to be done as the defendant directed; that the level of the surface of the earth at the rear of the lot, near the opening of the watercourse, was raised about 3½ feet; and that M. pointed out to the defendant the opening of the pipe, and said he had put some sticks and stones there, whereupon the defendant told him to leave it where it was. Such evidence, it was held, would justify a finding that the defendant "retained an active directory control over the manner in which the grading and filling were done."

In Ripley v. Priest (1912) 169 Mich. 383, 135 N. W. 258, the action was brought to recover for injuries occasioned to plaintiff's property by a fire which escaped from defendant's land, owing to the negligence of men employed under a written contract to clear it for a certain sum per acre. After remarking that, if the defendant had left the conduct of the work to these men, his liability, if it existed, would rest upon grounds which it was not necessary to consider, continued thus: "The plaintiff, however, gave testimony tending to show that defendant undertook to control and direct the method of burning. He testified that back-firing was done to minimize the danger of escape, upon the suggestion of defendant, and that defendant told him 'that he had his hired men in there, but he could not depend on them, and wanted me to look after it.' A fire set sometime in August had escaped control, and had with great difficulty and labor been extinguished. Plaintiff had assisted in this work, and defendant had paid him for it. . . . Under the facts disclosed by the evidence in this case, we are of opinion that the learned circuit judge properly submitted to the jury the question whether the defendant, with the consent of Hook and Still, directed them how they should perform their work the same as though they were servants. If the master controls the manner of performance of the acts of which complaint is made, or even reserves the right to supervise or control, he is liable for the negligent performance of those acts." The phrase, "even reserves the right to supervise or control," is somewhat oddly worded, considering that such reservation is the recognized indicium of the relationship of master and servant.

The fact that "at least some supervision was exercised" by the employer's agents was one of the evidential elements adverted to in Brown v. Douglas Lumber Co. (1910) 113 Minn. 67, 129 N. W. 161. This language is somewhat wanting in precision. Presumably the "supervision" which the court had in mind amounted to a control over the details of the work, and not merely to a general supervision exercised for the purpose of insuring that its results should be in conformity with the provisions of the contract.

The inference that a man employed to make an excavation for a cellar, at a specified price per diem and commissions on the outlay, was a contractor and not a servant, cannot properly be drawn, where the evidence of the employer himself shows that he was exercising control over him in respect to the manner in which the earth should be removed, so as to secure the safety of a house on the adjacent lot. Mound City Paint & Color Co. v. Conlon (1887) 92 Mo. 221, 4 S. W. 922, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 435.

In Porter v. Withers Estate Co. (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109, the plaintiff testified that one Goodwin, the defendant's agent, was on the work, and that "he would give directions what to do, and what colors to use, and where to paint," and that he would direct Batty, the plaintiff's immediate employer, with a suggestion "about how high up we were painting this border," and that he directed Batty what to do, "how to paint it, and so on." The evidence also showed that defendant was interfering in the work, to the extent of dictating the kind of men that should be employed. Held, that these facts were inconsistent with the theory that defendant was looking only to the result of the work.

In Jensen v. Barbour (1895) 15 Mont. 582, 39 Pac. 906, where it was held that a person who had made with the owner of a street car line a contract, under which, for a specified amount per month, he was to haul a car over the line once a day each way, and to furnish a driver, was a servant of the owner, and not an independent contractor, one of the grounds on which the decision was based was that the reservation of a power of control was indicated by the fact that the defendant's agent was accustomed to give directions for the protection of property, and to warn the driver not to allow boys to ride on the car.

In De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1915) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711, evidence held to be competent as bearing upon the question of the extent to which the defendant retained control of the work was to the effect that W., the defendant's general foreman, gave some orders to O., the foreman in charge of the stipulated work, concerning the completion of the particular portion of it on which the plaintiff was engaged on the day before he was injured, and that W. also directed O. to keep the crew working at the same place on the following day.

In Paro v. Whitefield Sav. Bank & T. Co. (1914) 77 N. H. 394, 92 Atl. 331, where plaintiff came into collision with a piece of timber left upon the sidewalk in front of defendant's bank by the workmen of one Smith, who had contracted to cement the cellar floor, on a basis of payment for all labor and supplies at cost price, with 10 per cent added, a nonsuit was held erroneous for the reason that, upon the evidence, it could be found that the bank did not relinquish the control of the premises to Smith, and that his contract was merely to furnish such material and workmen as the bank should, from time to time, require in the progress of the repair and improvement then contemplated, or decide upon in the course of the work. The court said: "There was evidence that Page (treasurer), for the bank, gave directions in the course of the work to Smith and the workmen; the plan prepared before the work was begun was not adhered to; it could be found that the cement was brought upon the premises for work not contemplated when Smith was employed. There was no evidence that Smith objected to the changes made as the work progressed, or to the interference of Page, or understood he had any right to object. From these facts it could be inferred Smith was not employed to produce a certain result, with control over the details of the work, but was employed to oversee the making of such changes as the defendants from time to time should direct, securing for them such of the necessary labor and material as the defendants did not otherwise provide; in short, that he was the defendants' servant. . . . Aside from the direct testimony of Smith that everything was done under the supervision of Page, the treasurer of the bank,—that 'he was the boss,'—there was other evidence tending to the same conclusion. It is unnecessary to recite it. If Smith is believed, the bank not only retained the right of control as to the details of the work, but exercised such control."

In Hart v. Ryan (1889) 3 Silv. Sup. Ct. 415, 6 N. Y. Supp. 921 (removal of lateral support damaged a building), it was held that the trial judge properly refused to hold upon the evidence that the defendants, the principal contractors for the erection of a building, were not liable by reason of their arrangement with one K. as to the excavations, the evidence being to this effect: That K. was to be paid by the yard for such excavations as he made; that it was his duty to follow the directions of the defendants from time to time, as to where and when he should dig; that they supervised the work; and that Ryan gave directions to the men there. Under these circumstances, it was considered that, if K. made the excavations which caused the damage upon the plaintiff's land, it was with the knowledge and apparently with the direction of the defendants. Hence if, upon all the evidence, the jury found that the footing course was erected upon the plaintiff's land, K., as well as the defendants, became a trespasser upon the plaintiff's premises.

In Postal Telegr.-Cable Co. v. Murrell (1918) 180 Ky. 52, L.R.A. 1918D, 357, 201 S. W. 402, the court proceeded upon the theory that an employer exercises control over the details of work, when he directs a messenger boy with regard to the places from which he is to collect telegrams, or at which he is to deliver them.

In Sullivan v. Dunham (1898) 35 App. Div. 342, 54 N. Y. Supp. 962, affirmed in (1900) 161 N. Y. 290, 47 L.R.A. 715, 76 Am. St. Rep. 274, 55 N. E. 923, 7 Am. Neg. Rep. 126 (tree which was blasted out whole fell on plaintiff), one Jewell had made a contract with the defendant for removing trees. The former testified that he was to furnish teams and men for a certain price, and that either he or one Dinkel was to be present and act as foreman under the direction of one Ward, who was the defendant's foreman, and was to do the work pursuant to his direction. Ward was present a part of the time while the work was progressing and pointed out what was to be done. The witness said: "We did not usually do anything that Ward did not first tell us to do." The directions given by Ward consisted in pointing out the particular pieces of work to be done, such as the excavation for the foundation of a barn, and construction of a ditch. For new pieces of work Dinkel and Jewell went to Ward; he directed them to take the trees out whole. The defendants Dinkel and Jewell received pay as foremen, at a given price per day, and the men, material, and expenses were paid for at cost, and bills rendered therefor with a certain percentage added as profit. On the other hand, the defendant stated, in effect, that he said a good deal to Mr. Ward on the subject of giving directions to Dinkel and Jewell "as to the manner or method and means of doing this work, before I left; also while I was there, before I had made my plans for going." The defendant was present when the work began, but while it was in progress he went away, and subsequently communicated with Ward in reference to the work. The defendant also testified that he gave no directions, either himself or through Ward, to Dinkel or Jewell, except in regard to the expansion of the work, and additional items of work to be done. The court thus commented on this evidence: "If the arrangement was that Dunham was simply to give directions as to the work to be done, and did not give, or had no authority to give, directions as to the manner in which it should be done, or as to the means to be used in performing it, then he would not be liable for any injury resulting from the method of its performance, as there would be no relation of master and servant. But the evidence authorized a different inference from this. As we have seen, Dunham said that he did not give directions as to the manner, method, and means of doing the work, and Ward carried out this view when he directed that the trees should be taken out whole, and he gave such direction in relation to blasting the particular tree out of which the injury arose. It was not necessary that the directions should embrace every detail in doing the work."

In Waters v. Greenleaf-Johnson Lumber Co. (1894) 115 N. C. 648, 20 N. E. 718, all the trees of a certain size on the plaintiff's land were purchased by the defendant company, under a contract giving it the right to construct a railroad for the removal of the timber. Parker, a man engaged to construct the road and cut and deliver the timber, committed, in the course of his work, a trespass on the plaintiff's property. The evidence did not show how he was paid; nor did it appear whether he was the mere instrument of the company, which directed the work, furnished the material necessary to prosecute it, and paid the hands, or whether it devolved on him exclusively, under his contract, to attend to all of these matters. It was, however, held that the fact that the company "supervised the cutting of the timber, and issued orders that Parker was bound to obey, showed affirmatively, of itself, a state of subjection on his part that made him, in law, its servant."

In Oklahoma City Constr. Co. v. Peppard (1914) 43 Okla. 121, 140 Pac. 1084, the president of the company which was erecting the building on which the plaintiff's decedent was killed testified that the authority of the owners was recognized with relation to everything in respect of which he sought to exercise it, and that his word was law on the building. This evidence, together with other facts not reported, was held to be sufficient to sustain the finding of the jury that the company was not an independent contractor.

In Moore v. B. F. Sturtevant Co. (1910) 228 Pa. 399, 77 Atl. 564, a servant of a manufacturing company, in whose building the defendant had contracted to place machinery and to erect a smokestack, was injured by reason of a defect in an appliance used in building the stack. The main ground of the defense was that this work had been sublet by the defendant, and was done by an independent contractor. The contract with the subcontractor was partly in writing, and partly oral, and there was a dispute in relation to the oral part of it. The testimony produced by the plaintiff tended to show that, while the subcontractor furnished men and machinery, the whole control and management of the work were under the charge of the defendant. The nature of the relationship created by the contract was held to be a question for the jury.

Men who were employed to load coke on the cars of a railway company, and who were paid by the number of cars loaded, and who, as the undisputed evidence showed, did their work under the immediate supervision and control of the company's superintendent, were held not to be independent contractors, in Holmes v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. (1897) 49 La. Ann. 1465, 22 So. 403, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 174 (laborer threw a heavy board down into the street without looking).

In Corrigan v. Heubler (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 159, where the right of the plaintiff to recover damages for an injury caused by a defective structure upon which he was working depended upon whether his immediate employer, Gilkison, was the servant of the defendants, who were principal contractors, or was himself an independent contractor, the character of the relationship was held to be a question for the jury, the evidence being as follows: That the contract between the defendants and Gilkison was oral; that Gilkison was irresponsible financially, and was furnished by the defendants with all the material used by him, and with money for the payment of his workmen; that the contract entered into between the principal employer and the defendants provided that the latter "would not assign, transfer, or sublet the work, or any part thereof, without the written consent of the agents of the principal employer; that such consent was not shown; that the defendants put certain employees, not alleged to have been employed by Gilkison, upon the work he was doing; that Gilkison thereupon abandoned the work; that the defendant's physician and surgeon, who treated all their men when treatment was necessary, treated the plaintiff when he was hurt, at the instance of the defendants, who paid him for his services; and that the defendants, on more than one occasion, exercised authority and control over Gilkison in directing where he and the men under him should work, how the work should be done, and how the material should be used in doing it.

In Houston Belt & Terminal R. Co. v. Scheppelman (1918) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 203 S. W. 167, where the injury complained of was caused by the improper manner in which a sewer trench had been refilled after pipes had been laid, a portion of the evidence on which the finding of the jury that the contract in question was not an independent one was that the employing company had given directions as to the manner in which the filling was to be done.

In Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484, a portion of the testimony which was held to justify a finding that the person employed, who had been engaged to haul goods, was not an independent contractor, was that he was subject at all times to the employer's directions with regard to the particular thing that he was to haul, the time when it was to be hauled, and the place to which the thing was to be taken.

In Rankel v. Buckstaff-Edwards Co. (1909) 138 Wis. 442, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1180, 120 N. W. 269, a portion of the evidence was that the defendant's officers had "exercised control over the undertaking, to the extent of directing its progress, course of procedure, and general management."

An employer who is sued for a personal injury received by an employee from the falling of an ice house cannot escape liability on the ground that he reserved no control over the erection of the building, where the evidence shows that before the contract was let he consulted with the builder, and determined the materials to be used and plan of construction, and was around the premises constantly while it was under construction. Meier v. Morgan (1892) 82 Wis. 289, 33 Am. St. Rep. 39, 52 N. W. 174.

The independence of a contract is negated where the evidence is that a person agreed to clear a piece of land at a certain price per acre, but that the employer watched the progress of the work, gave advice as to the setting of the fire to burn the timber and brushwood, and, when he was told that a certain fence which extended to the plaintiff's land might take fire, said that it made no difference. Johnston v. Hastie (1870) 30 U. C. Q. B. 232.

For other cases in which the circumstance that the employer did, in point of fact, interfere with and control the employees in the course of their work, has been adverted to as a cumulative element supporting the conclusion that they were mere servants, see Sérandat v. Saïsse (1866) L. R. 1 P. C. (Eng.) 152, 35 L. J. P. C. N. S. 17, 12 Jur. N. S. 301, 14 Week. Rep. 487; Homewood Rice Land Syndicate v. Suhs (1920) 142 Ark. 619, 219 S. W. 333; Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co. (1907) 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059 (employer's agent "frequently criticized the work of the workmen" hired by the contractor, and "occasionally gave them orders"); Quayle v. Sewerage & Water Bd. (1912) 131 La. 26, 58 So. 1021 (defendant's inspector "remained on the work, and directed how it should be done"); Wallace v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. (1897) 91 Tex. 18, 40 S. W. 399; Wm. Cameron & Co. v. Realmuto (1907) 45 Tex. Civ. App. 305, 100 S. W. 194 (employer "directed how and when the work should be done"); Moore v. Kopplin (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 1033 (evidence showed that the fence in question was erected under the orders and directions of the defendant's agent); Texas Bldg. Co. v. Reed (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 211 (evidence held to warrant finding that an agent of the defendant exercised control over the manner in which the person employed was to do the work); Kniceley v. West Virginia Midland R. Co. (1908) 64 W. Va. 278, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 370, 61 S. E. 811 (man employed to transfer lumber from narrow-gauge to standard-gauge cars unloaded it "in such manner as the employer directed, and placed it where he was ordered to put it").

In Worthington v. Parker (1885) 11 Daly (N. Y.) 545, the defendant's agent employed a firm of tinmiths to make a change in a water pipe of a house, and described to them the manner in which the leader was to be let out, how to put it in, and solder it; —stating that the pipe was to be changed which ran through the fire-wall, and then a leader was to be run along the wall to the rear of the building to carry the water off. This made it necessary to connect the leader that came through the wall, which was a 3½-inch pipe, with the other leader, by an elbow joint. Held, that the persons employed were not independent confootnote and those which are reviewed in the preceding section discloses, in some instances, a conflict of views which is the analogue of the still more remarkable difference of opinion which is exhibited by the decisions which turn upon the probative significance of the express stipulations discussed in the two preceding subtitles.

(2) That the employer transferred the contractor's servants from one kind of work to another.²

(3) That the employer promised, in response to a complaint made by one of his own servants, that the contractor's careless methods of work, by tractors. The court said: "They were directed as to the manner in which the work was to be done. . . . In the case of workmen employed to do a job like this, she, or her agent, had the right to dismiss them at any moment if not satisfied as to their ability, or mode of doing it; and as she, through her agent, selected them, she is responsible for the injury that arose from having made the choice of unskilful or careless persons to do what was to be done." As the persons employed were a firm of master mechanics engaged in a recognized business on their own account, it would seem that they must have been—prima facie, at least—independent contractors (see 19 A.L.R. pp. 241 et seq.), and consequently that the court was not justified in treating them as "agents," or, rather, as "servants," for the following passage shows that this was really the position in which they were deemed to be. In this point of view it is important to observe that the "direction" to which the tort-feasors are here stated to have been subject was apparently not one of such a character as to require the inference that they were servants.

² In Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638, two facts adverted to as being indicative of the conclusion that the contractor was a servant were that the employer's agents frequently required the workmen controlled by them to do other kinds of work besides that which was covered by his contract, and that the contractee's superintendent compelled him to take back a workman whom he had discharged.

In Sempier v. Goemann (1917) 165

which they were endangered, should be remedied.³

(4) That the employer's agent inspected the work to see that it was being performed in accordance with the terms of the contract.⁴ But having regard to the cases cited in note 2 to the preceding section and in § 1, supra, the theory that this fact has a tendency to disprove the independence of the contract is so clearly opposed to the weight of authority that it may safely be pronounced erroneous.

(5) That the person employed began and ceased work at the hours specified by the employer's agent.⁵

(6) That the contractor exercised

Wis. 103, 161 N. W. 354, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 670, one of the facts with reference to which the independence of the contract was denied was that the principal employer had exercised some species of control over the contractor's servants, by shifting at least one of them to work which was admittedly under the personal direction of the former.

³ In Simila v. Northwestern Improv. Co. (1913) 73 Wash. 285, 131 Pac. 831, the plaintiff, while working near the mouth of a tunnel of the mine operated by the defendant, his employer, was struck by a piece of timber sent down a chute by men who had contracted in writing to cut timber and deliver it at the mine. His witnesses testified that, only a short time before the accident, complaint had been made to the defendant's superintendent regarding the reckless manner in which the timbers were being sent down the chute, and that he did not then disclaim authority, but promised to see that the trouble was remedied. Held, that this evidence should have been submitted to the jury, not only for the reason that it was inconsistent with his own statement that the defendant had no control over the stipulated work, but also for the reason that, if this statement was correct, the course taken by him tended to mislead the defendant's workmen with regard to the nature of the relationship between the defendant and the contractors.

⁴ State ex rel. Virginia & R. Lake Co. v. District Ct. (1914) 128 Minn. 43, 150 N. W. 211, 7 N. C. C. A. 1076; Midgett v. Branning Mfg. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 333, 64 S. E. 5.

⁵ Van Simaey v. George R. Cook Co. (1918) 201 Mich. 540, 167 N. W. 925.

"entire supervision" over the work and the workmen.⁶

(7) That the employer "outlined the route" to be taken by a man employed as a carter.⁷

V. Circumstantial evidence bearing upon the quality of the contract.

§ 19. Introductory.

In the present division it is proposed to discuss those evidential elements which are circumstantial in their nature, and therefore possess a merely indirect and inferential significance with regard to the character of the relationship between the employer and the person employed.

The characteristic feature of all these elements is that they each possess some significance as tending to prove or disprove the independence of the contract, but are not conclusive with respect to that point. Having regard to their inconclusive quality, it is apparent that none of them, taken singly and apart from other testimony, can constitute an adequate basis for an ultimate inference of fact concerning the relationship between the employer and the person employed. To what extent the cumulative weight of two or more of them in combination may be sufficient to justify such an inference is a question less easily determined.

Merely as a matter of abstract logic, it might possibly be argued that a definite conclusion cannot warrantably be founded upon a conjunction of elements, each of which is indecisive in relation to the issue upon which it has a bearing. This phase of the subject has not yet been discussed by the courts with reference to the general principles by which the probative value of evidence is appraised. But it is clear that many of the decisions, as they stand, cannot be harmonized with such a theory. It is inconsistent with the cases which proceed, expressly or by implication, upon the doctrine that a presumption of independence is raised by evidence which shows that the stipulated work was to be performed on a quantitative basis, and that the person employed was normally engaged in a distinct and recognized occupation, business, or calling. See §§ 17 and 33 of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq.

Nor can it be reconciled with the cases in which an affirmation or denial of independence has been predicated upon evidence which did not include any testimony having a direct tendency to show that the person employed was not under the control of the employer with respect to the details of the work, or that he was subject to such control. See §§ 17 and 33 of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq.

Another class of cases in which it is necessary to assume that a definite significance was ascribed to a conjunction of these inconclusive elements consists of those in which there was direct testimony as to the existence of a right on the employer's part to exercise control over the work, but that testimony was itself of an indecisive character, as being susceptible either of the construction that this right extended to prescribing the manner in which the work was to be done, or of the construction that it was of that limited scope which is deemed to be consistent with independence of the contract. In cases of this type it seems permissible to view the function of the indirect testimony from two different standpoints; either to regard the items composing it as being merely a portion of an entire aggregate of evidence on which the decision is founded, or to consider them as a collection of particulars which serves to affix to the direct testimony a definite significance which, when considered apart from them, it does not possess. But the reports throw no light upon this general aspect of the matter.

⁶ Richmond v. Sitterding (1903) 101 Va. 354, 65 L.R.A. 445, 99 Am. St. Rep. 879, 43 S. E. 562, 18 Am. Neg. Rep. 616.

⁷ Muldoon v. City Fireproofing Co. (1909) 134 App. Div. 453, 119 N. Y. Supp. 320.

§ 20. Special skill required for the performance of the stipulated work.

The fact that the work to be done was such as required special skill for its proper performance is frequently referred to in cases where the contract was held to be independent. There is specific authority for the doctrine that this circumstance is to be regarded as one of those which have some tendency to show that the relation between the employer and the person employed was not that of master and servant.¹ But the present writer has not found any case in which it has been credited with a distinctly differentiating significance; and there are many instances in which it has been wholly disregarded.²

§ 21. Humble industrial status of the person employed.

The theory upon which the courts seem to have proceeded in many cases was that in view of the humble industrial status of the persons employed, and the simple character of the work to be done, the only admissible inference was that the employers intended to retain the right to give directions in regard to the details of the work. In other words, it was considered that, although the persons employed might have been engaged in a distinct occupation or calling, in the sense that they held themselves out as being prepared to do certain kinds of work for such parties as might engage them, the relation which they bore to those parties, during the progress of such work as might be undertaken by them, was in law that of a servant.¹ The authorities do not show distinctly the rationale of the presumption thus entertained. Essentially it may, perhaps, be said to reflect merely the un-

¹ See, for example, Kueckel v. Ryder (1900) 54 App. Div. 252, 66 N. Y. Supp. 522, affirmed on opinion below in (1902) 170 N. Y. 562, 62 N. E. 1096; Ziebell v. Eclipse Lumber Co. (1903) 33 Wash. 591, 74 Pac. 680, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 457; Threlkeld v. White (1890) 8 N. Z. L. R. 513.

In Cleghorn v. Taylor (1856) 18 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 664, it was held that a master slater employed to put up a chimney can and top was not a contractor.

² In Morgan v. Bowman (1856) 22 Mo. 538, where the fact that the person employed had been selected on account of his peculiar skill was declared not to be decisive, if he was in point of fact subject to control as regarded the details of the work.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Clement (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 220 S. W. 407, where a carpenter was injured while repairing a railway car from which gasoline was leaking, the court made the following remarks: "Plaintiff was employed for hire to do a particular work, and the fact that he was so employed by reason of his special skill, which was the only fact relied on to show that he was an independent contractor, would not of itself make plaintiff an independent contractor, since all servants are supposed to be competent to perform the duties assigned to them, and are employed for that reason. In order to show that plaintiff was employed as an independent contractor, it was incumbent upon defendant to plead and prove some special facts which would negative the prima facie showing that he was employed as was any other employee, such as locomotive engineer, who is likewise employed because of his special skill in the operation of a locomotive."

¹ In Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 119 Eng. Reprint, 209, 4 El. & Bl. 570, the defendant directed a man named Pearson to cleanse out a drain on his land. Pearson was not otherwise in the employment of the defendant; he was a common laborer, who had originally made the drain. Pearson executed the work with his own hands, and charged the defendant 5 shillings for the job, which the defendant paid. The defendant was not shown to have interfered with the work, or to have seen the way in which it was executed, or to have given any specific directions. Pearson, in clearing out the drain, took up the part of the highway under which the drain passed. After completing the work, he replaced the soil of the highway, but imperfectly and with insufficient materials; and, in consequence, it gave way while a horse belonging to the plaintiff, and on which plaintiff was riding at the time, was passing over it; and the horse, by falling into the hole thus made, was injured. Upon this evidence it was derstanding of the courts as to the terms upon which work is ordinarily held that Pearson was a servant, for whose negligence the defendant was responsible. Lord Campbell, Ch. J., said: "Had Pearson been the domestic servant of the defendant, and the defendant had said to him, 'Go and clean out the drain,' no doubt Pearson, by doing the work negligently, would have made the defendant liable. Then what difference can it make that Pearson was an independent laborer, to be paid by the job? The defendant might have said, 'Fill up the hole in the road, but not as you are now doing it, lest, when a horse goes over the place, he may be injured.' Pearson was, therefore, the defendant's servant, and, if so, cadit questio." Coleridge, J., said: "If the work had been done by his own hand he would have been responsible. So he would, if it had been done by his servant, or by a common laborer whom he had employed. On what ground? Because the party doing the act would have been employed by him. Instead of this, he employs a person who seems to have been usually employed in such works. Such person is just as much his servant, for this purpose, as a domestic servant." Wightman, J., said: "Really the question is whether Pearson is to be considered as the defendant's servant, or as a contractor exercising an independent employment. The whole evidence shows that the former is the correct view. Pearson was not a person exercising an independent business, but an ordinary laborer, chosen by the defendant in preference to any other, but not exercising an independent employment." Crompton, J., said: "The real question is whether the defendant and Pearson stood to each other in the relation of master and servant. I decide not on the ground that Pearson did not employ the hands of another; for, if he was the defendant's servant, the defendant would be liable for the wrongdoing of the person whom the servant employed; though it is true that such employment may sometimes be a test as to whether the employer was a servant or an independent contractor. The test here is whether the defendant retained the power of controlling the work. No distinction can be drawn from the circumstances of the man being employed at so much a day, or by the job. I think that here the relation was that of master and contracted for, under the circumstances indicated.

servant, not of contractor and contractee." The last-mentioned judge also remarked, during the argument of counsel (p. 575): "Is not this rather a case where the employer maintains a control over the person whom he employs? A contractor chooses the mode in which the work is done, and the persons who do it. I thought the principle of the cases, which are cases of difficulty, was that the contractor had this power of choice."

In Tucker v. Axbridge Highway Bd. (1889; Q. B. D.) 53 J. P. (Eng.) 87, where a trap was capsized by striking against a heap of stones which had been left beside a road by a man who had been employed to repair it, the defendant was held liable on the general ground, as it would seem, that "if a person does merely menial work then he is clearly a servant."

In M'Keon v. Bolton (1851) 1 Ir. C. L. Rep. 377, 3 Ir. Jur. O. S. 288, a man employed by the defendant to cleanse out, at certain intervals, the contents of his ash pit, deposited them on one occasion in the street, preparatory to their being removed, and the plaintiff's vehicle was upset by the heap. The jury found that the contract was an entire one to remove the rubbish altogether, and not merely to take it to the street. It was held error to enter judgment for the defendant on this finding. Blackburne, J., remarked that the nature of the subject-matter in such cases makes all the difference, and that, when regard was had to the fact that the act which caused the injury done in the very house occupied by the defendant, and under his wife's directions, it appeared to have been but the ordinary act of a servant.

In Cinofsky v. Industrial Commission (1919) 290 Ill. 521, 125 N. E. 286, one of the facts emphasized by the court was that the work [stripping of engines by men engaged in the "junk" business] was simple, and little supervision was required for it.

In Bristol & G. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 292 Ill. 16, 126 N. E. 599, the fact that the work of a man employed as a teamster was simple, was one of the grounds upon which he was held to be an "employee," within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act.

Where a city was constructing a water-pipe trench, and a laborer employed under the direction of the city's inspector and superintendent was assigned to the excavation of a 12-foot section of the trench, but had no authority or discretion as to his work, it was held that he was not, therefore, an independent contractor, but a servant, and that the city was bound to provide for his safety against caving of the banks while performing the work. Ft. Wayne v. Christie (1900) 156 Ind. 172, 59 N. E. 385.

As stated in § 18 of the monograph in 18 A.L.R. pp. 802 et seq., that

In Rait v. New England Furniture & Carpet Co. (1896) 66 Minn. 76, 68 N. W. 729, the court inclined strongly to the view that the decision in Sadler v. Henlock (Eng.) supra, would have justified it in holding, as a matter of law, that a person whose general occupation was that of carpenter and builder, who was employed by a house owner to stop a leak in the roof of the house, and, while engaged on the job, threw down some ice and snow on a passer-by, was a mere servant. But it was declared to be, at least, a question for the jury to say whether the defendant surrendered all control over the actions of the employee as to the manner of removing the ice and snow from the roof of the building. The construction thus put upon the English case is of very dubious correctness, when it is considered that the work there involved did not require any special skill, as in the case before the court. Upon the facts the Minnesota ruling is inconsistent with another English case, Welfare v. London & B. R. Co. (1869) L. R. 4 Q. B. (Eng.) 696, 38 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 241, 20 L. T. N. S. 743, 17 Week. Rep. 1065.

In O'Neill v. Blase (1902) 94 Mo. App. 648, 68 S. W. 764, where it was held that a laborer engaged for 50 cents to drive an animal was a servant to the owner of the animal, and not an independent contractor, the court reasoned as follows: "There is nothing in the nature of the employment, or in the contract, to indicate that Simon [the laborer] was not subject to the control, supervision, and direction of Blase, had he seen fit to exercise such control over Simon's movements. Nor is there anything whatever in the testimony to prove that Simon exercised a distinct calling, as did the colored teamster, Stevenson, in Pink v. Missouri Furnace Co. (1884) 82 Mo. 276, 52 Am. Rep.

"ouvriers d'une profession et determinee" are not within the purview of

376, and the licensed drover described in an English case cited by appellant [Milligan v. Wedge (1840) 12 Ad. & El. 737, 113 Eng. Reprint, 993, 4 Perry & D. 714, 10 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 19]. Simon was doing any sort of ordinary work at that time. To constitute him an independent contractor, so as to relieve his employer from liability for his conduct, it must, at least, appear that the work to be performed was committed exclusively to the discretion of the contractor. The independence of the contractor may appear by the nature of the work sometimes, and at other times by the terms of the contract, or by the calling of the contractor. The nature of the work in question in this case, no less than the agreement itself, totally fails to establish a foundation for holding Simon to be an independent contractor in the matter of driving the cow to defendant's place of business. The fact that the work was to be paid for in one price is not decisive of the question."

In Hughes v. Orange County Milk Asso. (1890) 56 Hun, 396, 31 N. Y. S. R. 468, 10 N. Y. Supp. 252, the ground upon which the defendant company was held liable for injuries received by a pedestrian who fell into an unguarded hole in a sidewalk, which was used for the removal of manure from its stables, was that the person who had removed the covering, a man under a yearly contract with the defendant to remove the manure, was not a tenant, but a servant of the company, and that the company was bound to see to it that the sidewalk was made safe while the hole was open.

In Curry v. Addoms (1915) 166 App. Div. 433, 151 N. Y. Supp. 1017, reargument denied in (1915) 168 App. Div. 925, 152 N. Y. Supp. 1106, where the plaintiff, a woman employed as an assistant, without the defendant's knowledge, by the janitress of two of his houses, whose duties were "to keep the premises clean and see that the ashes were removed, to collect the rents, and to report to me the general condition of the houses from time to time," was injured by reason of a defect in a flight of steps, one of the theories relied upon was that, under § 200 of the Labor Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 31 [Laws 1909, chap. 36], as amended by art. 1384 of the Code Napoléon, which provides that "les maîtres et commet-tants son responsables du dommage causé par leurs domestiques et pre-

Laws of 1910, chap. 352), known as the Employers' Liability Act, the janitress was an independent contractor, so that the plaintiff became her sub-contractor, and the defendant was liable for any defect in his "ways, works, machinery, or plant." But the contention in this regard was rejected by the court, which said: "In the matter of duties, her position was similar to that of a housekeeper, or domestic servant, to whom fall the innumerable small duties, indefinite and shifting in nature and variety, covering the fields of cleaning, sweeping, scrubbing, setting to right movable things gone awry, watching the various phenomena of disrepair and reporting them, with attentive mending of the fires and the disposition of ashes, meanwhile removed from the immediate eye of her master, but awaiting and obedient to his command as to the manner in which she should do his work, provided he exercise the right to interfere. As such a person she did, indeed, contract to do the work for a fixed sum, but in a legal sense she was not freed from the overruling will of the master, who of right could direct to what, and in what way, she should put her hand in work. Like an independent contractor, she promised to effect a result, but, unlike such a person, she was not legally free to choose her means of doing it. It is not a question whether the master does leave his servant to choose her means and to direct herself in the matter of details, but whether he is bound to do so, or has the right to interpose his own methods even to the point of caprice. . . . The statute, by the term 'independent contractor,' means to indicate a person who, in the legal sense, is independent of the service of the person who employs him. In thought, in speech, and in matters of contract, there are distinctively dissociated from such person the usual cleaners and caretakers of public or private buildings. The statute may, in this case, well be interpreted by customary estimate of the relations of one person to another. Moreover, it would be quite unfortunate to lift a janitress to the position of an independent contractor, and thereby remove from the master the rule respondeat superior, inasmuch as upon her care in the matter of details the safety of tenants depends, and for the prudent doing of which the master is responsible."

In Hamilton v. Oklahoma Trading Co. (1911) 33 Okla. 81, 124 Pac. 38, the defendant was held not to be liable for the breakage of a plate-glass window, occasioned by the negligence of laborers engaged to convey, by means of his truck, a carload of flour from the sidewalk into the building occupied by him.

In CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. CO. v. BENNETT (reported herewith) ante, 678, the conclusion of the court, that a man engaged by a railroad company to shovel coal at so much per ton into engine tenders was not an independent contractor, was based in part on the extreme improbability that the company, "hiring an unskilled man to perform one of the simplest tasks of manual labor, . . . would absolutely relinquish all right of control and directions."

See also Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. (1912) 23 N. D. 6, L.R.A. 1918C, 1063, 135 N. W. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 680, where one of the grounds upon which the defendant was held to be liable for injuries received by a child, who had fallen into one of the holes dug for its poles, was that the man by whom the holes were dug was shown not to be an independent contractor, by his testimony to the effect that the defendant's general manager of the construction work had employed him to dig them at a specified price for each hole, and with tools furnished by the person whom the manager was to send to mark the places where the holes were to be dug. But the precise position of the court with regard to the significance of the testimony is obscure.

Where a landowner who is about to rebuild a house which has been destroyed by fire contracts directly with a laborer to make the excavation for the foundation for a specified price, instead of letting out the whole work to one person, it is error to give an instruction which would exclude from the consideration of the jury the possibility that the laborer was hired as a servant. Stevenson v. Wallace (1876) 27 Gratt. (Va.) 77.

In Kueckel v. Ryder (1900) 54 App. Div. 252, 66 N. Y. Supp. 522, the court remarked arguendo: "Undoubtedly, posés." Since persons belonging to the category considered in the present section are, normally at least, outside the class thus exempted from responsibility, there is some apparent ground for the theory that, in coun-one cannot shield himself under the doctrine of independent contractors by simply employing another person, and giving him a general authority to procure others to assist in work which requires no care, or skill, or experience, but which is merely such as might be done by any person with sufficient physical strength."

In Rankine v. Dixon (1847) 9 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 1048, where the plaintiff, the proprietor of a mineral stratum which had been damaged by fire which spread from the place where ironstone was being calcined, it was shown that the lessee of the ironstone workings had employed contractors to calcine it at so much per ton, payable at the end of every fortnight. These contractors employed and paid all the workmen, the lessee having no direct management in the calcining operations. The jury were charged by Lord President Boyle that in point of law the lessee was responsible for the acts of these contractors, as they were in no different position from any other laborers hired by a master to work by the piece.

In Nisbet v. Dixon (1852) 14 Sc. Sess. Cas. 2d series, 973, a later case arising out of the same occurrence, the stipulations of the contract are set forth in greater detail. The contractor agreed to employ the necessary number of miners, to pay them their wages, to furnish various implements necessary for the workings, etc. After the first two months the output was to be not less than 100 tons of calcined stone weekly, and a failure to perform this stipulation entitled the contractee to terminate the contract by giving a written notice of one month. The working was to be carried on regularly and fairly, and agreeably to the instructions of the contractee or his overseer. The contractor, after the first month, had the right to abandon the job upon giving one month's notice. It was held that, as between the lessee of the ironstone and his landlord, the contractor was to be regarded as a mere servant of the lessee. The factor upon which the judgment of Lord Colonsay was mainly based tries in which the Code is in force, the element now under discussion carries a higher and more definite significance than that which is accorded to it in other jurisdictions.²

But, having regard to the prece-

was the humble industrial status of the contractors: "This is a case of injury to a neighboring property by a person who held a mixed character—at least, whose trade had not yet assumed such an independent character as entitles us to hold that the defenders can get rid of the responsibility which attaches to them, by employing such a person as Watson and his gangers, instead of laborers paid directly by themselves." The two other judges relied upon the existence of a non-delegable duty.

In a New Zealand case it was remarked, arguendo: "There is yet another point of distinction which has been referred to in several of the cases, and is, perhaps, here applicable—the employment of an ordinary laborer to do ordinary laborer's work by the piece, and the employment of persons skilled in a particular business." Threlkeld v. White (1890) 8 N. Z. L. R. 513.

A porter who was occasionally employed by a butter factor to leave parcels at the houses of purchasers, and was paid by the persons to whom the parcels were delivered, was held to be a "servant" of such factor, within the meaning of the embezzlement statutes, and not a person following an independent employment. Reg. v. Lynch (1854) 6 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 445.

The case of Bon Jellico Coal Co. v. Murphy (1914) 161 Ky. 450, 171 S. W. 160, is possibly to be classed as one of those illustrating the doctrine referred to in the text. But its precise rationale is not clear.

In Schroer v. Brooks (1920) 204 Mo. App. 567, 224 S. W. 53, it was held that the work of cutting logs was not "common or hard labor" in such a sense as to exclude the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor.

² In Sérandat v. Saïsse (1866) L. R. 1 P. C. (Eng.) 152, 35 L. J. P. C. N. S. 17, 12 Jur. N. S. 301, 14 Week. Rep. 487, the respondent brought an action for injuries caused by a fire kindled on the appellant's land by laborers employed by him to clear the ground for agricultural purposes, which fire was so carelessly made that sparks

dents already cited, it can scarcely be doubted that, on facts such as those presented in the case reviewed below, the conclusion that the contract was not an independent one would be arrived at by any court which proceeds upon the principles of Anglo-American law.³

and other burning particles were carried over and scattered upon his premises. He grounded his claim for damage on art. 1384 of the Code Napoléon (which is administered in Mauritius where the action was brought), which is in these words: "Les maîtres et commettants [sont responsables] du dommage causé par leurs domestiques et préposés dans les fonctions auxquelles ils les ont employés." The respondent contended that the appellant and the men he employed stood in the relation of commettant and préposé within the meaning of this article. From an examination of the authorities the conclusion was arrived at that, subject to the qualification mentioned in the following sentence, the word "préposé" in the article means substantially a person who stands in the same relation to "commettant" as "domestique" does to "maître," i. e., a person whom the "commettant" has intrusted to perform certain things on his behalf. It was observed, however, that the French lawyers, in their interpretations of the article, had qualified this construction by the doctrine that, in order to make the commettant responsible for the negligence of the préposé, the latter must be acting "sous les ordres, sous la direction et la surveillance du commettant." The evidence showed that there were two bands of Indian laborers employed, and that the work was to be paid for at a certain price per acre, but left it doubtful whether the appellant was to pay the price to the headmen of each band, or to them and the Indians in their respective bands. On this evidence the contention of the appellant that he had severed himself from the execution of the work, and parted with all superintendence and control over the persons by whom it was performed, was rejected by the privy council, on grounds explained in the following extract from the judgment: "Having regard to the nature of the work, and the condition of the men employed, it appears to us unreasonable to infer that the appellant had parted with the power of correcting, as the work went on, the mode in which it was to be performed, and of dictating what kind of brushwood and other growth was to be removed, and what was to be left standing, and how the weeds and brushwood which had been got up were to be dealt with, and where they were to be deposited; in other words, we think the evidence does not show that the general control, direction, and surveillance of the operations were relinquished by the appellant, by reason of the agreement he had made with the Indians. It may be observed that these men do not at all answer the description given by Sirey ('Codes Annotés,' vol. 1, p. 665) of ouvriers d'une profession reconnue et déterminée; they were ordinary laborers characterized by the court below as 'a set of idle, careless semibarbarians.' The view we have thus taken of the relation established by the agreement between them and their employer is corroborated by the evidence, which shows that in point of fact the appellant did interfere and control the men in the course of the work. For example, it was said by Joondine: 'Mr. Sérendat told me not to put fire in the place where I was working; . . . he told me to put fire in another place which he pointed.' Again, Beesapa says: "The previous day Mr. Sérendat had come and told Joondine to leave that portion of ground, which is $50, and go and work in the interior of the field." And the appellant's answer states that he had given orders five or six days before to burn some weeds, but that he also gave orders that the fire should be carefully extinguished. Looking, then, at the whole case, we are of opinion that the appellant and the Indian whose negligence caused the fire stood in the relation of 'commettant' and 'préposé.' And, as it has not been disputed that the negligent act was done by the 'préposé' in the course of his employment, it follows that the responsibility of the appellant is made out."

³In the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq., the reader will find, in the various sections which illustrate the circumstances under which the independence of the contracts was denied, many cases which support this statement.

§ 22. Financial irresponsibility of the person employed.

An evidential situation which includes among its elements the one adverted to in the preceding section ordinarily includes another circumstance which is intimately associated with that element, viz., the financial irresponsibility of the person employed. This circumstance, also, is regarded as one which tends to negative the independence of the contract.¹ In the nature of the case it is clear that the probative value attaching to such evidence must vary according to the extent and importance of the stipulated work.² It may be said to reach the vanishing point where the undertaking in question was one of such a nature that it could readily be carried out by a person who possessed little or no capital.

The theory that this circumstance is not necessarily inconsistent with the inference that the contract was an independent one was recognized in the cases cited below.³

§ 23. Contractor bound or not bound to perform the work himself.

A natural deduction from the ordinary conception of an independent contractor, viz., that he is essentially a person who merely agrees to produce certain specified results by any means which he may think proper to select, is that, unless restricted by some express stipulation, he will always be entitled to use the labor of

¹ For cases in which this significance was ascribed to it, see also Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Yensavage (1914) 134 C. C. A. 275, 218 Fed. 547, certiorari denied in (1915) 235 U. S. 705, 59 L. ed. 434, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 282; Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996; Wallace v. Southern Cotton Oil Co. (1897) 91 Tex. 18, 40 S. W. 399; Fehrenbacher v. Oakdale Copper Min. Co. (1911) 65 Wash. 134, 117 Pac. 870.

In Keech v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 503, 82 S. E. 836, an instruction was approved by which the jury were told that if the tortfeasor, a man employed for logging operations, was insolvent, it was a circumstance which they were to take into consideration in determining whether he was an independent contractor.

In Corrigan v. Heubler (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 159, the facts that a man who had undertaken the erection of a building was financially irresponsible, and had been furnished with all the materials used by him, and the wages of his workmen, were mentioned in conjunction, as tending to negative the independence of the contract.

In Nelson v. American Cement Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578, the contractor's want of means or capital was adverted to as a circumstance tending to show that the contract was a device for the purpose of evading liability. In this point of view, it will be observed, financial irresponsibility was not regarded as an element which bore upon the nature of the relationship between the parties, but one which tended to establish the existence of a situation in which the fact of the independence of the contract would afford no protection to the employer. See § 49, infra.

² In Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1899) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638, it was remarked that the rationale of the significance ascribed to this element was not the fact that the financial irresponsibility would debar a person from assuming the position of an independent contractor, but the "extreme improbability" that the employer "would intrust to such a person [without means, the performance of] a continuing contract involving the operation of valuable machinery and the filling of important orders as a result of his work, without retaining control and management over the methods, means, and manner of the work, and the time when it should be done."

³ White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107 (plaintiff was insolvent, and doing the work at a smaller price than it could reasonably be done for); Keech v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1914) 166 N. C. 503, 82 S. E. 836 (one of the statements of an instruction held to be correct was that if the person employed "was insolvent, and was an experienced man, and the contract was made in good faith, still he would be an independent contractor)."

others in executing the work which he has undertaken. In this point of view the conclusion is indicated that evidence from which it may warrantably be inferred that the person whose status is in question was not bound to perform personally the work undertaken by him tends strongly to show that he was not employed as a mere servant.¹

¹For cases in which the probative significance of such evidence was recognized, see Burns v. Michigan Paint Co. (1908) 152 Mich. 613, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816, 116 N. W. 182; Barrett v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866; Holbrook v. Olympia Hotel Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 597, 166 N. W. 876; Bray v. Kirkpatrick [1919; Ir. Ct. App.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 151; Walsh v. Waterford Harbour Comrs. [1914; Ir. Ct. of App.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 16, 47 Ir. L. T. 263, 7 B. W. C. C. 960.

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, the facts from which the conclusion was deduced that the claimant, one Stevens, was not an "employee" within the meaning of the California Workmen's Compensation Act, were thus stated by the court: "The contract between Stevens and Tittle [contractor for municipal work] did not cover any definite period. . . . The latter's foreman directed Stevens and his driver in the matter of the materials to be hauled. There was no agreement regarding the bulk of matter or the number of loads per day, but each wagon was to be used for the period of eight hours a day, both in removing the rubbish and surplus sand that accumulated from Tittle's work, . . . and also in hauling lumber and rock for the use of Tittle. . . . There is no word of evidence that Stevens was employed personally to drive either of his teams. He was to furnish the means of accomplishing certain results—namely, drivers, teams, and wagons—and there was no element of personal service in the contract. . . . He did [as a matter of fact] drive one of his own wagons, but, if he had desired to devote a day to other occupations, his contract with Tittle would have been fully performed if he had put any competent man in charge of the horses he had been driving, because he had been required to furnish 'teams' (which included wagons and drivers). Neither Mr. Stevens nor the driver of his second team was listed as an employee on the books of Mr. Tittle (who did business under the name of 'Tittle Company'), the account being carried as 'H. H. Stevens teams.'" At the end of each week an envelop was given to Stevens containing pay at the rate of $6 per day for each team, neither he nor his driver receiving any segregated sum from Tittle as wages.

In Dallison v. Hampel (1910) 12 West. Austr. L. R. 152, where a man engaged on a piecework footing to cart wood, etc., was held to be an independent contractor, the two circumstances relied upon were the absence of any obligation on his part to perform the contract personally, and his freedom from the employer's control.

In Farmer v. St. Croix Power Co. (1903) 117 Wis. 76, 98 Am. St. Rep. 914, 93 N. E. 830, a subcontractor was held not to be an "employee" within the purview of a lien law, because "he was as free to perform his contract by the employment of others as the principal was to perform his contract that way. The element of personal service essential to the relation of a servant to his master or a laborer to his employer was entirely wanting."

A person to whom a government contract for road work which was to be done according to certain specifications, and paid for at so much per chain, had been sublet, has been held not to be a servant within the purview of the Masters and Servants Act of New South Wales. Ex parte Rathbone (1892) 13 New South Wales L. R. 56.

So, also, it has been held that the corresponding statute in Victoria is not applicable to a person whose position is defined by the acceptance of his offer to paint a certain number of railway trucks to the satisfaction of the owner. Under such an agreement there is nothing to prevent the contracting party from getting the work done by deputy. McElroy v. Australian Forge & Engineering Co. (1899) 24 Vict. L. Rep. 953.

It is not irrelevant to mention in this connection that, in construing the English Truck Act (1 & 2 Wm. IV. chap. 37), the courts have held a person is or is not a "laborer" or an "artificer," within the scope of its provisions, according as he is or is not

It may be remarked that, in the cases which bear upon the subject, the language used by the courts is sometimes such as to leave a doubt as to whether the right of the contractor to avail himself of the labor of others was regarded as being predicable from the terms of the contract itself, or as a deduction from affirmative testimony. There is authority for the doctrine that the independence of the contract may sometimes be a warrantable conclusion, if the person employed did, as a matter of fact, execute the work by the hands of another.²

bound to execute in person the work which he has undertaken to do, the theory being that this term is intended to apply only to persons who are actually and personally engaged to perform the work. Riley v. Warden (1848) 2 Exch. 59, 154 Eng. Reprint, 405, 18 L. J. Exch. N. S. 120; Bowers v. Lovekin (1856) 6 El. & Bl. 584, 119 Eng. Reprint, 982, 25 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 371, 2 Jur. N. S. 1187, 4 Week. Rep. 600; Ingram v. Barnes (1857) 7 El. & Bl. 115, 119 Eng. Reprint, 1190, 26 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 319, 3 Jur. N. S. 861, 5 Week. Rep. 726; Floyd v. Weaver (1852) 16 Jur. (Eng.) 289, 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 151; Sharman v. Sanders (1853) 13 C. B. 166, 138 Eng. Reprint, 1161, 3 Car. & K. 298, 22 L. J. P. C. N. S. 86, 17 Jur. N. S. 765, 1 Week. Rep. 152; Sleeman v. Barrett (1864) 2 Hurlst. & C. 934, 159 Eng. Reprint, 386, 33 L. J. Exch. N. S. 153, 10 Jur. N. S. 476, 9 L. T. N. S. 834, 12 Week. Rep. 411.

²In a leading case Crompton, J., remarked that the fact of another person's having been engaged by the negligent employee to carry out the stipulated work "may sometimes be a test as to whether the employer was a servant or an independent contractor." Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 4 El. & Bl. 570, 119 Eng. Reprint, 209, 3 C. L. R. 760, 1 Jur. N. S. 677, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 138, 3 Week. Rep. 181.

³One of the evidential elements relied upon in Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. (1916) 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 36, was that the person employed was bound to do the stipulated work in person.

In Sadler v. Henlock (Eng.) supra, while one of the counsel was arguing that the workman was not the personal agent of the defendant, and that he might have employed a third person to do the work, Lord Campbell interposed the remark: "I doubt that; if I select a person in whom I place confidence, can he employ another?"

As the principle of the maxim "delegatus non potest delegare" is understood to apply in its full force to a servant, it is perhaps permissible to lay it down as a general rule that if it should appear, either from the nature of the employment or the terms of the agreement, that the person employed is expected to do the work with his own hands, the appropriate inference, in the absence of countervailing considerations, will be that he is engaged as a servant. But there is very little judicial authority upon this point.³ It is clear, moreover, that the probative significance of this element,

sonal agent of the defendant, and that he might have employed a third person to do the work, Lord Campbell interposed the remark: "I doubt that; if I select a person in whom I place confidence, can he employ another?"

In Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. (1915) 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598, which involved the enforceability of a claim under the Workmen's Compensation Act, one of the points taken by counsel was that the decedent, a painter, "was not a 'workman' or 'employee,' but rather an 'independent contractor,' within the meaning and scope of the term 'workman' or 'employee,' as used in 'master and servant' statutes, or in common-law decisions applying familiar rules of the master's liability in negligence for injuries sustained by an employee." But the theory thus relied upon was held untenable. "The record itself," said the court, "clearly indicates that it was contemplated by both Rheinwald and his employer that he should and would do all the work personally; he had no assistants on whose labor he made a profit; he personally performed every detail of the work for which he was paid; and the record indicates that both understood that full rights of control and direction were reserved to, and ordinarily exercised by, the employer on painting work performed by Rheinwald." The decision itself in this case is no longer good law in New York. See (1916) 174 App. Div. 935, 160 N. Y. Supp. 1143, reargument denied in (1916) 175 App. Div. 957, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1142, which is affirmed in (1918) 223 N. Y. 572, 119 N. E. 1074. But the correctness of whatever it may be, is in no wise decisive.⁴

§ 24. Partition of the work among several contractors.

In a Pennsylvania case, where the plaintiff, while passing along a street, fell into an unguarded excavation which had been made in the course of building operations, the court approved a charge of the trial judge to the effect that where the work is split up in different contracts, and the owner undertakes to supply one of the contractors with materials to be used in the execution of his contract, and no provision is made for the supervision of the work or the erection and maintenance of guards around it, it is justifiable to draw the inference that the owner retained the supervision, and that his duty to protect the public has not been devolved on others.¹ In the argument of the court it is taken for granted that, under such circumstances as those involved, an employee may, by an express stipulation, devolve upon a contractor the duty of protecting the public—a doctrine which had been established in Pennsylvania by an earlier ruling, but which is discredited by the weight of authority.² In most jurisdictions, therefore, the special consideration upon which the court relied would have no force, as the employer would have been held liable on the simple ground that a non-delegable duty had not been fulfilled, and irrespective of the question whether the work had been undertaken by one or several contractors. The present writer has found only one other case in which it has been intimated that the partition of the work among two or more contractors may be a sufficient reason for charging a principal with liability for their negligence.³ Such a limitation of the general doctrine seems to be quite arbitrary and irrational, and there are not wanting decisions in which it has been ignored or repudiated.⁴ these particular remarks has not been questioned.

⁴In Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co. (1919) 41 Cal. App. 468, 183 Pac. 178, the court made the following remarks: "Assuming, though not conceding, that the written contract of employment contemplated that Foulks should personally drive the truck, the fact remains that Foulks did employ others to drive it and deliver the loads; that these other persons received their orders and directions, as well as their pay, from him and not from defendant; and that defendant acquiesced in this course of conduct. And even if Foulks himself had been required to drive the truck, it would not necessarily follow that he was a servant, and not an independent contractor."

The fact that the person employed was doing the work himself was declared not to be a material element in Norton v. Day Coal Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 905.

¹*Homan v. Stanley* (1870) 66 Pa. 464, 5 Am. Rep. 389.

²*Allen v. Willard* (1868) 57 Pa. 374, where a principal contractor was sued for an injury caused by the negligence of a subcontractor in leaving unguarded an excavation under a footpath, it was laid down that, although the defendant would not have been liable if he had committed to the subcontractor the entire control of the work of making the excavation, he should be held responsible, for the reason that the evidence was insufficient to establish the conclusion that the control of the work had been thus transferred.

³*McCleary v. Kent* (1854) 3 Duer (N. Y.) 27, where the remark was made arguendo, with reference to the liability of a contractor for the negligence of subcontractors.

⁴In Treadwell v. New York (1861) 1 Daly (N. Y.) 128, it was held that a person who employs two independent contractors to execute different portions of the work of constructing a building is not liable to one of them for injuries caused by the negligence of the other.

In Martin v. Tribune Asso. (1883) 30 Hun (N. Y.) 391, the defendant was held not to be liable for the negligence of one of several mechanics who had been employed to do different parts of the work of constructing a building.

In Potter v. Seymour (1859) 4 Bosw. (N. Y.) 140, Hoffman, J., remarked: "When we once arrive at the principle that employment, control, and supervision, or the right to

§ 25. Footing upon which the remuneration of the person employed is computed.

It has been laid down that "the manner of payment of the contractor, whether it be by the day, or in a lump sum, is not a material factor in determining the relation between the parties,"¹ and that it does not matter "whether the contractor is to be compensated by a lump sum, or a commission on the cost, or a per diem payment."² such, over the person whose neglect was the immediate cause of the injury, is to test all these cases, the logical result seems inevitable that such rule is as applicable to contracts for distinct portions of a building, as to a contract for the whole."

¹ Ballard & B. Co. v. Lee (1909) 131 Ky. 412, 115 S. W. 732; Mayhew v. Sullivan Min. Co. (1884) 76 Me. 100 (contract to break down rock in a mine at a certain price per foot).

Language indicative of a similar point of view was used in Fuller v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (1882) 15 Fed. 875 (charge to jury); Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. (1893) 52 Minn. 474, 55 N. W. 52, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564.

² Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220.

³ The statement in 1 Thomp. Negl. §§ 579, 629, to this effect, was approved in Messner v. Bell & Co. (1909) 138 Ky. 19, 117 S. W. 346, 19 Ann. Cas. 1; Williams v. National Cash Register Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112.

For some recent cases in which the rule that the mode of paying the remuneration of the person employed is one of the circumstances to be considered was recognized in general terms, see Vacker v. Yeager (1909) 151 Ill. App. 144; Interstate Coal Co. v. Trivett (1913) 155 Ky. 795, 160 S. W. 731; Bodwell v. Webster (1915) 98 Neb. 664, 154 N. W. 229, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 624; Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. (1912) 23 N. D. 6, L.R.A.1918C, 1063, 135 N. W. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 680.

"The tendency of modern decisions is not to regard as essential or controlling the mere incidentals of the contract, such as the mode and manner of payment." Atlantic Transp. Co. v. Coneys (1897) 28 C. C. A. 388, 51 U. S. App. 570, 82 Fed. 177.

But it is manifest from the decisions that these sweeping statements need some qualification. The correct doctrine, so far as it can be expressed in general phraseology, is this: that the mode of payment is an element which has some bearing upon the question whether the person employed was an independent contractor, but does not afford a decisive test of the nature of his relationship to the employer.³ In this point of

"In the books divers rules for pronouncing upon this question [i. e., whether or not an employee was a servant] have been stated, but I must say not always with definiteness and perspicuity. Some lay it down that the manner of paying for the work or thing done, whether by the day or the job, is the rule; but this is not so; that is a circumstance to be considered, but not the criterion." Corbin v. American Mills (1858) 27 Conn. 274, 71 Am. Dec. 63.

"The fact that payment is to be made by the piece, or the job, or the day or hour is not necessarily controlling, where the workman is subject to the control of the employer as an employee, and not a contractor." Franklin Coal & Coke Co. v. Industrial Commission (1921) 296 Ill. 329, 129 N. E. 811.

That the mode of payment is a circumstance in determining whether one is an independent contractor or a servant of another, but is not decisive, was declared in Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray (1897) 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803.

An instruction based on the theory that the mode of payment is a decisive circumstance was held erroneous in New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. v. Reese (1884) 61 Miss. 581, where the statement disapproved was to the effect that a contract with a railroad company to complete an abandoned construction job, the agreement being that the contractor was to be paid what the labor and material to be furnished by him should cost, and 10 per cent additional as compensation, made the contractor the servant of the company so as to render it liable for his trespass in taking trees from the land of a third party.

The cases cited passim in the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq.,

view it follows that, for a complete and accurate statement of the effect of the decisions, several affirmative propositions and their negative complements are required.

(1) The fact that the person employed undertook to perform the stipulated work as a whole for a specific sum tends very strongly to show that he was an independent contractor. The high degree of probative force ascribed to this element, apparent from the cases cited in §§ 17 and 33, of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq., would indicate that, when it is combined with the single additional element of the exercise of an independent occupation by the person employed, the inference with respect to the quality of the contract becomes virtually a prima facie presumption, which prevails in the absence of affirmative proof that the employer was entitled to control the details of the work. But it is well settled that the element is not necessarily decisive as regards the quality of the contract.⁴

(2) The fact that the remuneration of the person employed was computed with reference to the quantity of work performed by him tends strongly to show that he was an independent contractor.⁵ That its probative sig-are also inconsistent with the broad statements quoted in the text.

⁴This obvious proposition was explicitly affirmed in Morgan v. Smith (1893) 159 Mass. 570, 35 N. E. 101; Kniceley v. West Virginia Midland R. Co. (1908) 64 W. Va. 278, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 370, 61 S. E. 811.

And see other cases cited in footnotes to §§ 19 and 20 of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq., in which this element appears in connection with evidence, circumstantial, or partly circumstantial and partly direct, negating independence of the contract.

In Cargeme v. Alberta Coal & Min. Co. (1912) 22 West. L. R. (Can.) 68, 7 B. W. C. C. 1020, 6 D. L. R. 231, it was held that an applicant under a Workmen's Compensation Act was precluded from enforcing his claim, by reason merely of the fact that he contracted to perform the work in question for a lump sum, and not on a time basis.

⁵In Bellamy v. F. A. Ames Co. (1910) 140 Ky. 98, 130 S. W. 980, the court upheld a judgment for the defendant in an action brought by a hodcarrier, injured while in the employ of a mason whose compensation for the brickwork in a building, then under construction for the defendant, was based upon the number of bricks laid. In this case, it should be observed, evidence offered on behalf of the plaintiff, which showed that the mason's workmen were paid directly by the defendant, and that the defendant had exercised control over the operations, was explained in such a manner as to destroy the probative value which would otherwise have been ascribed to it.

In Chute v. Moeser (1908) 77 Kan. 706, 95 Pac. 398, the fact of the defendant's having "paid upon estimates, as the work progressed, according to an agreed price per cubic foot," was specified as one of several "considerations which did not affect the reason of the rule which ordinarily exempts an employer from responsibility for the negligence of an independent contractor." The precise import of this statement is somewhat obscure, but if it means that this fact had no evidential significance whatever, in respect of the nature of the relationship, it was manifestly inconsistent with the weight of authority.

In De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1915) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711, evidence which showed that periodical settlements were made between the person employed and the defendant company, based upon estimates at the specified price per foot, the company paying a lump sum for the amount due, tended to corroborate other testimony from which the independence of the contract might be inferred.

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, one of the facts specified, among those which tended to show that the person employed was an independent contractor, was that at the end of each week he received an amount of remuneration calculated at the rate of so many dollars per diem for each of the teams used by him in the performance of a contract for the haulage of materials, no separate sum being paid nificance is regarded as being, for practical purposes, not less considerable than that of the circumstance mentioned in ¶ (1), is indicated by the cases in which it has been held to be sufficient, when combined with the element of an independent occupa-as wages, either to him or his workmen.

In Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; A. T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525, the court seems to have assumed that a trucking firm, paid by the month according to the number and description of the trucks used, was an independent contractor, but the only question actually discussed was whether the defendant could be held liable on the ground that it had exercised authority over the particular driver whose negligence had caused the plaintiff's injury.

In Barrett v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866, a portion of the evidence from which the independence of the contract was inferred was that, while the contract was in progress, the person employed was paid upon estimates, at the end of the week, only 50 per cent of the computed price of the work completed.

As elements tending to prove the independence of the contract, the facts that no provision was made as to the payment for the services rendered, and that the compensation was dependent upon the value thereof, were mentioned in Hexamer v. Webb (1886) 101 N. Y. 377, 54 Am. Rep. 703, 4 N. E. 755.

⁶ For cases in which persons employed to work by the piece were held to be servants, see the following:

California. — Majors v. Connor (1912) 162 Cal. 131, 121 Pac. 371; Connell v. Harris (1913) 23 Cal. App. 537, 138 Pac. 949; Sacchi v. Bayside Lumber Co. (1910) 13 Cal. App. 72, 108 Pac. 885.

Illinois. — Decatur R. Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 276 Ill. 472, 114 N. E. 915.

Indiana. — Munice Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Thompson (1919) 70 Ind. App. 157, 123 N. E. 196; Nissen Transfer & Storage Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 652.

Iowa. — Frisbee v. Hawkeye Land Co. (1915) 170 Iowa, 540, 153 N. W. 85, 10 N. C. C. A. 228.

tion, to establish the independence of the contract. See §§ 21 and 33 of the monograph in 19 A.L.R. pp. 1168 et seq. But it is disregarded whenever the conclusion indicated by the remainder of the evidence is that the person employed was a servant.⁶ This Kansas. — Isnard v. Edgar Zinc Co. (1910) 81 Kan. 765, 106 Pac. 1003.

Kentucky. — Messmer v. Bell & C. Co. (1909) 133 Ky. 19, 117 S. W. 346, 19 Ann. Cas. 1; Employer's Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 74, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 850, 160 S. W. 914; Interstate Coal Co. v. Trivett (1913) 155 Ky. 795, 160 S. W. 731; Interstate Coal Co. v. Trivett (1913) 155 Ky. 825, 160 S. W. 728; Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Murrell (1918) 180 Ky. 52, L.R.A. 1918D, 357, 201 S. W. 462.

Louisiana. — SWAIN v. KIRKPATRICK LUMBER Co. (reported herewith) ante, 665.

Massachusetts. — McAllister's Case (1918) 229 Mass. 193, 118 N. E. 326.

Michigan. — Lewis v. Detroit Vitri-fied Brick Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 489, 129 N. W. 726.

Minnesota. — Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. (1893) 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52; State ex rel. Virginia & R. L. Co. v. District Ct. (1914) 128 Minn. 43, 150 N. W. 211, 7 N. C. C. A. 1076.

Missouri. — Kiser v. Suppe (1908) 133 Mo. App. 19, 112 S. W. 1005.

Montana. — Allen v. Bear Creek Coal Co. (1911) 43 Mont. 269, 115 Pac. 673; McInness v. Republic Coal Co. (1914) 49 Mont. 112, 140 Pac. 235.

New York. — Liberatore v. Friedman (1918) 224 N. Y. 710, 121 N. E. 876; Peer v. Babcock (1920) 230 N. Y. 106, 129 N. E. 224, reversing (1919) 187 App. Div. 925, 174 N. Y. Supp. 914.

Oklahoma. — See also CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. BENNETT (reported herewith) ante, 678.

Oregon. — Macdonald v. O'Reilly (1904) 45 Or. 589, 78 Pac. 753.

Pennsylvania. — Foster v. National Steel Co. (1907) 216 Pa. 279, 65 Atl. 618; Kelley v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 426, 118 Atl. 419.

Texas. — Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1899) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638; Wm. Cameron & Co. v. Realmuto (1907) 45 Tex. Civ. App. 305, 100 S. W. 194; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Romans (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 114 S. W. 157.

remark is applicable as regards contracts under which the standard of remuneration is a percentage of the profits, gross or net, which accrue to Washington. — Barclay v. Puget Sound Lumber Co. (1908) 48 Wash. 241, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 140, 93 Pac. 430; Simila v. Northwestern Improv. Co. (1913) 73 Wash. 285, 131 Pac. 831.

Wisconsin. — Whitney v. Clifford (1879) 46 Wis. 138, 32 Am. Rep. 703, 49 N. W. 835; Murphy v. Herold Co. (1909) 137 Wis. 609, 119 N. W. 294.

England. — Charles v. Taylor (1878) L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 492, 38 L. T. N. S. 773, 27 Week. Rep. 32.

Canada. — Campbell v. Dickie (1903) 36 N. S. 40 (affirmed in (1903) 34 Can. S. C. 265, but this point was not referred to).

"No distinction can be drawn from the circumstance of a man being employed at so much a day, or by the job." Sadler v. Henlock (1855) 4 El. & Bl. 570, 119 Eng. Reprint, 209, 3 C. L. R. 760, 1 Jur. N. S. 677, 24 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 138, 3 Week. Rep. 181. What is meant by these words is evidently that this circumstance is not decisive.

In Tucker v. Axbridge Highway Bd. (1889; Q. B. Div.) 5 Times L. R. (Eng.) 26, 53 J. P. 87, where the defendant was held liable for the death of the plaintiff's husband, occasioned by his having driven a vehicle in the dark against a pile of stones deposited on a road by a man who had been hired to haul them at so much a load, Pollock, B., according to the former of the reports specified, used the following language: "It was said, indeed, that the carter was not the servant of the board. He was, however, employed and paid by the board, and a servant could not be made a contractor merely because he was paid by piecework or by quantity. The man was simply employed by the board to cart the stones and put them by the side of the road. If he had been employed under a general contract to put the road in repair, it would have been different. But here, as in Taylor v. Greenhalgh (1876) 24 Week. Rep. (Eng.) 311, the man was only employed to find labor. He was, therefore, the servant of the board, and they were liable for his negligence." As reported in J. P., the learned judge's words were these: "The contractor here was a servant of the highway board. Mr. Poole contended that he was not a servant, but a contractor. It is, however, well established that you cannot alter the relation between any two persons by merely applying to them terms of different signification. You must look at the facts, and judge from them. If a person does merely menial work then he is clearly a servant. If he does the work in pursuance of a general contract, the matter is different, —the work is to be done for a lump sum, or by the year or month, or at so much per yard,—it is an entirely different matter, and in that case the duty and liability are wholly transferred to the contractor. That point is rendered clear in Pendlebury v. Greenhalgh (1875) L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 36, 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 3, 33 L. T. N. S. 472, 24 Week. Rep. 98, 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 700."

In Kelley's Dependents v. Hossac Lumber Co. (1921) — Vt. —, 113 Atl. 818, 20 N. C. C. A. 902, a portion of the evidence from which the existence of the relationship of master and servant was held to be inferable was that the persons employed were carried on the employer's books with the per diem workmen; but the payroll sheets on which their names appeared were headed "jobbers."

The existence of independent sub-contracts with the persons who performed various distinct kinds of work for the principal contractor will not be inferred from the mere fact that they were paid by the piece. Allen v. Willard (1868) 57 Pa. 374.

In De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1915) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711, it was laid down that the arrangement made for periodical settlements on a piecework footing "did not so conclusively establish the existence of an independent contract that the court was warranted in taking the case from the jury."

In a Quebec case it was declared to be "immaterial whether the workman is paid by the piece or by the foot, provided the work is done on the premises and under the supervision of the defendants." Beaulieu v. Picard (1912) 42 Rap. Jud. Quebec S. C. 455, 7 D. L. R. 2.

In Rex v. King's Norton (1741) Burr. Sett. Cas. (Eng.) 152, an employee, though paid by the piece, was held to be a servant for the purpose of obtaining a settlement under the Poor Law.

the employer from the services of the person employed.⁷

(3) The fact that the remuneration was computed with reference to the time during which the person employed should be engaged in the performance of the stipulated work tends strongly to prove that he was not an independent contractor.⁸ But its probative significance in this respect is ⁷ For cases in which it was held that, having regard to the whole of a contract for the employment of a salesman on a commission basis, it was not an independent one, see Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rahn (1889) 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175; Riggs v. Standard Oil Co. (1904) 130 Fed. 199; Aisenberg v. C. F. Adams Co. (1920) 95 Conn. 419, 111 Atl. 591.

In Terry Dairy Co. v. Parker (1920) 144 Ark. 401, 223 S. W. 6, where a man engaged to handle the produce of a dairy company was held, upon the evidence as a whole, to be an independent contractor, it was held that the fact of his having been paid for his services on a commission basis was not sufficient of itself to warrant that conclusion.

In King v. Brenham Automobile Co. (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 145 S. W. 278, where the tort-feasor was a lad operating an automobile owned by the defendant, who furnished the lights and gasoline necessary to run it, and got the larger part of the money earned by the car. The existence of the relationship of master and servant, as indicated by these circumstances, was held not to be negated by the fact that he was to receive 20 per cent of the earnings. Such a fact, it was considered, tended to prove that this mode of pay was established to offer an incentive to seek for and obtain passengers for the car, rather than to show that the chauffeur was an independent contractor.

The circumstance that a driver employed by a baker was paid a percentage of the retail price of the bread delivered by him was held in Easton v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 Pac. 288, not to be inconsistent with the conclusion that he was an "employee entitled to claim under a Workmen's Compensation Act." The court quoted the following remark, made in Cameron v. Pillsbury (1916) 173 Cal. 83, 159 Pac. 149: "It is not an uncommon thing for retail merchants, laundrymen, and the like, to pay a commission to the drivers of their delivery wagons for all new business which they bring in. It has never been held that this circumstance created a distinct relationship in law."

In cases arising under the embezzlement statutes, the fact that a person employed to solicit orders for a commodity is paid by commission does not negative the inference that he is a servant. Rex v. Carr (1811) Russ. & R. C. C. (Eng.) 198; Reg. v. May (1861) Leigh & C. C. C. (Eng.) 13, 30 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 81, 7 Jur. N. S. 147, 3 L. T. N. S. 680, 9 Week. Rep. 256, 8 Cox, C. C. 421; Reg. v. Tite (1861) Leigh & C. C. C. (Eng.) 29, 30 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 142, 7 Jur. N. S. 556, 4 L. T. N. S. 259, 9 Week. Rep. 554, 8 Cox, C. C. 458; Reg. v. Bailey (1871) 12 Cox, C. C. (Eng.) 56, 24 L. T. N. S. 477.

⁸ For cases in which the doctrine was affirmed or taken for granted, see Thompson v. Twiss (1916) 90 Conn. 444, L.R.A.1916E, 506, 97 Atl. 328; Messmer v. Bell & C. Co. (1909) 133 Ky. 19, 117 S. W. 346, 19 Ann. Cas. 1 —citing 1 Thomp. Neg. §§ 579, 629; Williams v. National Cash Register Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112 —citing the same authority; Porter v. Withers Estate Co. (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109; Poor v. Madison River Power Co. (1908) 38 Mont. 341, 99 Pac. 947; Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484; Belanger v. Belanger (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 678.

In Texas Short Line R. Co. v. Waymire (1905) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 89 S. W. 452, it was held error to refuse an instruction to the effect that, although the jury might find from the evidence that the plaintiff was under contract for a compensation to be measured by the time consumed in the work, yet if they also found that, under the terms of the contract, the defendant had no right to control plaintiff as to the manner of performing the work, they should render a verdict. The refusal of this charge is assigned as for the defendant.

In Shea v. Reems (1884) 36 La. Ann. 966, where it was laid down that the Louisiana Code ordinarily infers the power of control and discharge from the payment of wages, this was declared to be the common-law rule disregarded, whenever the rest of the evidence shows that the employer was not invested with the right to exercise control over the details of the stipulated work.⁹

(4) The fact that the remuneration of the person employed was to be computed, either entirely or in part, with also. This statement is, clearly too sweeping. The most that can be said, having a due regard to the general trend of the authorities, is that the payment of wages is a circumstance from which a jury would be justified in inferring the relation of master and servant, if there should be no antagonistic evidence pointing decisively to the opposite conclusion.

⁹ "One may be an independent contractor, although not to be paid a round sum for his work, as when paid by the day, or the cost of the work and a per cent." Pooler v. Sargent Lumber Co. (1915) 113 Me. 426, L.R.A. 1915F, 1125, 94 Atl. 754.

For other cases supporting the statement in the text, see the following:

Connecticut.—Corbin v. American Mills (1858) 27 Conn. 274, 71 Am. Dec. 63, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 735.

Massachusetts.—Dane v. Cochrane Chemical Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 453, 41 N. E. 678 (carpenter employed under continuous contract at a specified rate per diem, but using his own discretion as to details, held to be an independent contractor).

Michigan.—Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. (1916) 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 36; Holbrook v. Olympia Hotel Co. (1918) 200 Mich. 597, 166 N. W. 876.

New York.—Hexamer v. Webb (1886) 101 N. Y. 377, 54 Am. Rep. 703, 4 N. E. 755; Larow v. Clute (1891; Sup. Ct. Gen. T.) 37 N. Y. S. R. 859, 14 N. Y. Supp. 616.

Pennsylvania.—Harrison v. Collins (1878) 86 Pa. 153, 27 Am. Rep. 699; Karl v. Juniata County (1903) 206 Pa. 633, 56 Atl. 78.

Texas.—Groesbeck v. Pinson (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 44, 50 S. W. 620.

Virginia.—Emmerson v. Fay (1896) 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. 386.

In Norton v. Day Coal Co. (1920) — Iowa, —, 180 N. W. 905, the fact the person employed was paid by the day was declared to be significant, but not conclusive, with regard to the reference to the amount which he himself should disburse for the purpose of performing the stipulated work, tends to show that he was an independent contractor.¹⁰ But its significance in that regard is not decisive.

existence of the relationship of master and servant.

The statement in Geer v. Darrow (1891) 61 Conn. 220, 23 Atl. 1087, that the fact of the defendant's computation having been estimated by day's work was "quite immaterial," is inexact. Manifestly what the court meant was that this fact is not decisive.

In a prosecution under the embezzlement statutes, the fact that men following the same occupation (drover) as the prisoner were customarily paid by the day does not prove that he was a servant. Reg. v. Hey (1849) 2 Car. & K. (Eng.) 985, Temple & M. 209, 1 Den. C. C. 602, 3 Cox, C. C. 582, 14 Jur. 154.

¹⁰ In United States v. Driscoll (1877) 96 U. S. 421, 24 L. ed. 847, one Ordway contracted with the United States to furnish granite at specified prices from certain quarries, and to deliver it in Washington city, at such times as might be required. It was provided that he should furnish all the labor, tools, and material necessary "to cut, dress, and box at the quarries all the granite in such manner" as should be directed; that the United States was to pay him "the full cost of such labor," etc., "and also the insurance on the granite, increased by" 15 per cent on such cost; that he was to furnish such number of men as might be deemed necessary for the proper prosecution of the work by the United States; and that, in default of delivery at the times required by the United States, he should pay $100 for each day thereafter. Claimant, having worked ten hours a day as an employee of the contractor, petitioned for compensation in respect of the two hours in excess of the eight specified by the Act of June 25, 1868, as constituting a day's work. Held, that the claimant's employer was an independent contractor, and consequently that the claim was not enforceable. It is clear, said the court, "that there was

§ 26. Employer entitled to terminate the employment.

The circumstance that the employer possessed the right of terminating the contract at any time, irrespective of whether there was or was not a no privity between the appellee and the United States. Ordway employed him, and was to pay him, and did pay him. The United States had no interest in the rate or amount paid, save that the sums so paid, with 15 per cent in addition, was the measure of the amount to be paid to Ordway. The fact that Ordway procured the appellee's receipts, presented his own voucher to the government, and received his pay before paying his hands, is immaterial as regards the rights of the parties. It was a convenience to the contractor, and safe for the government. The hands trusted the former, and, if he had failed to pay them, the loss would have been theirs." It was also remarked that the stipulation as to the penalty was "incongruous with the idea of his being an agent, and not a contractor."

Compare also statement quoted in note 9, supra, from the Pooler Case.

¹ For cases in which the person employed was held not to be an independent contractor, and, in which this element was one of those adverted to, see the following:

United States.—Standard Oil Co. v. Parkinson (1907) 82 C. C. A. 29, 152 Fed. 681 (either party might abandon contract at any time).

Arizona.—Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996.

Colorado.—Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439, 12 Ann. Cas. 137 (employer was empowered to reduce the force engaged upon the work, or suspend it for any length of time, or discontinue it and cancel the contract, upon paying the contractor all that was due to him, up to the time of suspension).

Connecticut.—Aisenberg v. C. F. Adams Co. (1920) 95 Conn. 419, 111 Atl. 591.

Illinois.—Decatur R. & Light Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 276 Ill. 472, 114 N. E. 915; Bristol & G. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 292 Ill. 16, 126 N. E. 599; Bernauer v. Hartman Steel Co. (1889) 33 Ill. App. 491.

Indiana.—Columbia School Supply

good cause for doing so, is indisputably an evidential element which tends strongly to show that the person employed was not an independent contractor.¹ There is even some apparent authority for the doctrine that

Co. v. Lewis (1917) 65 Ind. App. 339, 116 N. E. 1.

Louisiana.—Quayle v. Sewerage & Water Bd. (1912) 131 La. 26, 58 So. 1021 (employer's possession of right of discharging contractor at any time is mentioned in the syllabus of the court as one of several factors, the conjunction of which negated the independence of the contract).

Michigan.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitri-fied Brick Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 489, 129 N. W. 726..

New York.—Goldman v. Mason (1888) 18 N. Y. S. R. 376, 2 N. Y. Supp. 337; Muldoon v. City Fireproofing Co. (1909) 134 App. Div. 453, 119 N. Y. Supp. 320; Abromowitz v. Hudson View Constr. Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 356, 177 N. Y. Supp. 187, affirmed in (1920) 228 N. Y. 509, 126 N. E. 898.

Texas.—Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1899) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638.

Vermont.—Kelley's Dependents v. Hoosac Lumber Co. (1921) — Vt. —, 113 Atl. 818, 20 N. C. C. A. 902.

West Virginia.—Kniceley v. West Virginia Midland R. Co. (1908) 64 W. Va. 278, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 370, 61 S. E. 811.

Canada.—Harold v. Montreal (1867; Q. B.) 11 Lower Can. Jur. 169 (contract might be set aside at the pleasure of the employer after twenty-four hours' notice).

Scotland.—Doharty v. Boyd [1909] Sc. Sess. Cas. 87, 46 Scot. L. R. 71, 2 B. W. C. C. 257.

In Cockran v. Rice (1910) 26 S. D. 393, 128 N. W. 583, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 570, it was said: "No single fact is more conclusive as to the effect of the contract of employment, perhaps, than the unrestricted right of the employer to end the particular service whenever he chooses, without regard to the final result of the work itself." This statement is obviously too sweeping, for direct evidence going to show that the employer was entitled to exercise control over the details of the work, or actually exercised such control, is certainly more conclusive than the fact mentioned.

the probative force of the circumstance in this regard is virtually decisive.² But this doctrine is apparently not reconcilable with the language used in the majority of the cases, and it is certainly inconsistent with those cases in which the persons employed were held to be independent contrac-

In Keyes v. Second Baptist Church (1904) 99 Me. 308, 59 Atl. 446, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 526, the existence of a right of discharge was adverted to, but it seems to have been viewed not as a corroborative factor established by direct evidence, but as a circumstance deducible from the rest of the evidence.

In Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rahn (1889) 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175, one of the provisions referred to as negating the independence of the contract was to the effect that the employer could discharge the contractor at any time, while the latter could terminate the contract only upon ten days' notice.

² In Oldfield v. Furness (1893; C. A.) 58 J. P. (Eng.) 102, 9 Times L. R. 515, where the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a chute which had been negligently fastened by a coservant, it was held that a jury could not have properly found that the immediate employer of the injured person was an independent contractor, where the evidence was that certain shipowners had arranged to have the goods arriving in a ship delivered through their agents, a firm which was one of the defendants in the action; that these agents had made a contract with one J., who had been a foreman on the dock quay, and who himself worked on the quay; that this contract provided that the agents might at any moment stop J. from going on with the work; and that, after the accident, the agents, in a letter to the plaintiff, had referred to J. as their "foreman." The court seems to have considered the nonsuit proper, even without reference to the last-mentioned detail.

In Nelson v. American Cement Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578, the court laid it down that, if the employer retained, "outside of the written instrument embodying the contract, the right to discharge at will the person employed," the latter was not an independent contractor, and the instrument was not what it purported to be.

In Evans v. Dare Lumber Co. (1917) 174 N. C. 31, 93 S. E. 480, the court took the position that the right of the employer to terminate the contract at any time "gave him potential control" over the person employed, and showed conclusively that the latter was not an independent contractor. The soundness of the doctrine thus adopted seems to be disputable. It is submitted that the employer's possession of a right to dismiss at any time the person employed does not necessarily import his possession of a right to control the details of the stipulated work.

In Holliday v. National Teleph. Co. [1899] 2 Q. B. (Eng.) 392, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 1016, 81 L. T. N. S. 252, 47 Week. Rep. 658, reversing [1899] 1 Q. B. 221, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 302, where the injury was caused by the negligence of H., a master plumber employed by a telephone company to connect the pipes which it was laying in a street for its wires, the evidence was that, according to the usual course of business, H. was sent for, and either came in person, or sent one or two men, generally, and did the work as soon as he could. But there was no agreement that he should come at any specified time. On the occasion in question H's brother came to do the work alone, as H. was otherwise engaged. The defendant's local manager visited the work several times a day to see that the joints were properly made, and he stated in evidence that, if the work were not satisfactory, he could put an end to the contract. A finding by the city of London court that H. was a servant was held by the divisional court not to be justified by the evidence; but the court of appeal was of opinion that the finding should be allowed to stand.

In 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 579 & 629, the rule is thus stated: "The right to control the conduct of another implies the power to discharge him from the service or employment for disobedience; and, accordingly, the power to discharge has been regarded as the test by which to determine whether the relation of master and servant exists." This passage was quoted in Williams v. National Cash Register Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112. But the tors, although their employment was terminable at any time.³

Stipulations authorizing the employer to cancel, annul, forfeit, or revoke the contract under certain specified circumstances have sometimes precedents cited by the learned author show that his statement has reference to the question whether a certain person was the servant of the defendant, or of someone else, and not to the question whether that person was an independent contractor or a servant.

³ United States v. Standard Oil Co. (1919) 258 Fed. 697 (employer was entitled to terminate contract on short notice); Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Luckie v. Diamond Coal Co. (1919) 41 Cal. App. 468, 183 Pac. 178. See also Gall v. Detroit Journal Co. (1916) 191 Mich. 405, 19 A.L.R. 1164, 158 N. W. 36; Wooton v. Dragon Consol. Min. Co. (1919) 54 Utah, 459, 181 Pac. 593.

⁴ For cases in which contracts containing such stipulations were held not to be independent, see Pottorff v. Fidelity Coal Min. Co. (1912) 86 Kan. 774, 122 Pac. 120 (mining company empowered to annul the contract, if the "working of the mine was not agreeable to it"); Speed v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 303 (contract revocable on twenty-four hours' notice, if work was not done to the satisfaction of employer's superintendent); Abromowitz v. Hudson View Constr. Co. (1919) 188 App. Div. 356, 177 N. Y. Supp. 187 (contract terminable if work not done properly); Sipe v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1909) 222 Pa. 400, 71 Atl. 847 (power reserved, by employer to annul and forfeit the contract if work was not done to his satisfaction); West Lumber Co. v. Keen (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 221 S. W. 625 (person employed was subject to discharge for disobedience to orders).

In GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662, the stipulation under review was to this effect: "For failure to prosecute the work with an adequate force, or for noncompliance with his directions in regard to the manner of constructing it, or for failure to complete the work within the time limit, or for other delays in the performance of, or any omission or neglect of the requirements of, the agreement and specification on the been viewed as having a tendency to show that the person employed was a mere servant.⁴ On the other hand, it has frequently been declared or assumed that they do not in any wise affect the independence of a contract.⁵

part of the party of the first part, the said engineer may, at his discretion, declare this contract, or any portion or section of it, forfeited."

In Blake v. Thirst (1863) 2 Hurlst. & C. 20, 159 Eng. Reprint, 9, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 189, 11 Week. Rep. 1034, 8 L. T. N. S. 251, the admission of the employer that he could have dismissed at any time a man engaged under a parol contract, if he was dissatisfied with the execution of the work, was one of the elements upon which the court based its decision that the contract was not an independent one.

⁵ Stipulations with respect to which this position has been taken are the following:

That the employer's engineer might declare the contract forfeited "for noncompliance with his directions in regard to the manner" of doing the work. Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (1899) 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 383.

That, in the event of the work being delayed, the architect supervising the work, as the representative of the employer, shall have the right to employ another person to carry out the contract. Robinson v. Webb (1875) 11 Bush (Ky.) 464.

That, in case of "improper or imperfect performance," the contract may be relet. Kuehn v. Milwaukee (1896) 92 Wis. 263, 65 N. W. 1030, followed in Pioneer Fireproof Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17, affirming (1897) 69 Ill. App. 659, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 16.

That if, at any time, the contractors are not employing men, tools, implements, and machinery, in kind and quantity, to the entire satisfaction of the chief engineer of the company, and necessary, in his opinion, to prosecute the work with due diligence and expedition, . . . the employer shall have the right to declare the contract annulled, after serving notice upon the contractor. Burmeister v. New York Elev. R. Co. (1881) 15 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 264.

That the employer may "terminate the contract immediately," if the contractor fails to prosecute the work with diligence, or to perform any proper directions. Kelley v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1921) 270 Pa. 426, 113 Atl. 419.

But it would seem to be at least an arguable proposition that they are essential elements of a neutral quality as respects their probative signifi-

That the employer's agent "may, at his discretion, for the failure to prosecute the work with an adequate force, or for noncompliance with his instructions in regard to the manner of construction, or for any other omission or neglect of the requirements of this agreement and specifications on the part of the contractors, declare this contract abandoned." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

That if the contractor shall fail to prosecute the work with an adequate force, or to comply with the directions of the engineer in regard to the manner of performing it, or in any other way neglect the requirements of the agreement and specifications, or do any portion of the work in an unfaithful and unworkmanlike manner, the engineer may, at his discretion, declare the contract forfeited. Hughes v. Cincinnati & S. R. Co. (1883) 39 Ohio St. 461.

That the employer's agent may declare the contract forfeited "for non-compliance" with his directions in regard to the manner of performing the work. Thomas v. Altoona & L. Valley Electric R. Co. (Pa.) supra.

That the employer may annul the contract on failure of the contractor to comply with its provisions. Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472.

That the employer's agent may forfeit the contract for imperfect work, and employ, at the expense of the contractor, such force and means as, in his judgment, shall be necessary to complete the work within the time provided for in the contract. Ibid.

That the employer shall be entitled to terminate the contract if the contractor refuses or neglects to supply tools or properly skilled workmen. Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849.

That, if the work is not done by a subcontractor to the satisfaction of the principal employer's engineer, the contract is to be forfeited on two cance, or, in other words, that they do not tend definitely either to prove or to disprove the independence of the contract. There is no little diffidays' notice. Wray v. Evans (1875) 80 Pa. 102. In this case the court said: "As long as Davis [the subcontractor] continued to progress with the work in a manner satisfactory to the engineer of the gas company, Wray had no more power over the work than an entire stranger. Had he volunteered advice as to the care necessary to preserve the public from danger, it would have been to no purpose, as he had no power to enforce it. The matter was out of his hands; he could not assume the control of the work until the subcontract should be forfeited by nonperformance."

The following cases also support the statement in the text:

United States.—Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Turner (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342 (contract was terminable by either party upon fifteen days' notice, or by the company without such notice, upon the failure of the contractor to perform his duties).

California.—Teller v. Bay & River Dredging Co. (1907) 151 Cal. 209, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 267, 90 Pac. 942, 12 Ann. Cas. 779 (the employer, if dissatisfied with the work, might terminate the contract on payment of the amount then due).

Illinois.—Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472 (contract terminable on notice given).

Iowa.—Parrott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1905) 127 Iowa, 419, 103 N. W. 352 (contract might be terminated by the employer's engineer "whenever he shall deem it for the best interests of the company").

Kansas.—Maughlille v. Price (1916) 99 Kan. 412, 161 Pac. 907 (any refusal of the lessee to comply with any provision of the agreement, for five days after his attention was called thereto in writing by the lessor, was to authorize a termination of all rights of the lessee upon ten days' notice).

Minnesota.—Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866 (employer had the right to terminate the contract "whenever, in his opinion, it was necessary or expedient").

Missouri.—Hilsdorf v. St. Louis

culty in finding any satisfactory logical ground upon which it can be maintained that a provision which, by its terms, purports merely to regulate the right of rescission, has a distinct bearing upon the extent of the controlling powers which the employer is entitled to exercise while the work is in course of performance.

§ 27. Employer not entitled to terminate the employment.

The existence of the right of con-

(1869) 45 Mo. 94, 100 Am. Dec. 352 (power reserved to annul the contract).

North Dakota.—Solberg v. Schlosser (1910) 20 N. D. 307, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1111, 127 N. W. 91 (employer reserved right to terminate the contract in case the work was not being done in accordance with the plans).

Oregon.—Scales v. First State Bank (1918) 88 Or. 490, 172 Pac. 499 (employer empowered "to take full control and possession," and to prosecute the work to completion, in the event of the failure of the person employed to comply with any of the terms or conditions of the contract).

Pennsylvania.—Foehr v. New York Short Line R. Co. (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 7 (employer might stop or suspend work for reasons not specified in the contract).

Texas.—Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495 (employer empowered to terminate employment for specified reasons).

West Virginia.—Anderson v. Tug River Coal & Coke Co. (1906) 59 W. Va. 301, 53 S. E. 713 (contract might be canceled, if not duly performed).

In Svolos v. Harry Marsh Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 674, 186 N. Y. Supp. 689, a contract was held independent which contained a stipulation to the effect that, if there was any delay of more than eight hours, except such as might be due to weather conditions, the employer was at liberty to go on and complete the work.

In Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408, the defendant company reserved the right to terminate the contract, if the firm failed or refused for six months to do the amount of work stipulated in the specifications, or if the company had not sufficient funds to justify a continuance of the work; but, in the event of the trolling the person employed in respect of the details of the work normally implies that the employer has also the right to discharge him. Accordingly, the existence of the relation of master and servant is ordinarily negatived, where it appears that the power of discharge was not an incident of the contract.¹ On the ground that an employer invested with the power of terminating the contract at any time is also invested, contracts being terminated without fault on the part of the contractors, the company was to pay for all work completed, and to purchase from the firm at cost all machinery, appliances, tools, materials, etc., on hand.

In Blumb v. Kansas City (1884) 84 Mo. 112, 54 Am. Rep. 87, the court rejected the contention that a conditional clause of the type exemplified in the above cases was to be construed in such a sense that the defendant might be declared liable, as a matter of law, if its agent should be notified that the contractor's men were doing a part of the work in a negligent manner.

In Hopper v. S. S. Ordway & Sons (1911) 157 N. C. 125, 72 S. E. 839, the court, referring to the statement in 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 190, that "the fact that the employer may at any time terminate the employment, though strong evidence that the employee is a mere servant, is not conclusive in that regard," said that it was not applicable to the contract under consideration, because under it "there was no absolute right to terminate the contract at any time, but to put an end to it if the contractor was not performing it according to the stipulations."

¹ Pioneer Fireproof Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17.

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, involving a claim under a Workmen's Compensation Act, the court thus commented on the finding that the employer had the right of discharging the applicant, "and ruling his team off the work," if the services rendered were unsatisfactory: "The conjunctive is very significant. Tittle could not, under the contract, discharge Stevens or dispense with the services of the team. The agreement was not by implication, with the power of obtaining its modification by offering the employee the alternative of consenting to such modification, or of being discharged, it has been held that, where the consent of the employee to certain acts of the employer's agents which amount to an assertion of control over the details of the stipulated work is shown to have been procured by a threat of discharge, the employer is precluded from relying upon the defense that those acts were in violation of the provisions of the contract.²

§ 28. Contract not terminable without the consent of the person employed.

In the case cited below, a person employed under a contract which contained a provision of this tenor was held to be a mere servant.¹ But the precise significance attached to it by the court is not apparent from the report.

§ 29. Employer entitled or not entitled to discharge the workmen hired by the contractor.

(a) Right vested in employer

That the circumstance of the employer's having possessed the right of discharging, by a direct exertion of authority, the servants of the person employed, tends in some degree to prove that that person was not an independent contractor, is a doctrine with regard to which there is apparently no difference of opinion.¹ That thus divisible, and clearly Stevens was not the employee of Tittle."

In Kiser v. Suppe (1908) 133 Mo. App. 19, 112 S. W. 1005, the court used this language: "Not only was he [the contractor] to be paid 'by the piece' instead of by wages,—another important, but not conclusive, fact,—but he was to have full control over the manner of conducting the work, and was to employ, discharge, and pay his assistants. He owed defendants no obedience, and consequently they had no right to discharge him for disobedience. Their right to discontinue the sinking of the shaft, and thereby terminate his employment, was not the legal equivalent of the right to discharge him, and as long as work was conducted by him under the contract, he was a contractor, independent of their control."

²*Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace* (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638. There the contractor resisted the assertion of a power on the part of the officers of the company to require the retention of men whom he desired to discharge, to transfer his servant's men to other work, and to fix the hours of labor.

¹In Bélanger v. Bélanger (1895) 24 Can. S. C. 678, where the relation of the parties was determined with reference to the law of the province of Quebec, A. B. and C. B., who had published a newspaper as partners or joint owners, entered into a new agreement by which A. B. assumed payment of all the debts of the business, and became from that time sole proprietor of the paper, binding himself to continue its publication, and, in case he wished to sell out, to give C. B. the preference. The agreement provided that C. B. should become from the date of the contract director and editor of the newspaper; that his name should appear as such director at the head of the newspaper; that for his services A. B. should allow him a specified sum per annum; and that A. B. could not terminate this engagement without the consent of C. B. After the paper had been published for some time under this agreement as a supporter of a certain political party, C. B., without instructions from or permission of A. B., wrote editorials violently opposing the candidate of that party at an election, and was dismissed from his position on the paper. He then brought an action against A. B., asking for a declaration that he was "redacteur et directeur" of the newspaper, and claiming damages. His contention, that he was in a position of absolute independence with respect to A. B., was pronounced untenable, and it was held that the effect of the agreement was to make him the employee of A. B., as owner of the paper.

¹For cases in which the independence of the contract was negated with relation to evidence which included this element, see Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439; Kinsman v. Hartford Courant Co. (1919) 94 Conn. 156, 108 Atl. 562; Chicago v. Joney (1871) 60 Ill. 383; Indiana Iron Co.

this is the highest probative value which can logically be ascribed to such an element would seem to be the only reasonable position, having regard to the doctrine that the independence of a contract is not necessarily destroyed by the employer's reservation of a right to terminate it at any time. See § 27, supra.² But in the cases cited below the decision seems to have proceeded upon the hypothesis that the element possessed a conclusive significance.³

Testimony to the effect that the em-

v. Cray (1897) 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803; Employers' Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 74, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 850, 160 S. W. 914; Bechnel v. New Orleans, M. & T. R. Co. (1876) 28 La. Ann. 522; Quayle v. Sewerage & Water Bd. (1912) 131 La. 26, 58 So. 1021; Van Simaeys v. George R. Cook Co. (1918) 201 Mich. 540, 167 N. W. 925; Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866; Gray v. Grand River Coal & Coke Co. (1914) 175 Mo. App. 421, 162 S. W. 277; Harmon v. Ferguson Contracting Co. (1912) 159 N. C. 22, 74 S. E. 632; Foehr v. New York Short Line R. Co. (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 7.

In Charles v. Taylor (1878) L. R. 3 C. P. Div. (Eng.) 492, 38 L. T. N. S. 773, 27 Week. Rep. 32, where the person employed was held to be a servant, one of the incidents of the contract was that he selected his workmen, but could not dismiss them without referring the matter to the employer.

In Smith v. Ulen (1914; Alberta Sup. Ct.) 28 West. L. R. 133, 6 West. Week. Rep. 678, 17 D. L. R. 400, it was held that the reservation of a power to suspend any workman for incompetency, drunkenness, negligence, or disregard of orders did not destroy the independence of the contract.

²In Fay v. German General Benev. Soc. (1912) 163 Cal. 118, 124 Pac. 844, the following instruction was held erroneous: "Where the owner of a building has certain work done thereon under another, and pays that other, as his compensation therefor, a percentage upon the cost of labor performed and materials furnished, and the owner pays for the materials used, and pays the men each week to perform the work, and has the power to discharge them, then, in that case, the owner is the master and the men who do the work are the servants of the master or owner, and the person who is thus paid such a percentage as his compensation is only the agent of the owner, and the men who do the work in such a case are the servants of the owner of the building."

In Kniceley v. West Virginia Midland R. Co. (1908) 64 W. Va. 278, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 370, 61 S. E. 811, the court observed, arguendo: "Nor is it more than a mere circumstance, having more or less probative force, that the general employer has not, or has delegated, this power to hire and discharge the men." The view taken in the text is supported in effect by this statement; though, in regarding the situation from the standpoint of a "delegation" of authority, the court has invoked what seems to be an entirely novel conception. It may be remarked, however, that the only two cases cited were Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1896) 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843; and Jackson v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1897) 43 W. Va. 381, 46 L.R.A. 337, 27 S. E. 278, 31 S. E. 258, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 722; and that these involved merely the liability of a master to his servant for the negligence of a superior fellow servant. They have, therefore, no pertinency to the issue raised in cases which turn upon the question whether the immediate employer of the injured person was an independent contractor.

For cases in which contracts reserving the act of discharge were held to be independent, see Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council [1896; C. A.] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 335, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196; United States v. Standard Oil Co. (1919) 258 Fed. 697; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Newland (1917) 176 Ky. 166, 195 S. W. 415; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

³In Borderland Coal Co. v. Small (1914) 160 Ky. 738, 170 S. W. 8, where the defendant company was held liable as master for the death of a helper employed by a headminer, the decision was put upon the ground that the deceased was "in the service of the company, which not only paid him, but, under the evidence, had the ployer's agent discharged, on one occasion, a servant of the contractor, has, manifestly, no tendency to show that this servant and his fellow servants were under the control and direction of the employer, if it also appears that, when he took this step, the agent was acting at the request of the contractor.⁴

(b) Right not vested in employer.

As a matter of abstract theory, it is doubtless possible to conceive of circumstances under which the relationship of master and servant may exist, even though the former does not possess the right of discharging the latter. But as such a right is normally incidental to that relationship, right to discharge him. . . . In such cases the head miner or workman is not an independent contractor, but a servant, whose compensation depends upon the amount of coal he gets out; and while he pays his helpers, their pay is taken out of his pay. And where both are subject to the control of the mine owner, as here, they are equally his servants."

The syllabus of the court in Talimage v. Tift (1920) 25 Ga. App. 639, 104 S. E. 91, is as follows: "Where laborers employed by a contractor are subject to the control of the employer, and may be discharged by the latter, the contractor is, as respects the employment and control of the laborers, not an independent contractor," citing 14 R. C. L. 68.

⁴ Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220.

⁵ The qualifying word "usually" is here introduced, because the right to control the servants of the intermediate employer may be, and often is, absent, where that employer is an agent.

⁶ Crudup v. Schreiner (1901) 98 Ill. App. 337—relying on Pioneer Constr. Co. v. Hansen (1898) 176 Ill. 100, 52 N. E. 17. That case was also cited as a precedent in Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322, where it was laid down that evidence going to show that the defendant company had no power to discharge the driver of a wagon used by his immediate employers in the performance of a contract for the haulage of brick was conclusive evidence which shows that a principal employer did not possess it with respect to the servants hired by the party who undertook to perform the work in question may reasonably be said to afford, in most instances, decisive proof that he was not their master—a conclusion which usually involves, by necessary implication, the further inference that the intermediate employer was an independent contractor.⁶ Such evidence has, in some cases, been viewed as being sufficient of itself to warrant that inference.⁶ In others it has been adverted to in conjunction with other elements which pointed to that inference.⁷

against the theory that the company was responsible for his negligence. But this particular ruling seems to apply merely to the second of the questions discussed, viz., whether, at the time when the plaintiff was injured, the driver was a special servant, pro tempore, of the company. If so, the earlier case was not in point, for it did not involve the question of special service. That question, however, was the one upon which the other authority cited (Consolidated Fireworks Co. v. Koehl (1901) 190 Ill. 145, 60 N. E. 87) actually turned.

In Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 743, the power of discharge was held not to have been conferred by a clause in the contract to the effect that no person or persons objectionable to the principal employer should be hired by the contractor.

⁷ For cases in which the independence of the contract was predicated partly on the ground that the right of discharge was not vested in the principal employee, see Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132; Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. (1904) 122 Iowa, 635, 98 N. W. 482; White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107; Crow v. McAdoo (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 241; Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508 (defendants—here the contractors—selected, employed, and paid the workmen "out of their own funds," and the principal employer could not dismiss them).

In Carleton v. Foundry & Mach.

(c) Bearing of these circumstances upon the question of special temporary service.

The fact that the right to discharge the workman by whom the act constituting the gravamen of the claim was committed was or was not vested in the defendant is relevant with respect to the question whether the workman's position at the time when he committed the act was that of a special servant of the defendant for the purpose of the work then in course of performance, as well as with respect to the question whether his immediate employer was an independent contractor. The former question involves the effect of evidence applicable to a temporary situation; the latter is concerned with the nature of the relationship of the parties during the whole of the period covered by the contract. It may be doubted, however, whether the courts have always written their opinions with a clear realization of the essential dissimilarity of the issues to be determined, according as the evidence is regarded as having a bearing upon the one or the other of these questions.⁸

§ 30. Employer empowered to control the employment and discharge of the workmen.

The preponderance of authority is in favor of the doctrine that the independence of a contract is in nowise affected by the insertion of a provision to the effect that the employer shall have the right to demand and procure the discharge of any of the contractor's workmen who may be disobedient, unskilful, negligent, or in any other way unfit to participate in the work.¹

Products Co. (1917) 199 Mich. 148, 19 A.L.R. 1141, 165 N. W. 816, a finding that the contractee was entitled to hire and discharge the contractor's workmen was held not to be warranted by evidence which merely showed that on one occasion a workman had appeared at the factory of the contractee in an exhausted condition, and that the manager, having inquired what the trouble was, and ascertained that he had been working all night at another factory, allowed him to lie off for the day. The court said: "This act of humanity is not evidence of the right to hire and discharge, and we emphasize the word 'right,' because, as we shall presently see, it is not what control was exercised, but what right of control existed."

In Edmundson v. Coca-Cola Co. (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 273, one of the clauses in the contract required the contractor, after the completion of the work, to submit the bills for material and his pay rolls to the contractee, to be checked and approved. Held, that "the right of approval extended only to the amounts paid for material and work, and could only be construed to give the company the right to disapprove the amounts paid for certain material and work if unreasonable, but cannot be construed to mean that the company would have the right to name the men who were to do the work, or the right to discharge men who were 20 A.L.R.—49.

doing the work, under employment by" the contractor.

⁸ See, for example, Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322, note 6, supra.

¹ In Reedie v. London & N. W. R. Co. (1849) 4 Exch. 244, 154 Eng. Reprint, 1201, 6 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 184, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 65, 19 Eng. Rul. Cas. 168, the plaintiff's contention that, as the defendant was invested by the contract with the power of insisting on the removal of careless or incompetent workmen, it was responsible for their retention, was thus disposed of: "The workman is still the servant of the contractor only, and the fact that the defendants might have insisted on his removal, if they thought him careless or unskilful, did not make him their servant."

For other cases in which contracts including provisions of this tenor were held to be independent, see the following:

United States. — Atlantic Transp. Co. v. Coneys (1897) 28 C. C. A. 388, 61 U. S. App. 570, 82 Fed. 177.

Alabama. — Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co. v. Hubbard (1915) 14 Ala. App. 139, 68 So. 571.

California. — Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 593, 45 Pac. 1017.

Connecticut. — Norwalk Gaslight Co. v. Norwalk (1893) 63 Conn. 495, 28 Atl. 32.

Georgia. — Louisville & N. R. Co. v.

§ 31. Contract not to be assigned or sublet without the employer's permission.

In several cases in which the person employed was held to be a servant, the contract under review embraced a stipulation that no part of the work should be sublet without the Hughes (1910) 134 Ga. 75, 67 S. E. 542.

Illinois.—Bayer v. Chicago, M. & N. R. Co. (1896) 68 Ill. App. 219.

Indiana.—Julius Keller Constr. Co. v. Herkless (1915) 59 Ind. App. 472, 109 N. E. 797.

Louisiana.—Robichaux v. Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. (1912) 131 La. 727, 60 So. 206; Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

Missouri.—Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16; McGrath v. St. Louis (1908) 215 Mo. 191, 114 S. W. 611; McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 449; Ege v. Phoenix Brick & Constr. Co. (1906) 118 Mo. App. 630, 94 S. W. 999.

Nebraska.—Omaha Bridge & Terminal Co. v. Hargadine (1904) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 418, 98 N. W. 1071, s. c. on second appeal, 76 Neb. 729, 107 N. W. 864.

New Jersey.—Cuff v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co. (1870) 35 N. J. L. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 205.

New York.—Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115; Schular v. Hudson River R. Co. (1862) 38 Barb. 653.

North Carolina.—Denny v. Burlington (1911) 155 N. C. 39, 70 S. E. 1085, 3 N. C. C. A. 922 (arguendo); Harmon v. Ferguson Contracting Co. (1912) 159 N. C. 22, 74 S. E. 633.

Pennsylvania.—Foehr v. New York Short Line R. Co. (1909) 40 Pa. Super. Ct. 7.

South Carolina.—Rogers v. Florence R. Co. (1889) 31 S. C. 378, 9 S. E. 1059.

Tennessee.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Texas.—Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Delaney (1900) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 55 S. W. 538.

Utah.—Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863; Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408.

Washington.—Engler v. Seattle (1905) 40 Wash. 72, 82 Pac. 136, 19 Am. Neg. Rep. 49.

England.—Hardaker v. Idle Dist.

Council [1896] 1 Q. B. 335, 35 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196.

Australia.—Smith v. Ulen (1914) — Alberta L. R. —, 17 D. L. R. 400 (decision of single judge).

In one case it was remarked that the fact that the discharge is to be accomplished through a request to the immediate employer of the workman, instead of by the direct act of the principal himself, rather repels than creates the inference that the principal possesses the right to discharge. Harris v. McNamara (1892) 97 Ala. 181, 12 So. 103.

In another case the court, in commenting upon the fact that by the specifications the contractor was required to dismiss from his employment all incompetent or unfaithful persons, said: "In this we may observe that the statement that the city had a general power over the men employed by the contractor is too broad, for the contract is that he shall dismiss from his employment incompetent or unfaithful employees. Herein the fact of his superior and independent control over the workmen is recognized; for, if the city retained this power, why contract with Grant for the doing of that which it could, at any time, do itself." Erie v. Caulkins (1877) 85 Pa. 247, 27 Am. Rep. 642, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 1.

In Callahan Constr. Co. v. Rayburn (1915) 110 Miss. 107, 69 So. 669, the independence of a contract for the construction of a railroad was held to be deducible from stipulations that the crew employed by the contractor on his construction trains should be such as were satisfactory to the company, and that any employees not found satisfactory should be discharged at its request. No precedents were cited.

In the following cases the reservation by the employer of a right to demand the discharge of the contractor's workmen deemed to be unsuitable was one of the elements with reference to which the independence of the contract was denied. Carlton County Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Foley Bros. (1912) 117 Minn. 59, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 175, 134 N. W. 311; Callahan consent of the employer.¹ In other cases the independence of contracts which contained clauses of this purport was affirmed.²

The doctrine for which the cases belonging to the latter of these groups may be regarded as being in some degree authorities,—viz., that such clauses are to be classed among the elements which tend to prove the independence of a contract—derives some support from the consideration that they are very rarely inserted in contracts of hiring of service.

Constr. Co. v. Rayburn (Miss.) supra; Chas. T. Derr Constr. Co. v. Gelruth (1911) 29 Okla. 538, 120 Pac. 253; Pressley v. Sallisaw (1916) 54 Okla. 747, 154 Pac. 660; Cooper v. Seattle (1897) 16 Wash. 462, 58 Am. St. Rep. 46, 47 Pac. 887; North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago M. & P. S. R. Co. (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017.

In Muskogee Electric Traction Co. v. Hairel (1915) 46 Okla. 409, 148 Pac. 1005, the two provisions which were there held to destroy the independence of the contract were (1) that any person in the employ of the contractor or of any subcontractor, who, in the opinion of the contractee, should not perform his work in a proper manner, or be riotous, etc., should forthwith be discharged by the contractor; and (2) that, if there should be any unsatisfied claims for damages to persons or property at the time when the final estimate was made, the contractee should have the right to deduct all sums paid in respect of such claims, from the amount due to the contractor as shown by the final estimate. As the latter of these provisions apparently has no relevancy to the question of the independence of the contract, the decision must apparently be regarded as resting upon the probative significance of the former alone.

¹ Blake v. Thirst (1863) 2 Hurlst. & C. 20, 159 Eng. Reprint, 9, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 189, 11 Week. Rep. 1034, 8 L. T. N. S. 251; Carlton County Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. v. Foley (1912) 117 Minn. 59, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 175, 134 N. W. 311; Corrigan v. Heubler (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 159.

² United States. — Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S.

In one case a clause providing that the person employed should, in the event of his subletting the work, remain liable to the employer as though there had been no subletting, was held to negative the independence of the contract.³ But in another case the independence of a contract which included such a clause was affirmed.⁴

The independence of a contract with a city is not destroyed by the insertion of a clause providing that only persons resident in the city shall be employed by the contractor.⁵

449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342.

District of Columbia. — Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. —.

Illinois. — Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1916) 203 Ill. App. 472.

Kansas. — Maughlille v. Price (1916) 99 Kan. 412, 161 Pac. 907.

Kentucky. — Robinson v. Webb (1875) 11 Bush, 464.

Nebraska. — Omaha Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Hargadine (1904) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 418, 98 N. W. 1071, s. c. on second appeal in (1906) 76 Neb. 729, 107 N. W. 864.

New Jersey. — Cuff v. Newark & N. Y. R. Co. (1870) 35 N. J. L. 17, 10 Am. Rep. 205.

Tennessee. — Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Texas. — Smith v. Humphreyville (1907) 47 Tex. Civ. App. 140, 104 S. W. 495.

In Smith v. Bank of Commerce & T. Co. (1916) 135 Tenn. 398, 18 A.L.R. 788, 186 S. W. 465, a provision against subletting without consent was followed by this clause: If "any portion of the work be let to subcontractors, the contractor covenanted that such subcontractors should be responsible, capable, and reputable persons, and the contractor should remain responsible for the performance of the work, notwithstanding any subcontract."

³ Alabama Western R. Co. v. Talley-Bates Constr. Co. (1909) 162 Ala. 396, 50 So. 341.

⁴ Hayes v. Chicago, O. & P. R. Co. (1917) 203 Ill. App. 472.

⁵ Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411.

§ 32. Party by whom the wages of the contractor's servants paid.

(a) Payment by the contractee.

The circumstance that the wages of the workmen hired by the contractor were paid by the principal employer is regarded as an element which tends,

¹ Alabama. — Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co. v. Hubbard (1915) 14 Ala. App. 139, 68 So. 571.

Arizona. — Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996.

California. — Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co. (1907) 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059.

Connecticut. — Thompson v. Twiss (1916) 90 Conn. 444, L.R.A.1916E, 506, 97 Atl. 328.

Illinois. — Linguist v. Hodges (1911) 248 Ill. 491, 94 N. E. 94.

Indiana. — Marion Shoe Co. v. Epley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220.

Kansas. — Nelson v. American Cement & Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578.

Kentucky. — Ballard & B. Co. v. Lee (1909) 131 Ky. 412, 115 S. W. 732; Employers' Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 74, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 850, 160 S. W. 914.

Massachusetts. — Carey v. Baxter (1909) 201 Mass. 522, 87 N. E. 901.

Minnesota. — Klages v. Gillette Herzog-Mfg. Co. (1902) 86 Minn. 458, 90 N. W. 1116, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 488.

Missouri. — Porter v. Withers Estate Co. (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109.

New York. — Powley v. Vivian & Co. (1915) 169 App. Div. 170, 154 N. Y. Supp. 426, 10 N. C. C. A. 835.

North Carolina. — Midgette v. Branning Mfg. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 333, 64 S. E. 5.

Pennsylvania. — Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

Texas. — Texas Bldg. Co. v. Reed (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 211 (wages paid by checks, signed by principal employer, and countersigned by intermediate employer).

Washington. — Erickson v. E. J. McNeeley & Co. (1906) 41 Wash. 511, 84 Pac. 3; James v. Pearson (1911) 64 Wash. 263, 116 Pac. 852; Fehrenbacher v. Oakesdale Copper Min. Co. (1911) 65 Wash. 134, 117 Pac. 870.

In Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 457, 83 S. E. 740, in some degree, to show that the contractor was himself a mere servant.¹ But it is clearly decisive in that regard.² Such prima facie significance as it possesses may be rebutted by proof that the wages were paid by the principal employer because the contractor was without the necessary funds,³ or where the question of the independence of the contract was held to be for the jury, one of the items of evidence was that the wages of the workmen were deducted from the contract price of the work.

² Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740; White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107; Scales v. First State Bank (1918) 88 Or. 490, 172 Pac. 499; Groesbeck v. Pinson (1899) 21 Tex. Civ. App. 44, 50 S. W. 620 (person employed kept an account of the expenses incurred by him in hiring men and teams, and this amount was paid by the employer after the completion of the work); and the cases cited in the following notes.

In Brown v. Munn Piano Co. (1916) 172 App. Div. 372, 158 N. Y. Supp. 1026, evidence that the employer had agreed to reimburse the person employed, for wages paid to such assistants as he might have was held not to negative the conclusion that the latter was an independent contractor.

In Paterson v. Lockhart (1905) 7 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 954, 42 Scot. L. R. 755; 13 Scot. L. T. 193, this element seems to have been regarded as decisive. If so, the position taken is not in harmony with the cases as a whole.

³ For cases involving this situation, see Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132 (element was mentioned, but not specially discussed); Lawton v. Morgan, Fliedner & Boyce (1913) 66 Or. 292, 131 Pac. 314, 134 Pac. 1037.

In Bain v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. (1909) 223 Pa. 96, 72 Atl. 279, the court thus commented upon certain undisputed evidence which showed that the wages of the men doing the work in question were paid by the defendant company, and not by their immediate employer: "This circumstance, unexplained, would warrant the inference that the contract between defendant and Robinson had been ignored or superseded. The defendant advanced an explanation because the principal employer desired to protect his property against liens.⁴ It becomes, of course, an entirely negligible factor, where the evidence shows that the payment was made with money furnished by the person employed.⁵

wholly consistent with its position that the work was being done by Robinson under the contract when the accident happened. It was this: That Robinson reported to the company that he was without funds to pay the men he had employed, and asked that the company do so, and charge him with the advancement; that rather than have the work fail, or run the risk of liens, the company acceded to his request and paid the men directly. This raised a question of fact which necessarily drew the case to the jury. The explanation rested merely upon oral testimony, which, if believed by the jury, would leave the contract between the defendant and Robinson wholly unaffected by the circumstance that the defendant had paid the wages. If the explanation was a true statement of facts, it was more than sufficient to overcome the inference of an abandonment of the contract from the payment of the wages."

In Harger v. Harger (1920) 144 Ark. 375, 222 S. W. 736, where the evidence showed that the lessor of a mine advanced money to the lessee on his pay roll, and that he put himself on the pay roll covered by such advances, the court said: "This circumstance is without any probative force to establish the fact that appellant Harger was a mere employee, or agent of the coal company in the operation of the mine. It had the right to make advances under its purchases without the transaction being treated as a departure from the terms of the contract, and as a change of its nature."

In Employers' Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 149 Ky. 712, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 963, 149 S. W. 992, the fact that the coal company, with which the immediate employer of an injured miner had made a contract to get out coal at so much a ton, had paid the wages of that miner for the purpose of assisting his immediate employer in his business, was held not to be sufficient of itself to render that miner an "employee" of the coal company, within the meaning of a policy issued by the indemnity company.

(b) Payment by the contractor.

The fact that the wages of the workmen employed by the contractor were paid by him tends to prove that the contract was an independent one.⁶ But it does not possess a

⁴ Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439; Bellamy v. F. A. Ames Co. (1910) 140 Ky. 98, 130 S. W. 980.

⁵ Such rebutting testimony was given in Bokoshe Smokeless Coal Co. v. Morehead (1912) 34 Okla. 424, 126 Pac. 1033.

⁶ For cases in which the element was one of those with reference to which the independence of the contract was predicated, see the following:

Alabama. — Harris v. McNamara (1892) 97 Ala. 181, 12 So. 103; Hubbard v. Coffin (1914) 191 Ala. 494, 67 So. 697; Connors-Weyman Steel Co. v. Kilgore (1914) 189 Ala. 643, 66 So. 609.

Arkansas. — St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Yonley (1890) — Ark. —, 13 S. W. 333.

Connecticut. — Burke v. Norwich & W. R. Co. (1867) 34 Conn. 474, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 662.

Illinois. — Hale v. Johnson (1875) 80 Ill. 185; Whitney & S. Co. v. O'Rourke (1898) 172 Ill. 177, 50 N. E. 242, affirming (1897) 68 Ill. App. 487; East St. Louis v. Giblin (1878) 3 Ill. App. 219; Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322 (holding that the fact of an occasional payment by the principal employer is immaterial, if it is made as an accommodation).

Indiana. — Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220.

Maryland. — Smith v. Benick (1898) 87 Md. 610, 42 L.R.A. 277, 41 Atl. 56.

Michigan. — Lenderink v. Rockford (1904) 135 Mich. 531, 98 N. W. 4; McBride v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co. (1912) 173 Mich. 248, 138 N. W. 1077; Perham v. American Roofing Co. (1916) 193 Mich. 221, 159 N. W. 140.

Missouri. — Crenshaw v. Ullman (1893) 113 Mo. 633, 20 S. W. 1077; Kiser v. Suppe (1908) 133 Mo. App. 19, 112 S. W. 1005; Kipp v. Oyster (1908) 133 Mo. App. 711, 114 S. W. 538; Shroer v. Brooks (1920) 204 Mo. App. 567, 224 S. W. 53.

Nebraska. — Barrett-Selden Brock

conclusive significance in that regard.⁷

(c) Bearing of these circumstances upon the question of special, temporary service.

The circumstance that the wages of the person whose act constitutes the basis of the claim were paid by the contractee, or by the contractor, has also a bearing upon the question whether that person was a servant of the former, or of the latter, at the time when the act was committed. The cases involving this question are Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866.

New Hampshire. — Knowlton v. Hoit (1891) 67 N. H. 155, 30 Atl. 346.

New York. — Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105, 26 N. E. 1017; Kueckel v. Ryder (1900) 54 App. Div. 252, 66 N. Y. Supp. 522, affirmed on opinion below in (1902) 170 N. Y. 562, 62 N. E. 1096; Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525.

Oregon. — Dibert v. Giebisch (1914) 74 Or. 64, 144 Pac. 1184.

Pennsylvania. — Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

South Dakota. — Polluck v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1918) 40 S. D. 186, 166 N. W. 641.

Utah. — Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849.

England. — Normile v. Braby (1866) 4 Fost. & F. 962.

Ireland. — Hughes v. Quinn [1917; C. A.] 2 Ir. R. 442.

Scotland. — Grant v. Shaw (1872; Ct. of Sess.) 9 Sc. L. Rep. 254.

In Smith v. Belshaw (1891) 89 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. 834, the fact that the wages of the contractor's workmen were paid at the store of the principal employer was treated as immaterial, as the money used in paying them was that of the contractor himself.

⁷ In Sempier v. Goemann (1917) 165 Wis. 103, 161 N. W. 354, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 670, a person who had charge of the stipulated work, boarded and paid the workmen, and was himself remunerated at piece rates, was held to be within the purview of a Workmen's Compensation Act, the evidence being to the effect that the arrangement as to the payment of the workmen's wages was "for convenience only."

For cases in which the payment of reviewed, together with others which illustrate the wider subject to which it has relation, in Labatt on Master & Servant, § 19.

§ 33. Contractor bound to furnish the labor required for the work.

Among the specific elements adverted to in many cases in which the independence of the contract has been affirmed is evidence to the effect that the contractor was to furnish all the labor required for the performance of the stipulated work,¹ or that he was the workmen's wages by the contractor was one of the facts proved, but the contract was, upon the whole evidence, held not to be independent, see Raftis v. McCloud River Lumber Co. (1917) 35 Cal. App. 397, 170 Pac. 176; Decatur R. & Light Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 276 Ill. 472, 114 N. E. 915; Beninghoff v. Futterer (1913) 176 Ill. App. 579; Barg v. Bousfield (1896) 65 Minn. 355, 68 N. W. 45, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 188; De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1913) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711; Rankell v. Buckstaff-Edwards Co. (1909) 138 Wis. 448, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1180, 120 N. W. 269.

The contract was held independent in Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 457, 83 S. E. 740, where the wages of the workmen were to be deducted from the contract price.

¹ See, for example:

United States. — Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342.

Arizona. — Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996.

Illinois. — Meredosia Levee & Drainage Dist. v. Industrial Commission (1918) 285 Ill. 68, 120 N. E. 516.

Indiana. — LEET v. BLOCK (reported herewith) ante, 654.

Maryland. — Pierson v. Gohr (1915) 126 Md. 385, 94 Atl. 1021.

Michigan. — Bacon v. Candler (1914) 181 Mich. 373, 148 N. W. 194.

Pennsylvania. — Heidenwag v. Philadelphia (1895) 168 Pa. 72, 31 Atl. 1063; Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508.

England. — Knight v. Fox (1850) 5 Exch. 721, 155 Eng. Reprint, 316, 20 L. J. Exch. N. S. 9, 14 Jur. 963; Bobbey v. W. M. Crosbie & Co. (1915; C. A.) 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 856, 112 L. T.

to hire the persons who assisted him in the performance of the work.²

It is apparent, therefore, that the arrangement indicated by either of these forms of expression—which, it is obvious, are, for practical purposes, of identical import—is one of the facts which is regarded as having some tendency to prove the independence of the contract. On the other hand, it is not conclusive in that regard.³

In one point of view the prima facie significance of this element is, it may be supposed, suggested by the general idea which underlies the attribution of a similar significance to the fact that the person employed is to furnish the instrumentalities of the work; viz., that in the ordinary course of business independent contractors hire their own assistants. In another point of view that significance may be referred to the consideration that a person who hires assistants for the purposes of work undertaken by him normally exercises over them that degree of control which is associated with the relationship of master and servant. The normality of this situation seems to afford an adequate basis for a presumption that such assistants are his own servants exclusively, and, if such a presumption is admitted, the further one may reasonably be said to arise that he himself

N. S. 900, 8 B. W. C. C. 236; Barnes v. Evans [1914; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 109, 7 B. W. C. C. 24.

² California. — Teller v. Bay & R. Dredging Co. (1907) 151 Cal. 209, 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) 267, 90 Pac. 942, 12 Ann. Cas. 779.

Connecticut. — Burke v. Norwich & W. R. Co. (1867) 34 Conn. 474, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 662; Aisenberg v. C. F. Adams Co. (1920) 95 Conn. 419, 111 Atl. 591.

Illinois. — Whitney & S. Co. v. O'Rourke (1898) 172 Ill. 177, 50 N. E. 242.

Iowa. — Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. (1904) 122 Iowa, 635, 98 N. W. 482.

Louisiana. — Lutenbacher v. Mitchell Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888; Ryland v. Harve M. Wheeler Lumber Co. (1920) 146 La. 787, 84 So. 55.

Michigan. — Holbrook v. Olympia Hotel Co. (1916) 200 Mich. 597, 166 N. W. 876.

Missouri. — McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 449; Kiser v. Suppe (1908) 133 Mo. App. 19, 112 S. W. 1005.

New York. — Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; App. T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525; Peer v. Babcock (1920) 230 N. Y. 109, 129 N. E. 224, reversing (1919) 187 App. Div. 925, 174 N. Y. Supp. 914.

North Carolina. — Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 457, 83 S. E. 740; Vogh v. F. C. Geer Co. (1916) 171 N. C. 672, 88 S. E. 874.

Virginia. — Veitch v. Jenkins (1907) 107 Va. 68, 67 S. E. 574.

England. — Vamplew v. Parkgate

Iron & Steel Co. [1903] 1 K. B. 851, 72 L. J. K. B. N. S. 575, 67 J. P. 417, 51 Week. Rep. 691, 88 L. T. N. S. 756, 19 Times L. R. 421.

³ So laid down in Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996, and taken for granted in the other cases cited in notes 1 and 2, supra.

In Beninghoff v. Futterer (1913) 176 Ill. App. 579, a man employed to lay a roof testified that he frequently did this kind of work for the employer, sometimes "as an employee," and at other times "by contract." The only evidence from which it might be inferred that he laid this particular roof by contract, and not by day labor, was that he hired and paid the roofers, and that he was given no other directions as to the manner of doing the work than to make a good job of it. On the other hand, the materials used belonged to the employer, and it was alleged in the declaration, and not denied by any special plea, that the "defendants" were in possession and control of the premises at the time of the accident. Held, that the person employed was not an independent contractor.

For other cases in which the relationship created by a contract which included a stipulation of this tenor was held to be that of master and servant, see Keyes v. Second Baptist Church (1904) 99 Me. 308, 59 Atl. 446, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 526; American Steel Foundries v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 284 Ill. 99, 119 N. E. 902; Nissen Transfer & Storage Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 652.

is not the servant of any third person.⁴

§ 34. Contractor bound to furnish the materials and appliances required for the work.

A doctrine complementary to that which is stated in the preceding section is that evidence which shows that the person employed agreed to furnish all or a portion of the materials or appliances required for the performance of the stipulated work tends to prove that he was an independent contractor.¹ But such evidence is disregarded in cases where the appropriate deduction from the

⁴ The following passage of the opinion in Callan v. Bull (1896) 113 Cal. 598, 45 Pac. 1017, is somewhat relevant in this connection, though the standpoint of the court is not exactly that which is suggested in the text: "Unless, by the contract, this right is reserved to the employer, the contractor will be presumed to have the right of selection and control of all whom he employs. . . . The contract in the present case does not contain any provision by which the appellant was deprived of the power to employ such persons for the performance of the work as he might select. By the contract he was to supply all the materials, and perform all the labor necessary to construct the jetty according to the specifications, . . . and he himself testified that he employed all the laborers engaged in the work, and furnished all the materials."

¹ For cases involving contracts which cast this obligation on the person employed, and which were held upon the whole evidence to be independent, see the following:

United States. — New Orleans, M. & C. R. Co. v. Hanning (1872) 15 Wall. 649, 21 L. ed. 220; Morning v. Cramp & Co. (1909) 170 Fed. 364; United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 105 C. C. A. 486, 182 Fed. 620; The Satilla (1916) 148 C. C. A. 552, 235 Fed. 58; International Agri. Corp. v. Slappey (1919) 261 Fed. 279.

Alabama. — Harris v. McNamara (1892) 97 Ala. 181, 12 So. 103; Connors-Weyman Steel Co. v. Kilgore (1914) 189 Ala. 643, 66 So. 609; Hubbard v. Coffin (1914) 191 Ala. 494, 67 So. 697.

California. — Green v. Soule (1904) 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 8; Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715.

Colorado. — Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439.

District of Columbia. — Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. —.

Indiana. — Indianapolis Northern Traction Co. (1909) 174 Ind. 1, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 85, 87 N. E. 215, 90 N. E. 65, 68, 91 N. E. 503; Marion Shoe Co. v. Eppley (1914) 181 Ind. 219, 104 N. E. 65, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 220; Switow v. McDougal (1916) 184 Ind. 259, 111 N. E. 3; Julius Keller Constr. Co. v. Herkless (1915) 59 Ind. App. 472, 109 N. E. 797.

Iowa. — STORM v. THOMPSON (reported herewith) ante, 658.

Kansas. — Maughlille v. Price (1916) 99 Kan. 412, 161 Pac. 907.

Kentucky. — Central Coal & I. Co. v. Grider (1903) 115 Ky. 745, 65 L.R.A. 455, 74 S. W. 1058.

Louisiana. — Robideaux v. Hebert (1907) 118 La. 1089, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632, 43 So. 887.

Maryland. — Smith v. Benick (1898) 87 Md. 610, 42 L.R.A. 277, 41 Atl. 56.

Massachusetts. — Connors v. Hennessey (1873) 112 Mass. 96; Harding v. Boston (1898) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411.

Missouri. — McKinley v. Chicago, S. F. & C. R. Co. (1890) 40 Mo. App. 449.

Nebraska. — Westover v. Hoover (1911) 88 Neb. 201, 19 A.L.R. 215, 125 N. W. 285, 3 N. C. C. A. 471; Barrett v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866.

New York. — Litts v. Risley Lumber Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 321, 19 A.L.R. 1147, 120 N. E. 730, reversing (1918) 184 App. Div. 919, 170 N. Y. Supp. 1093; Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; App. T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525; Hungerford v. Bonn (1918) 183 App. Div. 818, 171 N. Y. Supp. 280; Svolos v. Harry Marsch & Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 674, 186 N. Y. Supp. 689.

Oregon. — Lawton v. Morgan, Flidner & Boyce (1913) 66 Or. 292, 131 Pac. 314, 134 Pac. 1037.

Pennsylvania. — Miller v. Merritt (1905) 211 Pa. 127, 60 Atl. 508; Bain v. Petroleum Iron Works Co. (1909) 223 Pa. 96, 27 Atl. 279.

Tennessee. — Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Texas. — Southwestern Teleg. &

facts as a whole is that full control over the details of the work had been reserved by the employer.²

§ 35. Contractor bound to furnish both the labor and appliances.

Both of the facts mentioned in the Teleph. Co. v. Paris (1905) 39 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 87 S. W. 724.

Utah.—Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863.

Virginia.—Veitch v. Jenkins (1907) 107 Va. 69, 57 S. E. 574.

Washington. — CAMPBELL v. JONES (reported herewith) ante, 671.

Wisconsin. — Whitney v. Clifford (1879) 46 Wis. 138, 32 Am. Rep. 703, 49 N. W. 835.

England.—Allen v. Hayward (1845) 7 Q. B. 960, 115 Eng. Reprint, 749, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 99, 10 Jur. 92, 4 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 104 (machinery and materials).

Ireland. — Hughes v. Quinn [1917; C. A.] 2 Ir. R. 442 (tackle for sinking well).

Scotland. — Grant v. Shaw (1872; Ct. of Sc. Sess.) 9 Sc. L. Rep. 254, and the cases cited in note 3 of the preceding section.

For cases in which persons engaged in transportation work furnished their own vehicles and the teams or other motive power, see the following:

California. — Barton v. Studebaker Corp. (1920) — Cal. App. —, 189 Pac. 1025.

Indiana.—Zeitlow v. Smock (1917) 65 Ind. App. 643, 117 N. E. 665; Sugar Valley Coal Co. v. Drake (1917) 66 Ind. App. 152, 117 N. E. 937.

Iowa.—Pace v. Appanoose County (1918) 184 Iowa, 498, 168 N. W. 916, 17 N. C. C. A. 682.

Louisiana. — Muldry v. Fromherz (1917) 142 La. 1087, 78 So. 126; Ryland v. Harve M. Wheeler Lumber Co. (1920) 146 La. 787, 84 So. 55.

Massachusetts. — Eckert's Case (1919) 233 Mass. 577, 124 N. E. 421; Centrello's Case (1919) 232 Mass. 456, 122 N. E. 560; Robichaud's Case (1919) 234 Mass. 60, 124 N. E. 890.

Michigan.—Burns v. Michigan Paint Co. (1908) 152 Mich. 613, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 816, 116 N. W. 182; Sawtells v. Ekenberg Co. (1919) 206 Mich. 246, 172 N. W. 581.

New York. — Hopkins v. Empire Engineering Corp. (1912) 152 App. Div. 570, 137 N. Y. Supp. 478.

Ireland.—Ryan v. Tipperary, South Riding County Council (1912; C. A.) 46 Ir. L. T. 69, 5 B. W. C. C. 578; Clarke v. Bailieborough Co-op A. & D. Soc. (1913; C. A.) 47 Ir. L. T. 113.

In the following cases, some of the appliances were furnished by the employer, and some by the contractor; Industrial Commission v. Maryland Casualty Co. (1918) 65 Colo. 279, 176 Pac. 288; Mayhew v. Sullivan Min. Co. (1884) 76 Me. 100; Kiser v. Suppe (1908) 133 Mo. App. 19, 112 S. W. 1005; Central Coal & I. Co. v. Grider (1903) 115 Ky. 745, 65 L.R.A. 455, 74 S. W. 1058.

One of the elements in a case where the person employed was held to be an independent contractor was that worn-out machinery was to be replaced by the employer, but that the expense of installing it should be borne by the contractor. Ziebell v. Eclipse Lumber Co. (1903) 33 Wash. 591, 74 Pac. 680, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 457.

In Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721, the court, referring to the fact that the person employed drove his own team, said that it "saw nothing in this fact which made him a servant, and not a contractor." Considering that such a fact is generally regarded as having a positive tendency to show that the person employed was an independent contractor, the form of this remark is somewhat curious.

In Gay v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. (1908) 148 N. C. 336, 62 S. E. 436, a provision of a logging contract held to be independent was that the tramroads were to be built, and the locomotive and cars to be kept in good working order, at the contractor's expense.

² For examples of such cases see the following:

Alabama.—Drennen v. Smith (1896) 115 Ala. 396, 22 So. 442.

California.—Skell Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1920) — Cal. App. —, 186 Pac. 163.

Kentucky.—Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Murrell (1918) 180 Ky. 52, L.R.A. 1918D, 357, 201 S. W. 462.

Maine.—Keyes v. Second Baptist Church (1904) 99 Me. 308, 59 Atl. 446, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 526.

Michigan.—Opitz v. Hoertz (1917) 194 Mich. 626, 161 N. W. 866.

Missouri.—Porter v. Withers Estate Co. (1919) 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109.

Texas.—Steger v. Barrett (1910) 58 Tex. Civ. App. 331, 124 S. W. 174.

Wisconsin. — Whitney v. Clifford preceding sections are quite commonly mentioned together, in cases in which the independence of the contract was affirmed.¹

The probative force of the two in combination is presumably somewhat greater than that of each of them singly. But the cases do not throw any light upon this particular point.

(1879) 46 Wis. 188, 32 Am. Rep. 703, 49 N. W. 835.

Ireland. — Moroney v. Sheehan (1903; C. A.) 87 Ir. L. T. 166; Clarke v. Bailieborough Co-op. A. & D. Soc. (1913; C. A.) 47 Ir. L. T. 113.

In De Perri v. Motor Haulage Co. (1918) 185 App. Div. 384, 173 N. Y. Supp. 189, the circumstance that the trucks which a haulage contractor agreed to furnish for an indefinite period were to be paid for, whether in use or not, was regarded as an element which tended to negative the independence of the contract.

In Boniface v. Relyea (1866) 6 Robt. (N. Y.) 397, the fact that a man engaged by an undertaker to drive a carriage at a funeral was the owner of the carriage and horses which he brought seems to have been regarded as conclusive proof that he was not the servant of the undertaker. If this was really the theory of the court, it was manifestly erroneous.

¹ See, for example:

United States. — United States v. Driscoll (1877) 96 U. S. 421, 24 L. ed. 847 (a case involving a workman's claim for extra compensation).

Alabama. — Harris v. McNamara (1892) 97 Ala. 181, 12 So. 103.

Arizona. — Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740.

California. — Boswell v. Laird (1857) 8 Cal. 469, 68 Am. Dec. 345, 10 Mor. Min. Rep. 616; Green v. Soule (1904) 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 8.

District of Columbia. — Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Karr (1912) 38 App. D. C. 193, — A.L.R. —; Harrison v. Davis Constr. Co. (1914) 42 App. D. C. 255.

Illinois. — Bjornson v. Saccone (1899) 88 Ill. App. 6; Fell v. Chicago Bldg. & Special Constr. Co. (1914) 187 Ill. App. 286; Raxworthy v. Heisen (1915) 191 Ill. App. 457, 8 N. C. C. A. 819, affirmed in (1916) 274 Ill. 398, 113 N. E. 699.

§ 36. Employer bound to furnish the materials and appliances required for the work.

In many of the cases in which the relationship of master and servant was held to have been created by the contract, one of the specific elements mentioned was that the employer furnished the materials or appliances re-

Indiana. — Switow v. McDougal (1916) 184 Ind. 259, 111 N. E. 3; Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1915) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477.

Iowa. — Bennett v. Mt. Vernon (1904) 124 Iowa, 537, 100 N. W. 349; Parrott v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1905) 127 Iowa, 419, 103 N. W. 352.

Louisiana. — Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888.

Maine. — Wilbur v. White (1903) 98 Me. 191, 56 Atl. 657, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 311.

Maryland. — Symons v. Allegany County (1907) 105 Md. 254, 65 Atl. 1067.

Michigan. — Bacon v. Candler (1914) 181 Mich. 372, 148 N. W. 194.

Missouri. — Scharff v. Southern Illinois Constr. Co. (1905) 115 Mo. App. 157, 92 S. W. 126.

Nebraska. — Westover v. Hoover (1911) 88 Neb. 201, 19 A.L.R. 215, 129 N. W. 285, 3 N. C. C. A. 471; Barrett v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866.

New York. — Martin v. Tribune Asso. (1883) 30 Hun, 391; Carpenter v. New York (1906) 115 App. Div. 552, 101 N. Y. Supp. 402; Coolidge v. State (1908; Ct. Cl.) 61 Misc. 38, 114 N. Y. Supp. 553.

Oregon. — Lawton v. Morgan, Fliedner & Boyce (1913) 66 Or. 292, 131 Pac. 314, 134 Pac. 1037; Winniford v. MacLeod (1913) 68 Or. 301, 136 Pac. 25; Dibert v. Giebisch (1914) 74 Or. 64, 144 Pac. 1184.

Pennsylvania. — Blattenberger v. Little Schuylkill Nav. R. & Coal Co. (1839) 2 Miles, 309; Allen v. Willard (1868) 57 Pa. 374.

Tennessee. — Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Utah. — Morris v. Salt Lake City (1909) 35 Utah, 474, 101 Pac. 373.

Washington. — Cary v. Sparkman & M. Co. (1911) 62 Wash. 363, — A.L.R. —, 113 Pac. 1093.

quired for the stipulated work.¹ That fact, therefore, is one of those which are to be regarded as having to prove that the person employed was not an

¹ See, for example:

United States.—Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rahen (1889) 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175 (wagon for salesman); Nyback v. Champagne Lumber Co. (1901) 48 C. C. A. 632, 109 Fed. 732 (person employed operated in a factory a machine which the employer kept in running order at his own cost, and for which he furnished the necessary power); Standard Oil Co. v. Parkinson (1907) 82 C. C. A. 29, 152 Fed. 681 (wagon for salesman).

Alabama.—Sloss-Sheffield Steel & Iron Co. v. Hubbard (1915) 14 Ala. App. 139, 68 So. 571; Stith Coal Co. v. Harris (1915) 14 Ala. App. 181, 68 So. 797.

Arkansas.—Homewood Rice Land Syndicate v. Suhs (1920) 142 Ark. 619, 219 S. W. 333; Terry Dairy Co. v. Parker (1920) 144 Ark. 401, 223 S. W. 6.

California.—Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co. (1907) 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059 (machinery in factory).

Connecticut.—Corbin v. American Mills (1858) 27 Conn. 275, 71 Am. Dec. 63, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 735; Aisenberg v. C. F. Adams Co. (1920) 95 Conn. 419, 111 Atl. 591 (salesman furnished with blank forms for various purposes).

Georgia.—Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. O'Hara (1872) 46 Ga. 417.

Illinois.—American Steel Foundries v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 284 Ill. 99, 119 N. E. 902.

Indiana.—Indiana Iron Co. v. Gray (1897) 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 803 (machinery in factory); Caca v. Woodruff (1919) 70 Ind. App. 93, 123 N. E. 120; Nissen Transfer & Storage Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 652; Greene County v. Shertzer (1920) — Ind. App. —, 127 N. E. 843.

Iowa.—Kelleher v. Schmitt & H. Mfg. Co. (1904) 122 Iowa, 635, 98 N. W. 482 (room and machinery in factory).

Kansas.—Nelson v. American Cement Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578 (mules used in mining work).

Kentucky.—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Tow (1901) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 408, 66 L.R.A. 941, 63 S. W. 27 (engine used to haul cars in tunnel under construction was supplied by railroad company); Employers' Indemnity Co. v. Kelly Coal Co. (1913) 156 Ky. 74, 49

L.R.A. (N.S.) 850, 160 S. W. 914 (cars and mules used in mining work).

Louisiana.—Brady v. Jay (1904) 111 La. 1071, 36 So. 132 (logging contractor was to be furnished with railroad and rolling stock, and keep them in repair, and defray all the expenses of operating the road).

Michigan.—Lewis v. Detroit Vitri-fied Brick Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 489, 129 N. W. 726 (cars and track furnished to miners); Perham v. American Roofing Co. (1916) 193 Mich. 221, 159 N. W. 140; Bayne v. Everham (1917) 197 Mich. 181, 163 N. W. 1002.

Minnesota.—Barg v. Bousfield (1896) 65 Minn. 355, 68 N. W. 45, 16 Am. Neg. Cas. 188; Brown v. Douglas Lumber Co. (1910) 113 Minn. 67, 129 N. W. 161 (machinery in sawmill); Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866 (tools and materials for erection of building).

Montana.—Poor v. Madison River Power Co. (1909) 38 Mont. 341, 99 Pac. 947 (materials for alteration of structure).

New York.—Benedict v. Martin (1862) 36 Barb. 288; Goldman v. Mason (1888; Gen. T.) 18 N. Y. S. R. 376, 2 N. Y. Supp. 337.

North Carolina.—Midgette v. Branning Mfg. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 333, 64 S. E. 5 (mill which person employed agreed to operate, and logs sawed therein, were the property of employer); Embler v. Gloucester Lumber Co. (1914) 167 N. C. 457, 83 S. E. 740 (materials for building).

North Dakota.—Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. (1912) 23 N. D. 6, L.R.A. 1918C, 1063, 135 N. W. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 680 (tools used in construction of telephone line).

Ohio.—Andrew Bros. v. Burns (1901) 12 Ohio C. D. 305, 22 Ohio C. C. 437 (machinery in factory).

Oklahoma.—Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1915) 47 Okla. 161, 148 Pac. 103 (tools for handling coal).

Texas.—Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638 (machinery furnished by employer and operated by power supplied by him).

Vermont.—Kelley's Dependents v. Hoosac Lumber Co. (1921) — Vt. —, 113 Atl. 818, 20 N. C. C. A. 902.

Virginia.—Emmerson v. Fay (1896) 94 Va. 60, 26 S. E. 386.

independent contractor. But such probative significance as it possesses is manifestly overcome, whenever the rest of the evidence points to the conclusion that the employer was not to exercise any control over the details of the work.²

It is, of course, an entirely negli-

Washington. — James v. Pearson (1911) 64 Wash. 263, 116 Pac. 852 (hoisting machinery used for building work); Fehrenbacher v. Oakesdale Copper Min. Co. (1911) 65 Wash. 134, 117 Pac. 870 (tools and machinery).

Wisconsin. — Rankel v. Buckstaff-Edwards Co. (1909) 138 Wis. 448, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1180, 120 N. W. 269 (materials for building).

England. — Blake v. Thirst (1863) 2 Hurlst. & C. 20, 159 Eng. Reprint, 9, 32 L. J. Exch. N. S. 189, 11 Week. Rep. 1034, 8 L. T. N. S. 251 (bricks furnished to subcontractor); Evans v. Penwyllt Dinas Silica Brick Co. (1901; C. A.) 18 Times L. R. 58 (tools for quarrying).

Ireland. — M'Connell v. Galbraith (1913; C. A.) 48 Ir. L. T. 30, 7 B. W. C. C. 968 (traps furnished to trapper).

Scotland. — M'Cready v. Dunlop (1900) 2 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 1027, 37 Scot. L. R. 779, 8 Scot. L. T. 91.

In Vaughn v. Davis (1920) — Mo. App. —, 221 S. W. 782, the grounds upon which the defendants were held not to be independent contractors as regards the delivery of beer were thus stated: "They were delivering the brewery company's beer, stored, refrigerated, and preserved at the latter's expense, selling it at a price fixed by the brewery company, distributing it in a vehicle owned and furnished by the company, kept in accordance with its directions and at its expense, and insured for its benefit, not only as against loss on the truck itself, but also against liability on account of the truck's operation. If Davis & Sons were operating the truck of themselves, and independently of the brewery company's business, why was the indemnity insurance for operation taken out in favor of the brewery company, and why should the brewery company bear that expense and insist upon being insured? It is not clear just how the expenses, which it is conceded the brewery company bore, were paid, whether they were actually paid by the brewery company itself or through Davis & Sons, the expenses being deducted from the amounts due. At one place Davis said the driver was employed 'through' their firm. If the conceded expenses were paid by Davis & Sons, and credit was taken against the brewery company for them, it is remarkable that the expense of the driver was not taken care of in the same way. But if it was the brewery company's beer that was being delivered, and its business that was being carried on thereby, then the driver was its agent or servant, even though the driver may have been employed and paid by Davis & Sons, and they directed him, as they naturally would, where to deliver."

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1907) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902, a supplemental contract regarding excavation work on a railroad provided as follows: "The railroad agrees to furnish necessary rails, splices, switches, and frogs for temporary track to be used in connection with steam-shovel work, without charge to the contractors." In the opinion of the court this stipulation did not throw any light upon the nature of the relationship. But, in view of the cases cited above, this ruling is of more than dubious soundness.

² The independence of the contract has frequently been affirmed, in cases in which this element was present.

United States. — Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342 (tools).

Arkansas. — Arkansas Land & Lumber Co. v. Secrist (1915) 118 Ark. 561, 177 S. W. 37 (materials).

Colorado. — Industrial Commission v. Maryland Casualty Co. (1918) 65 Colo. 279, 176 Pac. 288 (materials).

Connecticut. — Burke v. Norwich & W. R. Co. (1867) 34 Conn. 474, 13 Am. Neg. Cas. 662 (machinery).

Indiana. — Nissen Transfer & Storage Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 652 (horses, feed, and wagons).

Kansas. — Chute v. Moeser (1908) 77 Kan. 706, 95 Pac. 398 (materials).

Kentucky. — Bellamy v. F. A. Ames Co. (1910) 140 Ky. 98, 130 S. W. 980 (materials); White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107.

Louisiana. — Robideaux v. Hebert (1907) 118 La. 1089, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 632, 43 So. 887 (tools and other appliances).

ble factor where the evidence shows that the instrumentalities procured from the employer were bought for the purposes of the work by the person employed.²

§ 37. Employer's surrender or retention of the control of the place of work.

(a) Control surrendered.

The circumstance that the premises

Minnesota. — Klages v. Gillette-Herzog Mfg. Co. (1902) 86 Minn. 458, 90 N. W. 1116, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 488.

New York. — Litts v. Risley Lumber Co. (1918) 224 N. Y. 321, 19 A.L.R. 1147, 120 N. E. 730; Powley v. Vivian & Co. (1915) 169 App. Div. 170, 154 N. Y. Supp. 426, 10 N. C. C. A. 835 (fuel, oil, etc.)

North Carolina. — Vogh v. F. C. Geer Co. (1916) 171 N. C. 672, 88 S. E. 874 (machinery, etc.)

Virginia.—Veitch v. Jenkins (1907) 107 Va. 68, 57 S. E. 574 (materials, etc.).

Scotland. — Hayden v. Dick (1902) 5 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 152, 40 Scot. L. R. 95, 10 Scot. L. T. 380.

In Lampton v. Cedartown Co. (1909) 6 Ga. App. 147, 64 S. E. 495, the fact that the owner of a building furnished all the materials for its construction was referred to as being "not inconsistent" with the inference that the building contract was an independent one.

In Connolly v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 405, 160 Pac. 239, where the unsuccessful claimant under a Workmen's Compensation Act had been employed to build a shed, the court declared that there was "no force in the suggestion that, because the owner of the real property was to furnish the lumber, there was probably no contract except that for labor by the day; contracts are often made for sufficient labor to accomplish specific results with materials furnished by the person on whose property those results are to be produced."

In Ennis v. Baumann Rubber Co. (1917) 91 Conn. 425, 99 Atl. 1031, the court thus commented upon the instructions given by the trial judge: "The jury was told that if the agreement for the digging of the well was, as the plaintiff claimed it to have been, that he should simply do the work, and that the defendant should furnish all the tools, appliances, and materials, on which the stipulated work was performed were, for the purposes of such performance, placed under the control of the person employed, is an element which tends to show that he was an independent contractor.¹ But it will be disregarded if the evidence, as a whole, is such as to require the conclusion that the contract was one of the relation of master and servant was created. This instruction was supplemented by further statements to the same effect, so that the jury was clearly informed that, if the contract to sink the well contained an undertaking on the part of the defendant to furnish the tools, appliances, and materials required for the work, that fact would suffice to convert it into one of employment, and the relation of the parties under it into that of master and servant. This was erroneous, in that the vital and controlling factor of the defendant's right of control, or the lack of it, was ignored, and a comparatively immaterial incident made conclusive."

¹ For a case involving this situation, see Bokoshe Smokeless Coal Co. v. Morehead (1912) 34 Okla. 424, 126 Pac. 1033.

² Scammon v. Chicago (1861) 25 Ill. 424, 79 Am. Dec. 334; Jefferson v. Jameson & M. Co. (1896) 165 Ill. 138, 46 N. E. 272, reversing (1895) 60 Ill. App. 587; Allen v. Willard (1868) 57 Pa. 374; Kniceley v. West Virginia Midland R. Co. (1908) 64 W. Va. 278, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 370, 61 S. E. 811; Eastern Townships Bank v. DeKérangat (1907) Rap. Jud. Quebec 17 B. R. 232.

In Byrnes v. Western (1896) 17 New South Wales L. R. 80, the defendants sold at public auction the building materials of a house then standing. By the terms of sale the building materials became the property of the purchaser, who contracted under a penalty to pull them down and cart them away within two months, leaving the site cleared to the satisfaction of the vendor. One B. became the purchaser for the sum of £10. In pulling down the house he negligently caused injury to the adjoining house, by throwing bricks and rubbish onto it, and omitting to prop it up while the work was in progress. By Stowell, Ch. J., and Cowen, J., it was held that the contract was one essentially of sale, hiring and service, or agency.² Its probative significance is a proper subject for consideration, irrespective of whether the right of control so vested was or was not exclusive.³ Nor is the relationship of the parties affected by the employer's reservation of a right to enter the premises for the

which transferred to B., for the time being, the ownership of the house, and that, while he was engaged in the demolition and removal of the building, he, and he alone, had all the responsibilities incident to ownership. By Stephen, J., it was considered that the essential effect of the contract was that the contractor agreed to pull down the house and take away the materials, and that the sale and purchase of the materials were simply an incident in the contract, and the method of paying for the work done. The conclusion at which he arrived, therefore, was that the defendants were liable, for the reason that the contract was one likely to be dangerous to the adjacent owner.

² In Samyn v. McClosky (1853) 2 Ohio St. 536, where a man employed to erect a building on the terms that he was to hire the workmen and indorse their bills, who had also undertaken to do the carpentry "at 27 cents on the bill," was held to be an independent contractor only in respect of the carpentry, and the employer's agent in respect of his other functions, the court remarked: "The so-called possession of Cameron was as the agent of Samyn, or, rather, he occupied the premises as mechanics usually do when making improvements. Dignifying a mere license thus to occupy, by calling it a surrender of possession, will not serve to avoid responsibility."

³ It is error to charge the jury that, in forming an opinion as to whether the employee was a servant or an independent contractor, they should inquire whether the contract "gave exclusive use and right to the contractor over the place," and how long this exclusive use and right were to continue. Conlin v. Charleston (1868) 49 S. C. L. (15 Rich.) 201.

In Bibb v. Norfolk & W. R. Co. (1891) 87 Va. 711, 14 S. E. 163, where it was contended that the right reserved by a railroad company to run its trains over a bridge during its construction by a contractor destroyed the independent contractor, without the court remarked that this amounted to an assertion of the doctrine that a railroad company or private individual cannot, in the one case, build its road or other structures, or repair either, and, in the other, the owner of property cannot build a house thereon, or repair one, by the intervention of an independent contractor, without the entire surrender of the possession and use of the property to such contractor; and that, if such surrender be not made, then the employer is liable for any injury to another resulting from the negligent or tortious act of any agent or servant of the contractor. "The recognition of any such principle," it was declared, "would not only lead to the most absurd results, but would be to foster gross injustice and oppression. . . . In every such case the question is not whether the owner or proprietor retained any use of the property during the erection of the work, but who had the efficient control of the work contracted to be done. Such control, in cases like the present, is necessarily with the contractor; and, were it otherwise, independent employment would be degraded, its liability in a great measure destroyed, and the general efficiency of railroad service correspondingly impaired. Hence, the books teem with decided cases in which defendants were held not liable for torts committed on their premises by contractors, or their agents or servants, although there had not been an entire surrender of the possession of the premises to the contractor."

In Rome & D. R. Co. v. Chasteen (1889) 88 Ala. 591, 7 So. 94, the court was equally divided in opinion upon the question whether undisputed evidence to the effect that the tort-feasor was engaged in building the road, and was in possession of and using the engine and cars, for the transportation of rails and crossties, and of freight and passengers, and that he employed and paid the workmen, was prima facie sufficient to show that the tort-feasor was an independent contractor.

That the contract is not the less an independent one, because the employer has that power of interference which is derived from "that reversionary right which is necessarily reserved to every owner of land," was remarked, arguendo, in Schweickhardt v. St. Louis (1876) 2 Mo. App. 571.

purpose of seeing that the work is performed in accordance with the plans and specifications. Under such circumstances the person employed still remains in possession of the premises, and continues to perform the work under his contract, and not under the directions of the employer.⁴

The cases in which the effect of the employer's surrender of control has been discussed from the point of view indicated in the preceding paragraph ⁴ Pfau v. Williamson (1872) 63 Ill. 16.

⁵ In Moore v. Sanborne (1853) 2 Mich. 579, 59 Am. Dec. 209, two of the classes of cases in which the rule of respondeat superior is not applicable were thus specified: (1) Where a contract is made with another in respect of services upon property, when no power of direction or supervision is reserved by the principal, but the entire discretion as to the mode of execution of the contract, together with control of the property, is confided to the employee. (2) In case of a like contract, the contract prescribing the mode of its execution, when possession of the property is surrendered to the employee to enable him to execute the contract.

In Butler v. Lewman (1902) 115 Ga. 752, 42 S. E. 98, it was laid down that the owners "relieved themselves of all responsibility in the matter, by making an absolute surrender, for the time being, of their possession of the building, and placing it under the complete control of independent contractors."

In Hauver v. Whalen (1892) 49 Ohio St. 69, 14 L.R.A. 828, 29 N. E. 1049, the masonry and woodwork of a building were let to contractors, but with respect to the remainder of the work, including the making of the excavations for cellars, areas, and coal vaults, there was no evidence tending to show that it was performed under the direction or control of anyone except the owner himself, and there was neither any stipulation giving the contractors the occupancy, possession, or control of the premises, nor any other evidence on the record which tended to show that they had, or were entitled to have, such occupancy, possession, or control. It was held that a requested instruction to the following effect was abstract, and had, therefore, been properly refused: "If the jury find from the evidence that the defendants should be carefully distinguished from those in which the right of action has been determined with reference to the general principle under which an owner of property is ordinarily protected from liability for an injury resulting from a tort committed with respect to, or by means of, the property, if it is shown to have been out of his control at the time when the injury was received.⁵ In order to relieve the employer of had let the work of constructing the building and area in question to contractors, who were to do all the work and furnish all the materials on their own credit, with their own means, and that the defendants, while the work was in progress, had no possession or occupancy of the premises, and had no control of the mode or manner in which said contractors should do the work, other than to accept or reject the work as being in compliance or non-compliance with the contract, then the defendants are not responsible for any injury resulting to the plaintiff in consequence of the negligence of said contractors, or any of their employees, in not guarding the said area with proper protections or coverings."

In Gilbert v. Beach (1856) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 423, the court made the following remarks: "The employment of the contractor is, in its nature, just as independent of the will of the owner as the ordinary conduct of the tenant; and, when the contract is for the construction of an entire building, the ground upon which the building is to be erected is just as truly in the occupation of the contractor as the ground covered by a lease is in the occupation of the tenant. The possession, as necessary to the prosecution of the work to which the contract relates, is just as certainly vested in the contractor, by force of his contract, as the possession of demised premises is vested in the tenant, by force of his lease. It is said that the owner, whenever he may please, in the mere exercise of his own will, may remove the contractor from the possession; but if this power belongs to him as owner—which we neither affirm nor deny—it is not a power which he is bound to exercise, or can be justified in exercising, unless the known misconduct of the contractor has been such as to render its exercise a positive duty; and, until it is exercised, liability on this ground it is sufficient that the contractor should have been placed in possession of the particular portion of the premises in which the work was performed.⁶

(b) Control retained.

There is a difference of opinion regarding the probative significance of the possession of the contractor is the possession of the owner only in the same sense in which the possession of a tenant is, in judgment of law, that of his landlord. In each case, the possession is derived from the owner, and is held in subjection to his paramount title, but in both, the possession, so long as it continues, is exclusive. In our opinion, therefore, there is no reason whatever for holding that the responsibility of the owner for injuries to third persons during the continuance of this possession is greater in the one case than in the other."

In Newburn v. Healey Real Estate & Improv. Co. (1915) 17 Ga. App. 217, 86 S. E. 429, where the plaintiff's deceased husband, while working on a steel frame building, was struck by falling planks and thrown into an uncovered opening, a demurrer was held to have been properly sustained to a petition which merely alleged that the defendant was constructing in a specified city a building "now commonly known as the Healey Building," and that on the day he met his death the decedent "was employed by the B. Construction Company, which had the contract for the ironwork on said building." The court took the ground that, having regard to the rule that pleadings are always to be construed most strongly against the pleader, it might be safely assumed that, "so far as the allegations in the petition of the plaintiff are concerned, the contractor, and not the owner, was in the control of the premises, and had entire charge of all the work then being carried on, in pursuance of the general plan of the owner to finish and complete the sixteen-story building described in the petition."

In Wodrocza v. Consolidated Gas Co. (1899; App. T.) 29 Misc. 637, 61 N. Y. Supp. 186, the liability of the defendant for injury occasioned to personal property by the falling of part of the neighboring gas holder upon the building wherein the plaintiff was at work was denied on the ground that evidence that the employer retained possession of the premises on which stipulated work was performed. By some courts such evidence is apparently considered to be incompatible with any other conclusion than that the person employed was not engaged on the footing of an independent contractor.⁷ The soundness of an unequal-the only evidence relating to ownership consisted in a contract between the defendant gas company, and its codefendants, which disclosed that the latter had agreed to complete the holder within six months after the time when the foundation to be prepared by the owner for its reception was sufficiently advanced to allow the contractor to commence work." The court said: "There is nothing in the case to show that the work was completed. . . . If the contractors were still in control, they were the parties to look to; if the work had been completed and turned over, the gas company was the party to look to, provided it was, at the time, the owner, or in possession and control. In this particular the contract avails nothing, because it proves nothing as to possession or control by either of the defendants at the time of the accident."

In a case where the owner of a building employed a contractor to make an excavation in the sidewalk in front of it, the jury were instructed that the mere fact that the owner remained in possession of the building itself did not establish the fact of his control of the place where the excavation was made. Fuller v. Citizens' Nat. Bank (1882) 15 Fed. 875.

For cases in which the contractor was held liable on the ground of his being in possession of the premises in which the work was done, see Kepperly v. Ramsden (1876) 83 Ill. 354; Jefferson v. Jameson & M. Co. (1897) 165 Ill. 142, 46 N. E. 272; Moline v. McKennie (1888) 30 Ill. App. 419.

⁶ Mohr v. McKenzie (1895) 60 Ill. App. 575; Geist v. Rothschild (1900) 90 Ill. App. 324.

⁷ In Glickauf v. Maurer (1874) 75 Ill. 289, 20 Am. Rep. 238, where the landlord of a leased building employed a carpenter to put in three or four skylights, for which he was to be paid so much a piece, and the goods of a tenant were injured through his negligence in removing the roof and allowing the rain to get through, the court ified doctrine of this purport is questionable. The logical reasons to which it was deemed to be referable are not apparent from the language used in the cases cited. An examination of the facts involved in those cases shows that it has so far been applied with reference only to inconsiderable operations. Whether it will be treated by the courts which have adopted it as being applicable to all kinds of work, however extensive, remains to be seen.

The position taken by other courts is that the situation established by such evidence is merely an element which tends more or less strongly, according to circumstances, to disprove said that, while doing the work, the carpenter could only be regarded as the servant of the landlord. The fact that, according to the testimony of the carpenter, he had the entire control of the work, could not, it was declared, make any difference, as there was no such surrender of the entire possession of the premises to the workmen as could relieve the landlord of responsibility.

In Bernauer v. Hartman Steel Co. (1889) 33 Ill. App. 491, where the goods of a tenant were injured by the negligence of the servant of a person employed by the landlord to make some changes in the plumbing, the court said that, as the terms of the employment were not given, it must be assumed that no special terms were agreed on, and stated its conclusion as follows: The negligent person "was employed generally to do the required work, and was, for that purpose, the agent or servant of his employer. Possession or control of the building or plumbing, or any part of it, was not given to him. His employer had the right to control and direct the entire work, and might have discharged Ruh [the plumber] from the employment if he refused to obey her instructions."

In Anderson v. Moore (1903) 108 Ill. App. 106, the court thus stated its conclusion: "Appellant having employed a mechanic to make repairs upon premises occupied by appellee as a tenant, the plumber must be regarded as the landlord's servant, it not appearing that any contract had been let to the plumber as an independent contractor, or the premises surrendered to his control."

In Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. (1912) 23 N. D. 6, L.R.A. 1918C, 1063, 135 N. W. 793, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 680, one of the grounds upon which the defendant was held to be liable for injuries received by a child who fell into post holes dug by a laborer hired on a piecework footing was thus stated: "Nearly all of the writers . . . agree that, where a person or corporation undertakes to do work upon the premises of the owner, or of him who is in possession, and such first person intrusts the performance of the work to a contractor or workman, but does not and is not authorized by the one in possession to give the control of the premises to the workman or contractor, such workman or contractor will be looked upon as a servant of the first party, and not as an independent contractor. In other words, the courts are inclined to hold, and we hold in this case, that, when the telephone company undertook to put the telephone in the house of Louis Ruehl, it impliedly agreed to put it in in a safe and proper manner, and not in a manner which would endanger the lives of the plaintiff and his family."

In Murphy v. Herold Co. (1909) 137 Wis. 609, 119 N. W. 294, the plaintiff fell into a hatchway left open in the sidewalk in front of the premises of the defendant company by one T., who was employed by it to deliver certain paper at so much per ton, and was, at the time of the accident, delivering a load by means of a skid. The contention that T. was an independent contractor was rejected for reasons thus stated: "It is established . . . that the appellant had control and possession of the premises, and received the paper delivered by Tews through this hatchway and upon an elevator which conveyed it into the basement of the building. So far as the evidence shows, possession and control of the building and premises, including the hatchway through which the paper was delivered, remained with appellant. . . . The evidence does not show that he was not under the control of the appellant in the prosecution of his work in delivering paper into the building occupied by the appellant. The means and methods of doing the work appear from the evidence to have been, to some extent at least, under the supervision of the appellant." But the

the independence of the contract.⁸ In this point of view, the employer's retention of possession does not necessarily operate so as to create the relation of master and servant between him and the person employed.⁹ The probative significance of such retention is deemed to be merely that of an element which bears upon the ultimate question to be determined, viz., whether the contractor had control of the work.¹⁰

The latter of these doctrines appears to be the more satisfactory. It is difficult to see upon what ground it can be maintained that there is such invariable connection between the power of controlling the details of the work, and the power of controlretention of possession was obviously regarded as the determinant factor.

⁸ For cases in which this doctrine was assumed to be the correct one, see Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co. (1907) 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059; Benninghoff v. Futterer (1913) 176 Ill. App. 579; Isnard v. Edgin Zinc Co. (1910) 81 Kan. 765, 106 Pac. 1003; Paro v. Whitefield Sav. Bank & T. Co. (1914) 77 N. H. 394, 92 Atl. 331; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1899) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638; Barclay v. Puget Sound Lumber Co. (1908) 48 Wash. 241, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 140, 93 Pac. 430.

In Slayton v. West End Street R. Co. (1899) 174 Mass. 55, 54 N. E. 351, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 289, where the plaintiff was injured by coming into collision with a pile of rails deposited near a street railway in which they were to be laid, one of the considerations adverted to as having a tendency to negative the inference that the person who deposited the rails was an independent contractor was thus stated: "It is to be noticed that the railway which was under repair was in actual use for the transportation of passengers, and it is more natural that the control of the work of repairs, which would unavoidably affect the safety of operation, should be retained by the defendant, than committed to independent contractors whom the defendant could not control."

⁹ This proposition was explicitly laid down in Pooles v. Sargent Lumber Co. (1915) 113 Me. 426, L.R.A.1915F, 1125, 94 Atl. 754, where the tort-feasor was ling the premises on which the work is done, that the exercise of the latter power necessarily implies the exercise of the former power also.

The mere fact of a municipality's having reserved the power to use a street on which a contractor is to construct a sewer does not render it responsible for injuries occasioned by his failure to take proper precautions for the protection of the public against the dangers incidental to the progress of the work.¹¹

It should be pointed out that the employer's retention of control of the place of work may, under some circumstances, be viewed as an element the significance of which has reference, not to the nature of the rela-a man hired to remove refuse from the defendant's mill.

¹⁰ In Mumby v. Bowden (1889) 25 Fla. 454, 6 So. 453, the court proceeded on the theory that, in order to relieve the employer of liability for the negligence of the contractor, it must appear that the contractor had control of the work as well as of the premises.

In Louthan v. Hewes (1902) 138 Cal. 116, 70 Pac. 1065, where the action was brought to recover for an injury sustained by the plaintiff through falling over a cleat which the servant of a contractor had negligently nailed to a staircase under construction, the court set aside a verdict against the employer on the ground that the contractor was proved to have been in control of the work, and that the fact of the defendants being in possession of the premises was immaterial.

¹¹ Erie v. Caulkins (1877) 85 Pa. 247, 27 Am. Rep. 642, where, in an action brought to recover for injuries received by a person who fell into a sewer trench at night, the reservation of such a power was assigned by the trial judge as a reason for refusing to give a general charge in favor of the defendant. The court said: "It must not be forgotten that the complaint is not that the street was used in an unlawful or unauthorized manner, but only that there was neglect in not erecting such guards, or in not maintaining such lights at night, as were necessary to protect the public from injury. Whether, therefore, the city did or did not retain the use of the street unoccupied by the work, is of no kind of significance."

tionship between him and the person employed, but to the question whether he was chargeable with personal negligence.¹² So far as regards cases of this type, it is clear that the torts of the person employed cannot be imputed to the employer on the mere ground that, while the work was in progress, the latter still retained, with respect to his premises, that ultimate right of control which is an inseparable incident of proprietorship.

§ 38. Arrangements with regard to the medical treatment of the workmen hired by the person employed.

Circumstances which have been viewed as having some tendency to disprove the independence of a contract are that the physician who was retained to treat the servants of the employer attended on a workman in the service of the person employed, and was paid by the employer for his services;¹ that the employer defrayed the medical expenses of the particular workman who was the claimant in the case;² and that the employer, when paying the compensation earned by the person employed, deducted an amount sufficient to cover the hospital fees of the workmen hired by the latter.³ But it has been also laid down that the independence of the contract is not necessarily negated by the last-mentioned circumstance.⁴

The fact that the person employed was required by the terms of the contract to maintain a hospital service for his workmen was held, in the case cited below, to be one which tended to show that he was not an independent contractor.⁵

§ 39. Arrangements with regard to insurance against liability.

The circumstance that the principal employer had taken out a policy of insurance, entitling him to be indemnified for money expended in the satisfaction of claims in respect of injuries sustained by the workmen in the service of the person employed, has been treated in some cases as having a tendency to negative the independence of the contract.¹ But the pro-

¹² This was one of the aspects under which the facts were considered in Sherman House Hotel Co. v. Gallagher (1906) 129 Ill. App. 557.

¹ Corrigan v. Heubler (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 167 S. W. 159.

² Dibert v. Giebisch (1914) 74 Or. 64, 144 Pac. 1184, the opinion was expressed that the significance of this fact would be very slight, in any event. But in the case under review any weight which it might have carried was destroyed by rebutting testimony which showed that the disbursements in question were made on the contractor's account, and at his request.

³ Decatur R. & Light Co. v. Industrial Bd. (1918) 276 Ill. 472, 114 N. E. 915; West Lumber Co. v. Keen (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 221 S. W. 625, reversed in (1922) — Tex. Com. App. —, 237 S. W. 236.

⁴ Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740.

⁵ In North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017, a clause of this tenor was characterized as being "illustrative of the tendency of the contract to deal with matters not of concern to the employers, if its employees were independent contractors." But this theory as to the significance of such a clause, and the reasons assigned by the court for its adoption, appear to be of very dubious soundness. That the workmen engaged in the performance of a contract should be in good physical condition is certainly a matter which does "concern" the principal employer very seriously. In this point of view it would seem to be an entirely permissible, if not necessary, conclusion that the circumstance of his exacting from the person employed a stipulation to keep up an institution which will promote this important object can have no tendency whatever to negative the independence of the contract.

¹ Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (1919) 21 Ariz. 15, 184 Pac. 996; Nissen Transfer & Storage Co. v. Miller (1920) — Ind. App. —, 125 N. E. 652, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 590; Robinson v. Hill (1910) 60 Wash. 615, 111 Pac. 871; Sempier v. Goemann (1917) 165 Wis. 103, 161 N. W. 354, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 670.

In Messmer v. Bell & C. Co. (1909) 133 Ky. 19, 117 S. W. 346, 19 Ann. Cas. 1, there was the additional circumstance that, when the plaintiff sustained the injury in question, the defendant had reported it to the incurement of such insurance is not sufficient of itself to change the quality of a contract which is shown by the remainder of the evidence to have been an independent one.²

The fact that the person employed did not obtain indemnity insurance against injury to the workmen hired by him has been held to have some tendency to negative the independence of the contract.³

§ 40. Obligation of contractor to indemnify employer for injuries resulting from the work.

In many of the cases in which the insurance company as an injury to one of its own employees.

² Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740.

³ Arizona-Hercules Copper Co. v. Crenshaw (Ariz.) supra.

¹ See, for example:

United States. — Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Bond (1916) 240 U. S. 449, 60 L. ed. 735, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 403, 11 N. C. C. A. 342; Morning v. Cramp & Co. (1909) 170 Fed. 364; United Gas Improv. Co. v. Larsen (1910) 182 Fed. 620, 105 C. C. A. 486; International Agri. Corp. v. Slappey (1919) 261 Fed. 279; The Satilla (1916) 148 C. C. A. 552, 235 Fed. 58, affirming (1915) 221 Fed. 949.

Colorado. — Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 896, 88 Pac. 439.

Indiana. — Mobley v. J. S. Rogers Co. (1915) 68 Ind. App. 308, 119 N. E. 477; Stalder v. Huntington (1899) 153 Ind. 354, 55 N. E. 88; Julius Keller Constr. Co. v. Herkless (1915) 59 Ind. App. 472, 109 N. E. 797.

Kansas. — Maughlille v. Price (1916) 99 Kan. 412, 161 Pac. 907.

Louisiana. — Lutenbacher v. Mitchell-Borne Constr. Co. (1915) 136 La. 805, 19 A.L.R. 206, 67 So. 888; Brady v. Jay (1904) 111 La. 1071, 36 So. 132.

Maryland. — Symons v. Allegany County (1907) 105 Md. 254, 65 Atl. 1067.

Massachusetts. — Harding v. Boston (1895) 163 Mass. 14, 39 N. E. 411.

Missouri. — Salmon v. Kansas City (1912) 241 Mo. 14, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 328, 145 S. W. 16; Thurston v. Kansas City Terminal R. Co. (1914) — Mo. App. —, 168 S. W. 236.

Nebraska. — Omaha Bridge & Terminal R. Co. v. Hargadine (1904) 5 Neb. (Unof.) 418, 98 N. W. 1071; Bar- rett v. Seldon-Breck Constr. Co. (1919) 103 Neb. 850, 174 N. W. 866.

New York. — Uppington v. New York (1901) 165 N. Y. 222, 53 L.R.A. 550, 59 N. E. 91, 9 Am. Neg. Rep. 115; Wolf v. American Tract Soc. (1898) 25 App. Div. 98, 49 N. Y. Supp. 236; Cohen v. Western Electric Co. (1906; App. T.) 50 Misc. 660, 99 N. Y. Supp. 525; Carpenter v. New York (1906) 115 App. Div. 552, 101 N. Y. Supp. 402.
North Carolina. — Gay v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. (1908) 148 N. C. 336, 62 S. E. 436 (provisions that a logging contractor should pay for any delays or damages that might occur to the railroad, if he failed to load the logs as stipulated by the contract between two railroad companies and the employer).

Pennsylvania. — Allen v. Willard (1808) 57 Pa. 374; Wray v. Evans (1876) 80 Pa. 102.

Tennessee. — Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Cheatham (1906) 118 Tenn. 160, 100 S. W. 902.

Utah. — Callahan v. Salt Lake City (1912) 41 Utah, 300, 125 Pac. 863; Dayton v. Free (1914) 46 Utah, 277, 148 Pac. 408; Stricker v. Industrial Commission (1920) 55 Utah, 603, 19 A.L.R. 1159, 188 Pac. 849.

England. — Allen v. Hayward (1845) 7 Q. B. 960, 115 Eng. Reprint, 749, 15 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 99, 10 Jur. 92, 4 Eng. Ry. & Cas. 104; Hardaker v. Idle Dist. Council [1896] 1 Q. B. 335, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 363, 74 L. T. N. S. 69, 44 Week. Rep. 323, 60 J. P. 196.

In Kirby v. Lackawanna Steel Co. (1905) 109 App. Div. 334, 95 N. Y. Supp. 833, the conclusion of the court that the relation of master and servant did not exist between the defendant company and an engineering company which had contracted to operate apparently furnished by the consideration that a provision of this tenor forms a part of contracts of hiring and service, and is very frequently inserted in contracts of an independent description. But it clearly must be treated as a negligible factor, if the other provisions of a contract are of such a nature as to negative its independence.

In a case where the contract bound the person employed to save the employer "harmless from all labor and materialmen's liens," and to pay "all railroad demurrage which might be incurred because of any negligence on his part," it was held that the presence or absence of such a stipulation "does not, in the slightest degree, tend to determine the nature of the relation created by the contract."² But this complete denial of any probative significance seems to be scarcely warrantable in view of the fact that stipulations of this general type are not uncommonly inserted in independent contracts, and very sel-its plant was founded in part upon the consideration that the contract embraced a provision binding the defendant to repay the contractor all expenses incurred for insurance against accidents. Such a provision imported that the engineering company was to protect the defendant against liability for personal injuries. "This was provided as a matter of safety to the defendant. It might be claimed, as it is here, that defendant was liable on some theory. The engineering company was ultimately to protect the defendant against such liability. Insurance was provided for, and defendant agreed to pay the premiums therefor as one of the expenses of the business, but in the end, if the insurance company did not afford defendant protection, the engineering company was bound to do so."

A typical example of a stipulation of this sort is found in the report of Smith v. Bank of Commerce & T. Co. (1916) 135 Tenn. 398, 18 A.L.R. 788, 186 S. W. 465: "The contractor will, at his own expense, protect in a suitable manner the work and ground, so as to avoid any injury to the property of adjacent owners or of others, and damage to their persons, or employees, or any other persons. The contractor dom, if ever, in contracts of hiring and service.

§ 41. Contractor a stockholder in employing company.

In one case it was held that the minutes of the meetings of the stockholders and directors of the defendant company were properly admitted in evidence as tending to show not only that the person employed was not an independent contractor, but that he substantially owned the company, and that, as the owner of a majority of the stock, he was in a position to change at will the contract under which it was claimed he was working.¹

§ 42. Contractor a director of employing company.

In a case where the action was brought by an injured servant, it was held that where a railway company employs one of its directors to construct the floor of a building by day's work, and pays him a commission on the actual cost of the work, he is, as will be responsible for all damages of every nature whatsoever done to persons or property during the progress of the work, and occasioned by its own acts or neglect, or that of any of its subcontractors, foremen, laborers, or other employees or agents, and shall have executed and maintained in force bonds as provided in the specifications."

In North Bend Lumber Co. v. Chicago, M. & P. S. R. Co. (1913) 76 Wash. 232, 135 Pac. 1017, where the contract was held to create the relationship of master and servant, the court remarked, with regard to a clause which provided that the contractor should hold the contractee free from damages arising from any accident to any person or property: "It is unnecessary to say . . . that the clause of the contract making contractors liable for losses caused by the negligent performance of the work is a mere brutum fulmen as to strangers to the contract." The possible significance of such a clause, as an element tending to prove the independence of the contract, was not adverted to.

² Scale v. First State Bank (1918) 88 Or. 490, 172 Pac. 499.

¹ Watson v. Black Mountain R. Co. (1913) 164 N. C. 176, 80 S. E. 176.

regards the performance of such work, a mere contractor, and that notice to him of any defect in the instrumentalities is not notice to the company.¹ The rule thus adopted is doubtless a proper one in any case in which the injured party was chargeable with knowledge of the actual relations between the company and the director. But it seems clear that, under some circumstances, a person who is employed by a director to assist him in doing work which is for the benefit of the company will be justified in assuming that, in respect of the contract of employment, he was acting as the representative of the company.

§ 42a. Contracting company an auxiliary of the employing company.

In the case cited below the nonliability of the defendant railroad company for injuries resulting from the collision of a train with a wagon, at a crossing on a line constructed by another company, was referred to a doctrine of the purport thus stated: "Where a parent company, operating a long line of road in the state, takes the necessary steps to construct an auxiliary railroad for the purpose of a local line in the name of another company, and, in strictly pursuing the provisions of the statute, merely furnishes aid as a stockholder, or bondholder, or a guarantor of bonds of the auxiliary company, and such auxiliary company constructs its road in its own name, it is not the servant or agent in such construction of the parent company; and the parent company is not, on account of being a stockholder, or bondholder, or guarantor of bonds of the auxiliary company, responsible for the negligence or other default of the auxiliary company in constructing its road in its own name."¹

§ 43. Custom or usage.

In one case the ruling of the trial judge that a fisherman was the servant of the defendant packing company was held not to be warranted by testimony which merely showed that throughout the district in question a general usage prevailed that the fishermen delivering fish to a packing company were in its service.¹

In another case evidence going to show that there was a custom on the part of the employer's foreman to exercise over the work of persons engaged for the same purpose as the one whose status was in question, a degree of control sufficient to render them servants, was held inadmissible for the reason that it was not affirmatively shown that the custom was known to that person, and that he had contracted with reference to it.²

§ 44. Miscellaneous facts—tending to show that the person employed was an independent contractor.

To this category belong the following facts:

That the terms of the contract were such as to leave the person employed at liberty to work for other persons besides the employer.¹

¹ Dillon v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. (1882) 16 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 283.

² In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis (1885) 34 Kan. 209, 8 Pac. 530. The judgment rendered at the earlier hearing in (1885) 34 Kan. 199, 8 Pac. 146, was set aside.

¹ Oregon Fisheries Co. v. Elmore Packing Co. (1914) 69 Or. 340, 138 Pac. 862. The court relied partly upon the consideration that no such custom had been pleaded, and partly upon the declaration in § 727, L. O. L., that evidence may be given of "usage, to explain the true character of an act, contract, or instrument, where such true character is not otherwise plain; but usage is never admissible except as a means of interpretation." This provision necessarily imported that, if nothing but custom was shown, there was no proof of a contract arising between the two parties.

² Tuttle v. Embury-Martin Lumber Co. (1916) 192 Mich. 385, 158 N. W. 875, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 664.

¹ Ex parte Johnson (1839) 7 Dowl. P. C. (Eng.) 702 (man who had contracted "to print certain pieces of woolen-cotton goods" was held not to be within the Master and Servants Act, 4 Geo. IV. chap. 34, § 3); Byrne v. Baltinglass Rural Dist. Council (1911; C. A.) 45 Ir. L. T. 206, 5 B. W. C. C. 566; Winters v. American Radiator Co. (1915) 128 Minn. 508, L.R.A.

That the person employed was a free agent as to his hours of labor.²

That the employment was not continuous.³

That neither the persons employed, nor the workmen hired by him, were carried in the books of the employer.⁴

That neither party to the contract was to be liable in any way for any loss or damage sustained by the other, or by third persons, through the fault of the other party.⁵

That as long as the appliance which the contract obligated the person employed to furnish for the purposes of the stipulated work was capable of performing the work, the employer was to use no other.⁶

That the contract was to be binding upon, and for the benefit of, the heirs, executors, administrators, successors, and assigns of the respective parties thereto.⁷

That time was to be of the essence of the contract, and that the work was to be completed before a specified date.⁸

That the contract under review contained a stipulation that the person employed was to pay a specified sum, in default of delivery of certain materials at the times required by the employer's agent.⁹

That the tort-feasor was the donee of the articles by the handling of which he caused the injury complained of.¹⁰

1915D, 476, 151 N. W. 277 (transfer company, whose servant caused the injury complained of, delivered goods for other persons besides the defendant); Hopkins v. Empire Engineering Corp. (1912) 152 App. Div. 570, 137 N. Y. Supp. 478 (drayman in question had, on the day before the plaintiff was injured through his negligence, been working for a person other than the defendant).

² Curtis v. Plumptre (1913; C. A.) 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 87 (contractor and the men engaged by him did the work as and when they liked, and were not bound to work every day, unless they thought fit to do so); Hayden v. Dick (1902) 5 Sc. Sess. Cas. 5th series, 152, 40 Scot. L. R. 95, 10 Scot. L. T. 380; Ryan v. Tipperary, South Riding County Council (1912; C. A.) 46 Ir. L. T. 69, 5 B. W. C. C. 578; Chisholm v. Walker [1909] S. C. 31, 2 B. W. C. C. 261, 46 Scot. L. R. 24 (not obliged to come on any particular day); Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1916) 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Easton v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 Pac. 288; Robichaud's Case (1919) 234 Mass. 93, 124 N. E. 890 (person employed did the work at his own convenience, and in connection with other business); Schroer v. Brooks (1920) 204 Mo. App. 567, 224 S. W. 53; Peer v. Babcock & Co. (1920) 230 N. Y. 106, 129 N. E. 224, reversing (1919) 187 App. Div. 925, 174 N. Y. Supp. 914 (truckmen "were free to make such deliveries at their pleasure, and were not subject to the directions of Babcock & Company in respect of the time they should work or the manner in which the same should be accomplished)."

³ Crow v. McAdoo (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 219 S. W. 241.

⁴ Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury (1916) 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721.

⁵ Powley v. Vivian & Co. (1915) 169 App. Div. 170, 154 N. Y. Supp. 426, 10 N. C. C. A. 835.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ Ibid.

⁸ Aarnes v. Great Northern R. Co. (1915) 129 Minn. 467, 152 N. W. 866.

⁹ United States v. Driscoll (1877) 96 U. S. 421, 24 L. ed. 847.

¹⁰ In Swart v. Justh (1905) 24 App. D. C. 596, the evidence showed that, after a man employed to construct a skylight for a lump sum in the roof of the defendant's building had completed the work and received payment therefor, he expressed a wish to have the old materials, that the defendant consented to his taking them, and that, while he was throwing them from the roof, one of the planks struck a person who was passing along an alley. The court approved instructions to the effect (1) that if the contractor had undertaken the removal of the old materials at the request, or by direction, of the owner, then the contractor was acting as the agent or employee of the defendant, in such manner as to render the defendant liable for his negligence in performing the work, whether he himself was or was not present and in actual direction of the work; and (2) that, if the

§ 45. —tending to prove that the person employed was a servant.

To this category belong the following facts:

That the person employed could not terminate the contract without giving a month's notice.¹

That the person employed was required to devote his whole time to the stipulated work.²

That a person employed for an indefinite period to perform a certain description of work devoted the principal part of his time to that work.³

That the person employed was not at liberty to do the same kind of work for anyone except the employer.⁴

That the person employed, when for materials had become the property of the contractor by gift from the defendant, and if in removing them he acted for himself alone, and without any direction from the defendant, then the defendant would not be liable for the contractor's negligence in removing them in his own way. The court intimated that if the gift had been coupled with the requirement of removal, the defendant might have been liable for the acts of his contractor. The authority cited was Burke v. Shaw (1881) 59 Miss. 443, 42 Am. Rep. 370. As that decision was one which denied the liability of the donor, and there is apparently nothing in the opinion to justify citing it as a precedent for the doctrine suggested, the conclusion that the court misapprehended its rationale seems unavoidable. It is somewhat curious that the liability of the defendant was not discussed with reference to the applicability of the rule which imposes upon the owners of property adjacent to a highway an absolute duty to see that persons using the highway shall not be injured by conditions existing thereon, which can be obviated by the exercise of reasonable care. Pollock, Torts, Wade's Am. ed. p. 638.

¹ Re Bailey (1854) 3 El. & Bl. 607, 118 Eng. Reprint, 1269, per Wightman, J., in a case involving the criminal liability of a servant for desertion.

² Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rahn (1889) 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 175; Brown v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 174 Cal. 457, 163 Pac. 664; Williams v. National any reason he could not work at the stipulated job, performed other kinds of work for the employer.^{4a}

That the employer agreed to find work for the person employed, or pay wages.⁵

That the person employed received a guaranty that his remuneration, as fixed upon a quantitative basis, should not fall below a specified sum.⁶

That the risk of all fluctuations in the scale of wages was taken by the principal employer, and not by the immediate employer of the men hired to perform the stipulated work.⁷

That the relationship of master and servant had existed between the em-

Cash Register Co. (1914) 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112; Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1900) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638.

For cases in which a portion of the evidence held to establish the relationship of master and servant was that the employer was the only party for whom the person employed was working, see Bristol & G. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 292 Ill. 16, 126 N. E. 599; Speed v. Atlantic & P. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 303.

In O'Donnell v. Clare County Council [1913; C. A.] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 273, 6 B. W. C. C. 457, 47 Ir. L. T. 41, one of the items of evidence mentioned was that the person employed was at liberty to work for anyone else, when he was not wanted by the employer.

³ Standard Oil Co. v. Parkinson (1907) 82 C. C. A. 29, 152 Fed. 681.

⁴ Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484.

^{4a} Kelley's Dependents v. Hoosac Lumber Co. (1921) — Vt. —, 113 Atl. 818, 20 N. C. C. A. 902.

⁵ Re Bailey (1854) 3 El. & Bl. 607, 118 Eng. Reprint, 1269, per Crompton, J., in a case involving the criminal liability of a servant for desertion.

⁶ Easton v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1917) 34 Cal. App. 321, 167 Pac. 288 (delivery of bread on commission); Midgette v. Branning Mfg. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 333, 64 S. E. 5 (sawing of logs at so much per 1,000 feet).

⁷ Nelson v. American Cement Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578.

ployer and the person employed before the latter undertook the work in question.⁸

That the employer fixed the hours during which the stipulated work was to be carried on by the person employed.⁹

That the person employed did not receive any profit on the work, or on the daily wages of the workmen hired by him.¹⁰

That, when no work of the kind stipulated was available, the person employed assisted the servants of the employer in the performance of their duties.¹¹

That the person who was alleged to be operating a certain department of the defendant's business as an independent contractor, and also the men hired by him, occasionally performed work in the other departments.¹²

That the owner of the vehicle which was to be used for the purpose of performing the contract was to be paid a specified sum for each day that it was laid off by the employer.¹³

That the principal employer "may at any time pay any moneys directly to the employees and others having claims against the contractor for work done and material furnished."¹⁴

That the employer listed for taxation all the property used in the construction and operation of the logging road used by the person employed.¹⁵

That up to the time of the trial no statement of his account had been furnished to the person employed, nor any balance struck between him and the employer.¹⁶

That a vehicle used by the person employed for the purposes of the stipulated work bore signs on which were painted the name of the employer and his business address.¹⁷

That in an action brought against the employer he rested the case without having introduced any evidence which bore upon the nature of the relation between him and the person employed.¹⁸

That employer engaged a night watchman to protect his premises while a building contract was in course of performance.¹⁹

§ 46. —not inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was an independent contractor.

To this category belong the following facts:

That the person employed was required to exercise the greatest of care and precaution in avoiding all fires in and about the premises on which the work was to be performed.¹

That the servants of the employer co-operated to some extent with those of the person employed.²

That the servants of the contractor sometimes worked for the principal

⁸ Ruth v. Surrey Commercial Dock Co. (1891; C. A.) 8 Times L. R. (Eng.) 116; Van Simaey v. George R. Cook Co. (1918) 201 Mich. 540, 167 N. W. 925.

⁹ Southern Cotton Oil Co. v. Wallace (1899) 23 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 54 S. W. 638.

¹⁰ Thompson v. Twiss (1916) 90 Conn. 444, L.R.A.1916E, 506, 97 Atl. 329.

¹¹ Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484. Contrast the ruling in White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107, § 46. note 3, infra.

¹² Giacomini v. Pacific Lumber Co. (1907) 5 Cal. App. 218, 89 Pac. 1059 (verdict finding that a person operating shingle department of lumber mill was not an independent contractor held to be warranted by evidence which included this element).

¹³ De Perri v. Motor Haulage Co. (1918) 185 App. Div. 384, 173 N. Y. Supp. 189.

¹⁴ GADSDEN v. CRAFT & Co. (reported herewith) ante, 662.

¹⁵ Craft v. Albemarle Timber Co. (1903) 132 N. C. 151, 43 S. E. 597.

¹⁶ Dibert v. Giesbisch (1914) 74 Or. 64, 144 Pac. 1184.

¹⁷ Bristol & G. Co. v. Industrial Commission (1920) 292 Ill. 16, 126 N. E. 599; Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484.

¹⁸ Slayton v. West End Street R. Co. (1899) 174 Mass. 55, 54 N. E. 351, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 289.

¹⁹ Mann v. Max (1919) 93 N. J. L. 191, — A.L.R. —, 107 Atl. 417.

¹ Scales v. First State Bank (1918) 88 Or. 490, 172 Pac. 499.

² Reisman v. Public Service Corp. (1911) 82 N. J. L. 464, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 922, 81 Atl. 838 (servants of owner of employer when the contractor had nothing for them to do, and that the servants of the principal employer sometimes helped the contractor when he was in need of assistance.³

That the employer made advances to the contractor while the work was in progress.⁴

That the employer defrayed certain expenses which the person employed had legitimately incurred for the purposes of the stipulated work.⁵

That a servant of the principal employer kept the time of the men working for the contractor.⁶

That one of the members of a contracting partnership was an employee of a partnership,⁷ or a company⁸ for whom the stipulated work is to be performed. Contrast decisions cited in § 41, supra.

That a person engaged for logging operations was bound to maintain, at his own expense, in good working order, the locomotive and cars furnished by the employer for the work, and to return them after the work was finished.⁹

That the person who let a contract for the stonework of a building was himself a builder, and was doing the woodwork.¹⁰ pleasure resort kept the crowd back from the place where the person employed was giving an exhibition of fireworks).

³ White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107. Contrast the ruling in Glover v. Richardson & E. Co. (1911) 64 Wash. 403, 116 Pac. 861, 2 N. C. C. A. 484, § 45, note 4, supra.

⁴ Edmundson v. Coca-Cola Co. (1912) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 150 S. W. 273. The court pointed out that a possible explanation of this fact was that the contractor had expended his own money, or materials and labor, and that the employing company, after having been informed of his purchases and payment, had been induced to make the advances.

⁵ Edmundson v. Coca-Cola Co. (Tex.) supra, where a portion of the evidence relied upon in support of the contention that one Tufts who had undertaken the erection of a building was not an independent contractor, was the fact that the company paid certain bills for his outlay on telephone messages, printing, and stamps, and the cost of his trip to the place where the work was to be done, and paid him his percentage on these items, treating and considering them as a part of the contract price of the building. The court said: "It is true if Tufts was the agent or employee of the company, he would charge them with such expenses; also, if he was to receive a lump sum for the building, such items should be considered as covered by such sum. But it does not follow that he would not, under a contract like the one in this case, charge the company with such items, even though an independent contractor. They appear to have been legitimate expenses incurred in carrying on the work, and, though not mentioned in the contract, may have been considered by the company and Tufts as just portions of the claim against the company for erecting the building."

⁶ Fay v. German General Benev. Soc. (1912) 163 Cal. 118, 124 Pac. 844.

⁷ Hedge v. Williams (1901) 131 Cal. 455, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366, 63 Pac. 721, 64 Pac. 106.

⁸ Chicago Hydraulic Press Brick Co. v. Campbell (1904) 116 Ill. App. 322. There one of the contentions of the plaintiff was that the defendant company and K. & D., the firm for which the tort-feasor was working, were one and the same concern, and that the employment of the firm by the defendant was a mere device by the firm to shift responsibility for the torts of the teamster employer. The decision in Chicago Economic Fuel Co. v. Myers (1897) 168 Ill. 139, 48 N. E. 66, was held not to be controlling, in view of the evidence which showed that, while the business relations between the defendant and K. & D. were intimate, and that D. was at the time in question, and for a long time prior thereto, employed by the defendant as a salesman, the firm did a separate and independent business of its own, not only in the teaming, but in the stone business. It is observable that the conception of a "device to shift responsibility," that is to say, of a positively culpable motive actuating the employing company, was not involved in the decision cited.

⁹ Gay v. Roanoke R. & Lumber Co. (1908) 148 N. C. 336, 62 S. E. 436.

¹⁰ Johnson v. Helbing (1907) 6 Cal. App. 424, 92 Pac. 360.

That if the person employed should, through sickness, disability, death, or any other cause, be unable properly to look after and manage the work, the employer was to have the right to take charge of the work, and carry out the terms of the agreement at the cost and expense of the person employed.¹¹

§ 47. —not inconsistent with the inference that the person employed was a servant.

The fact that a person who had undertaken to perform work on a piece-work basis was permitted to hire an assistant is not sufficient of itself to show that a finding to the effect that the undertaker was a servant was erroneous.¹

The fact that the person employed undertook to give satisfaction, or to replace the product of the work as performed by him, if it did not endure for a certain length of time, has been held not to be decisive with respect to the question whether he was an "employee," within the meaning of that term as used in a Workmen's Compensation Act.²

§ 48. —Irrelevant or immaterial.

"Where there is a binding contract for the performance of a specific job by the contractor and those whom he may employ for a price agreed, it matters not, in determining the question whether he who has undertaken such job is to be regarded as the mere servant of the other party, what kind of work was the subject of the contract, or whether it was, or was not, a portion of the regular work which the party contracting for it is carrying on, or some piece of work incidentally connected with it as necessary or convenient."¹

The terms on which the contractor had, on previous occasions, been employed by the official predecessors of the contractees, have no relevancy with respect to the question whether the contract was an independent one.²

With reference to that class of cases in which the claimant is seeking to charge the defendant with liability for an injury sustained by him while working under the person alleged by the defendant to be an independent contractor, it has been declared to be "wholly immaterial whether he knew for whom he was working, the real inquiry being who in fact was his employer."³ But the rule thus laid down is, in effect, sometimes qualified by the operation of the doctrine of estoppel. See § 51 infra.

The fact that the employer when speaking to a workman hired by the contractor, referred to the contractor as his foreman, has been held not to be of sufficient probative value to raise an issue.⁴

§ 49. Bad faith on employer's part in respect of making a contract independent in form.

In some cases a doctrine which may be thus formulated has been applied: The fact that the ostensible terms of the contract were such as to render the person employed an independent contractor will not protect the employer from liability in respect of his torts, if the evidence also shows that the actual relation between the parties was that of master and servant, and that the contract was a device adopted for the purpose of enabling ¹¹ McBride v. Jerry Madden Shingle Co. (1912) 173 Mich. 248, 138 N. W. 1077.

¹ Re Bailey (1854) 3 El. & Bl. 607, 118 Eng. Reprint, 1269, per Lord Campbell.

² Rheinwald v. Builders' Brick & Supply Co. (1915) 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598. But it is doubtful how far this particular ruling has been affected by the subsequent condemnation of the case as regards the main conclusion arrived at. See (1916) 174 App. Div. 935, 160 N. Y.

Supp. 1143, reargument denied in (1916) 175 App. Div. 957, 161 N. Y. Supp. 1142, which is affirmed in (1918) 223 N. Y. 572, 119 N. E. 1074.

¹ Mayhew v. Sullivan Min. Co. (1884) 76 Me. 107.

² Karl v. Juniata County (1903) 206 Pa. 639, 56 Atl. 78.

³ De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1915) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711.

⁴ Kipp v. Oyster (1908) 133 Mo. App. 711, 114 S. W. 538.

the employer to escape the liabilities incident to that relationship. The earliest allusion to the theory that bad faith in regard to the formation of the contract might be an element proper to be considered with reference to the question whether it should be treated as independent seems to be that which is found in some remarks made by the court, arguendo, in a case decided in 1866.¹ But all the cases in which the theory has been categorically adopted are of a much more recent date.²

¹In Kellogg v. Payne (1866) 21 Iowa, 575, where the action was brought by a farmer to recover for damage caused to his property by a fire negligently set out on the land of defendant, it was observed, without any citation of precedents: "If a responsible proprietor, having a work to perform the execution of which would be necessarily attended with danger and probable injury to third persons, should let the doing of the work by contract to an irresponsible party, with the view and for the purpose of avoiding personal liability for any damages that might result from its execution in the manner required, we will not say that such proprietor would not be liable for such damage. But his liability in such case, if it existed at all, might well be held to rest upon the fraud or mala fides of such proprietor." This statement was approved in Dibert v. Giebisch (1914) 74 Or. 64, 144 Pac. 1184.

²"A party may not be permitted to employ a contract, which by its terms assumes to establish the relation of an independent contractor as to one of the parties, as a cloak or shield to avoid liabilities arising out of the relation of master and servant, when such relation exists in fact." Stanley v. Aurora, E. & C. R. Co. (1911) 166 Ill. App. 132 (arguendo).

In Deep Vein Coal Co. v. Raney (1916) 62 Ind. App. 608, 112 N. E. 392, it was recognized that if the leasing of its mine was, as contended by counsel, "a mere subterfuge resorted to in an attempt to safeguard the lessor from consequences likely to flow from negligent operation," the lessor would have been liable for injuries caused to a servant of the lessee by the fall of a rock from the roof of a tunnel. But the court refused to consider the case under this aspect, because the plaintiff had sued on the theory that his immediate employer was working the mine as lessee.

In Laffery v. United States Gypsum Co. (1910) 83 Kan. 349, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 930, 111 Pac. 498, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 590, the evidence showed that in 1900 the B. V. Plaster Company, the former owner of the gypsum mine and mill operated by the United States Gypsum Company, entered into a written contract with one Drake, by which it was agreed that he should mine and deliver such gypsum as the plaster company might require at its mills, on the terms that the company should furnish cars and rails to transport the material from the mine, that the deliveries should be at the plaster company's cable, and that Drake should be paid at the rate of 45 cents per ton. The contract contained the following stipulations: "It is further agreed that said party of the first part shall in no wise have control of the mine from which said gypsum is taken, or any authority respecting the manner of, or means employed in and about, mining said gypsum." This agreement was, by its terms, to remain in force for one year. Drake had been superintendent of the mine for several years before this contract was made, and he continued to direct its operations afterward. In 1902 the mills and mines were transferred to the gypsum company, and Drake continued until 1906 to supervise the operation of the mines, employing and discharging the laborers, and superintending the work in the mines generally, and the separation of the material from the earth, and its delivery at the mill. The claim of the defendant company was that he acted solely as an independent contractor, under the contract with the plaster company, adopted and in force between the transferee and the contractor. The claim of the plaintiff was that Drake acted as superintendent of the mines for the defendant company, without reference to the contract, and that the contract was set up as a cover to relieve the company from responsibility for the negligence of its own superintendent. Evidence was offered tending to support the claims of each party. The court took the position that, "if Drake was really acting for the company as its superintendent in overseeing and directing the mining operation, by its authority, direction, or agreement, or if the written contract was not in force between the company and Drake, or if, with or without the contract, the company really controlled and directed the operation of the mine, then it is liable for any actionable negligence on his part or the part of the company." It was accordingly held that the actual relationship of Drake to the defendant was a question for the jury.

Facts mentioned by the courts as having some tendency to show bad

In Nelson v. American Cement Plaster Co. (1911) 84 Kan. 797, 115 Pac. 578, where the action was brought to recover for the death of a workman in a gypsum mine, who had been killed by a blast set off without any warning in the room adjacent to the one in which he was working, the defendant company, in its answer, alleged that, at the time of the accident Nelson was in the employ of one Jenkins, an independent contractor, engaged, together with one Messenger, under a written contract made between them and the Great Western Plaster Company, the defendant's predecessor in the ownership of the mine; that this contract provided that the contractors should do all the work in the mine in a good and workmanlike manner, according to the plans and specifications to be furnished by the company, and deliver the gypsum rock for the mill at the mouth of the mine at a stipulated price per ton; and that it was expressly stipulated that Messenger and Jenkins should employ and discharge the men who worked in the mine, and have full supervision and control over them, and that the owner of the mine was to have nothing whatever to do with the men, or the manner in which the work should be conducted, or anything that moved to the safety of the men in the work of getting out the rock. The answer also alleged that, after the withdrawal of Messenger from the work, Jenkins took over the performance of the work and under the terms of the written contract, and that after the mine had been purchased by the defendant, he continued to work under and by virtue of the same contract. The conclusions of the court in one point of view were thus stated: "In our opinion there was no substantial evidence showing that the written contract relied upon was in force, or that Jenkins, at the time of the accident, sustained to the company the relation of an independent contractor. . . . It is apparent from the evidence and all the circumstances connected with the contract that it was entered into as a scheme and subterfuge to enable the Great Western Plaster Company to avoid its liability for injuries to its employees, caused by its own negligence. Neither Messenger nor Jenkins was possessed of any means or capital. That of itself would not make the contract unlawful, but it is only one of several circumstances indicating the purpose of the arrangement. When the alleged contract had been in existence about two years, the Great Western Plaster Company, acting through a Mr. Paul who was a part owner and superintendent of the plant, discharged Messenger, and Jenkins continued to operate the mine, to all appearances under the same arrangement, until 1904, when the contract was taken up by the Great Western Plaster Company on the advice of its attorney, and because a suit had been brought against it for an injury to one of the workmen in the mine, and the scheme was apparently not working successfully. If the company which owned the mine and made the contract with Messenger and Jenkins retained, outside of the written instrument, the right to discharge at will one of the parties to the contract, who was evidently a partner of the other, the contractors were not independent, but dependent upon the company, and the written instrument was not what it purported to be." The following comments upon the circumstances existing after the sale of the mine were also made: "The mine continued to be worked in the same way as before, Jenkins hiring the men, and the defendant company paying them every two weeks in checks made out to the individual workmen, the pay roll being kept by Jenkins and furnished to the company. The company weighed the rock at the mouth of the mine, and paid Jenkins sometimes 40, sometimes 42½, and at other times 45 cents per ton of rock, and charged him a stipulated price for oil used in the miners' lamps and for powder used in blasting. The company owned the mules and furnished their feed. The testimony shows that the price paid to Jenkins faith are that the contract was executed after the claimant's injury was reper ton of rock was changed from time to time, to allow for the difference he had to pay for wages of the workmen, so that in effect the company, and not Jenkins, took the risk of all fluctuations in the scale of wages caused by the supply of labor. When work in the harvest fields attracted the men, and higher wages had to be paid, Jenkins was not so independent but that he could, by merely asking, obtain from the company whatever additional price per ton was required to make him whole. This plan was continued with the defendant company, and they had three prices which they paid him as the scale of labor demanded. . . . The inference is quite strong that the written contract was an afterthought, and that the defendant intended to rely upon its arrangement by which Jenkins was to hire and discharge the men at the mine, and was to be paid a price per ton for the rock mined. The arrangement, whether it was in writing as alleged in the answer, or merely verbal as Jenkins testified, had, we think from all the circumstances, but one purpose, which was to enable the defendant to escape liability for injury to its own employees arising out of negligence for which it would in law be responsible. . . . Considering the case in this aspect as one of first impression, we think it is clear that courts ought not to permit the employer to avoid liability for injuries to his workmen resulting from his own negligence, by a colorable arrangement such as this appears to have been. To hold thus would pervert a wise and useful principle of law to a purpose for which it was never intended. Whenever the courts can say from all the circumstances that the contractor is not independent of the owner, and that the contract, whatever its terms, is only a device or scheme to avoid the liability of a master to his servants for his failure to perform a duty which the law imposes upon him, the defense that the injury was caused by an independent contractor should not be permitted to prevail." It was accordingly held that the error of the trial judge in refusing to instruct the jury that if the deceased was in the employ of an independent contractor no recovery could be had against the defendant, and the further error in giving an instruction to disregard all the evidence tending to show that the superintendent of the mine was an independent contractor, were rendered immaterial by the special finding that the deceased, at the time he was injured, was in the employ of the defendant, and that the superintendent was acting for the company.

In White v. Olive Hill Fire Brick Co. (1916) 169 Ky. 835, 185 S. W. 107, the following circumstances were relied upon as tending to show that A., a person employed to do plastering work, was merely a boss or foreman for the defendant brick company:—that A. was doing the work for a less sum than it could reasonably be done for; that when the plasterers for any reason did not have any plastering to do during the progress of the work, they put in the time working for the brick company; that when A. needed help to assist in the plastering, the brick company's men performed the service needed; that the plasterers employed by A. were paid by the brick company; that H., the general superintendent of the brick company, had occasionally, during the progress of the work, made some objections to the manner in which it was being done; and that the company furnished the material. The court said: "These circumstances we do not think at all sufficient to show that the contract between Abrams and the company was a mere device to relieve the company from responsibility, or to overcome the direct and uncontradicted evidence we have set out, nor do we think they were of sufficient probative value to take the case to the jury. There seems to us no reason why the owner of property may not make a contract with an independent contractor, under the terms of which all these things that the brick company did might not be done without changing the relation of the parties, or converting the independent contractor into a boss or foreman for the owner."

In Young v. Fosburg Lumber Co. (1908) 147 N. C. 26, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255, 60 S. E. 654, the contention that, notwithstanding the language of the written contract, the tort-feasor was, as a matter of fact, the mere servant and employee of defendant, and that the writing was a device resorted to for the purpose of protecting defendant from liability, was thus discussed: "It is clear that Ferrell does not become an independent contractor simply because the writing so styles him. Whether he is one depends upon the terms upon which he, in truth, enters upon and cuts the defendant's timber. If, as a fact, notwithstanding the language of the writing, defendant exercises a control over him in the selection and employment of the laborers,—if defendant pays them, and directs the manner in which they perform the service,—in other words, if the writing does not truthfully set forth the agreement between Ferrell and defendant, and the jury should so find, then he is not an independent contractor. If he was not acting under the written contract, but as the servant or employee of defendant, and the laborers who cut the trees are the servants of defendant, it would, of course, be liable for their negligence." The court, however, declined to consider the evidence alleged to support the contention thus advanced, as the case had not been tried or submitted to the jury in this point of view.

In Johnson v. Caroline, C. & O. R. Co. (1911) 157 N. C. 382, 72 S. E. 1057, the theory thus excluded from consideration by the circumstances under which the appeal in the earlier case was prosecuted was expressly approved.

In Midzette v. Branning Mfg. Co. (1909) 150 N. C. 340, 64 S. E. 5, where an action was held to be maintainable for a fatal injury received by a servant of the lessee of a sawmill, the following remarks were made: "Merely calling a man an independent contractor cannot make him so. We should hesitate to hold that a person or corporation could, under the form and semblance of an independent contract, operate a secondhand mill in bad repair, dangerous to employees, for the purpose of having its logs cut into lumber, and escape liability for injuries sustained by the employees, who, in good faith and upon reasonable grounds, supposed that they were employed by and were working for the owner of the mill."

In Bokoshe Smokeless Coal Co. v. Morehead (1912) 34 Okla. 424, 126 Pac. 1033, the doctrine that "a contract which upon its face creates the relation of owner and independent contractor will not protect the owner from liability for negligence of the contractor, if it is designed as a mere subterfuge to shield the owner from liability for his negligence," was laid down in the syllabus of the court. But the conclusion that the defendant coal company was really operating the mine in which the plaintiff was injured while working for one Henderson was held not to be warranted by evidence to the effect that the plaintiff, when he applied to the company's superintendent for employment, was sent by him to Henderson, with whom, he was told, he could get on; that Henderson's employees drew their wages once or twice from the coal company's office; that Henderson procured from the company some scales, two pit cars, some rails, and some timbers for use in the mine; and that the company's superintendent was at the mine frequently, and at one time offered a suggestion with reference to the repair of an engine.

In Dorn v. Snare & T. Co. (1909) 62 Misc. 269, 114 N. Y. Supp. 820, where the court, in ordering a new trial, remarked that the plaintiff must look for her relief to the subcontracting company whose servant caused her injury, unless "she could prove that that company was a mere cover under which the defendant was really doing the work."

In Mitchell v. Elizabeth River Lumber Co. (1917) 174 N. C. 119, 93 S. E. 464, the defendant lumber company held a lease of the plaintiff's timber, under a contract giving him a right of way across the tract on which it stood. On that right of way the defendant Bradshaw had laid a track, and furnished an engine, and was operating a lumber road to his mill. The lumber company, and Bradshaw, and Davis had entered into a tripartite agreement the purport of which was that the lumber company put in its timber contract and right of way, that Bradshaw put in the engine, railroad track, and saw mill which he was operating, and that Davis was to cut the timber, haul it, and saw it up into lumber, and load it on the railroad cars at a certain station. It was stipulated in the contract that Davis was to be an "independent contractor," and that neither the lumber company nor Bradshaw was to be "responsible to any person for any damage, injury, or loss occasioned to, or sustained by, such persons on account of, or in connection with, the work to be done." In an action brought to recover for the damage caused by a fire communicated to the plaintiff's timber from the engine, a verdict in his favor was sustained for reasons thus stated: "In the present instance the lumber company owned the timber and the right of way. It did not convey away either, and the defendant Bradshaw laid down the track, and furnished the engine and cars, and was operating the road on the lumber company's right of way, and the sawmill. They were practically, therefore, a partnership, operating said railroad to get out the lumber company's timber to market. The operation of the railroad and mill plant by Davis, who seems to have been irresponsible, cannot have the effect to relieve the other two defendants from liability for negligence either as to employees or the owner of the land, whose woods were set fire to by the negligence in the operation of the engine. If this could be done it would be a very simple device to put some nominal or irresponsible party in the control of the railroad and mill plant, and thereby exempt the owners of the same from all liability."

ceived, and dated back so as to cover the time of the accident,^{2a} and that it did not embrace any express provisions with regard to certain apparently essential matters.³

See also Swansea Lease v. Molloy (1919) 20 Ariz. 531, 183 Pac. 740 (evidence held insufficient to establish allegation that the contract was a "device and means contrived and put into effect by the defendant, for the purpose and with the intent of enabling the defendant to exempt himself from the liability created" by the Employers' Liability Law); and Good v. Johnson (1907) 38 Colo. 440, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 876, 88 Pac. 439 (question of good faith erroneously submitted to the jury in the absence of evidence tending to prove bad faith); Talmage v. Tift (1920) 25 Ga. App. 639, 104 S. E. 91 (syllabus of court—no opinion—actions for injury sustained by laborer) and the cases cited in § 50, note 2, infra.

In Coal City Min. Corp. v. Davis (1919) 17 Ala. App. 22, 81 So. 358, where the claimant had been injured while working in a leased mine, the court observed: "It seems to be the

The doctrine formulated above seems to be open to criticism. In the first place, the introduction of the notion of a device or subterfuge for the purpose of enabling the claimant to rule that, as between third persons in interest and the owner and lessee, it is always a question as to the bona fides of the lease contract, and, where there is any evidence tending to show that the owner is using the lessee as a subterfuge to cover its own operation, it becomes a question for the jury to say whether the owner is the party in contractual relation with the party in interest." The authority cited was Amerson v. Corona Coal & I. Co. (1915) 194 Ala. 175, 69 So. 601. But, so far as the opinion shows, the element of "subterfuge" did not enter into the discussion in that case. The actual point decided was that the direction of a verdict for the defendant, on the theory that the mine in question was being operated by a lessee on the day when the plaintiff was injured, was error, as there was some evidence pointing to the opposite conclusion. On the second appeal, the case was again held to be one for the jury, there being some evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's intestate was in the employ of the defendant company.

^{2a} De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co. (1915) 48 Mont. 226, 136 Pac. 711.

³ In Johnson v. Great Northern Lumber Co. (1908) 48 Wash. 325, 93 Pac. 516, where a blast set off without warning injured the plaintiff, while engaged upon excavation work by his immediate employer, one Veratt, the omissions emphasized by the court as tending to impeach the good faith of the principal employer were thus adverted to: "The contract provided that the appellant should furnish the powder, the tools, and such helpers as Veratt might require in the performance of the work, at its own cost and expense, and fixed Veratt's compensation at a given sum, yet it placed no limitation whatever on the quantity of powder, the character of the tools, or the number of helpers Veratt might lawfully exact under it. It provided, also, that Veratt might hire and discharge his helpers, but was silent as to the wages he might lawfully contract, on the appellant's behalf, to pay them."

assert his remedial rights is, so far as appears, entirely superfluous. It is, at least, reasonably certain that such evidence as that which was presented in all the cases in which that notion has hitherto been relied upon would have justified the inference that the measure of control which the contractee had reserved with respect to the details of the work was sufficiently extensive to negative the independence of the contract. In the second place, the fact that it is impossible, in a logical point of view, to confine the application of the theory to the class of cases now under discussion, is suggestive of a serious difficulty. There would seem to be no escape from the conclusion that, if the desire of an employer to secure himself from loss is once recognized as being evidence of bad faith, the operation of the general doctrine as to the nonliability of an employer for the torts of an independent contractor would be narrowed to an incalculable degree. It is notorious that in a very large proportion of instances that desire operates as the motive which determines the form of the contract, and, having regard to the broad considerations of public policy to which the juristic incidents of an independent contract are referable, it is submitted that there is no valid ground upon which such a motive can be treated as an indicium of bad faith. In view of these two serious objections to the adoption of the theory under discussion, it seems to be permissible to question its soundness. It is apprehended that the element of a desire on the part of the employing company or firm to escape liability should not be treated as evidence of bad faith, unless it is combined with some specific circumstance which may be reasonably regarded as tending affirmatively to show the existence of a fraudulent purpose. The fact that the company or firm engaged to perform the work was irresponsible financially constitutes the most obvious instance of such a circumstance. The views thus expressed are supported by the language used in the cases cited below.⁴

⁴In Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894, one of the points taken on behalf of the plaintiff was "that the contract was a sham and the construction company a fictitious entity,—practically the Home Telephone Company,—the construction company being a mere tool of the telephone company, and therefore not an independent contractor." In support of this claim counsel urged a similarity in the personnel of the officers of the two companies, and many provisions of the contract of an alleged tendency to show the reservation of control of the construction company and its employees by the telephone company. Discussing this contention Hooker, J., (whose position seems to have been approved by the majority of the court, although they differed from him with regard to the import of the contract in question), made the following remarks: "In the present case there is no testimony from which the want of bona fides can be inferred, unless it be the statement in the contract that the telephone company shall not be liable for damages on account of injuries to third persons. It will not be gainsaid that the telephone company had a right to let its contract to an independent contractor, and that, if it did, the legal effect would be to make the latter, only, liable for accidents. The bona fides of such a contract could not depend on the absence of a motive to avoid such liability; for, in the first place, it is not an unlawful motive or an immoral one, and is not a blow to anyone's rights, if an actual bona fide contract is made; and for that reason we say that the presence of such a motive, even though it was the sole motive, is as consistent with the bona fides of the contract as with the absence thereof, and we have seen, in the cases cited regarding legal entity, the presumption of bona fides exists if such motive is all the evidence upon which a different claim is based. In this case it is shown that two valid corporations existed, and that both had capital and assets, and that they made a contract which on its face is valid. Indeed, they joined with another corporation in a tripartite contract which is inconsistent with any other view than bona fides as to the first contract. Even if counsel's contention that these contracts
20 A.L.R.—51.

§ 50. Virtual identity of employing and employed companies or partnerships.

There is a considerable body of precedents for a doctrine which may be thus formulated: Where the contracting parties were both corporations or partnerships, the contract, although it was independent in quality so far as its actual terms were concerned, will, for the purposes of an action brought by a third person, be treated as one which constituted the relationship of master and servant, or established the fact that the relation of master and servant was created were true, it does not tend to prove that the contract was not bona fide, for the parties were competent to make such contracts as well as others, and we understand that this is not disputed."

In Connor v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1904) 24 Pa. Super. Ct. 241, it was held that, in the absence of specific evidence which "tended to throw doubt upon the good faith of a railway company of a cab in leasing it to the driver from whose negligence the injury in suit arose, the trial judge had improperly left it to the jury to say whether the arrangement was merely a "cover" to accomplish the object of exempting the company from responsibility." The court said: "The motive of the company in determining the conditions of the contracts into which it entered was not material; if it was unwilling to assume the responsibility of an employer of the drivers of cabs, it had a right to decline to enter into that relation."

¹In Joseph R. Foard Co. v. Maryland (1914) 135 C. C. A. 497, 219 Fed. 827, affirming (1914) 213 Fed. 51, where an explosion of dynamite was caused by the negligence of the servants of the General Stevedoring Company, which had been employed by the Foard Company to load it on a ship, the contention that the former company was an independent contractor was rejected for reasons thus stated: "Whatever may have been the original design when the Foard Company caused to be organized the General Stevedoring Company, the evidence leaves no doubt that the stevedoring, whether done under one or the other corporate names, was in reality but a department of the business of the Foard Company as shipbrokers and agents. The two companies had the same officers; the stevedoring company handled no funds, except through the Foard Company; its losses were paid by the Foard Company, and dealt with as if they were that company's own losses. All of the profits of the stevedoring company were kept by the Foard Company as a charge for managing the business. There are other like circumstances, but these are sufficient to show that the stevedoring company was organized and controlled, and its affairs so conducted, as to make it a mere instrumentality of the Foard Company. This being so, the two corporations must be regarded as, to the outside public, identical. . . . But, even if the usual current of business of the two corporations had been separate, in this instance the contract to load the vessel was with the Foard Company, and the evidence tends to show that it made no separate contract with the stevedoring company, but co-operated with and completely controlled it. The two companies, therefore, will be treated as one in this discussion, to be referred to as the Foard Company."

principal and agent, if it appears that the corporations or partnerships were bodies virtually identical, as being composed of, or controlled by, the same parties. An examination of the decisions shows that the liability to which the employer is subjected under this doctrine has been predicated on two distinct grounds.

In one point of view the contracting corporation or partnership becomes, under the circumstances mentioned, a mere agent of the contractee.¹ The panies had the same officers; the stevedoring company handled no funds, except through the Foard Company; its losses were paid by the Foard Company, and dealt with as if they were that company's own losses. All of the profits of the stevedoring company were kept by the Foard Company as a charge for managing the business. There are other like circumstances, but these are sufficient to show that the stevedoring company was organized and controlled, and its affairs so conducted, as to make it a mere instrumentality of the Foard Company. This being so, the two corporations must be regarded as, to the outside public, identical. . . . But, even if the usual current of business of the two corporations had been separate, in this instance the contract to load the vessel was with the Foard Company, and the evidence tends to show that it made no separate contract with the stevedoring company, but co-operated with and completely controlled it. The two companies, therefore, will be treated as one in this discussion, to be referred to as the Foard Company."

In Chicago Economic Fuel Gas Co. v. Myers (1897) 168 Ill. 139, 48 N. E. 66, affirming (1896) 64 Ill. App. 270, where the injury complained of was caused by an explosion of gas while it was being conveyed through carelessly constructed pipes, the evidence relied upon by the court as sustaining its conclusion was as follows: That all the officers and employees of the construction company who testified in the case were either at the same time connected in some way with the defendant company, or passed alternately from the service of one to the service of the other; that the natural gas which caused the explosion was let into the pipes by the order of the person who acted as the president of both independence of the contract is clearly negatived by the existence of such a relationship, for it necessarily implies that the details of the stipulated work remained under the control of the contractee. In another companies; and that he was unable to state whether he gave such order as the president of the gas company, or as the supervising engineer of the construction company. It was considered to be just as legitimate to suppose that he gave the order in the former of these capacities as that he gave it in the latter capacity. "The law is quite clear," said the court, "that a corporation cannot thus shift its responsibility upon another corporation, which is its mere agent and tool."

In Kankakee & S. R. Co. v. Horan (1890) 131 Ill. 288, 23 N. E. 621, where land was flooded by reason of the obstruction of a watercourse, resulting from the construction of a railroad by the Kankakee & Seneca Railway Company, the right of the owner to recover damages from the codefendant of that company, the Cincinnati, Indianapolis, St. Louis, & Chicago Railroad Company, was predicated partly on the ground that the evidence warranted the conclusion that the Kankakee Company was organized and designed as a mere instrument in the hands of the Cincinnati Company for the construction of a line of railroad for the use, and to subserve the purposes, of that company, said company being the real and ultimate principal in the enterprise.

In West Chicago Street R. Co. v. Morrison, A. & A. Co. (1896) 160 Ill. 288, 43 N. E. 393, where part of a building tenanted by the Morrison Company was wrecked and dismantled by an employee of a tunnel company, as a preliminary to commencing the construction of a tunnel under a contract made with the defendant street railroad company, the evidence showed that the street railroad company had procured the passage of an ordinance by the city of Chicago, authorizing it to construct the tunnel in question, and that it then organized the West Chicago Street Railroad Tunnel Company, which became the apparent builder and owner of the tunnel. The whole of the capital stock of the tunnel company, except five shares held by the five directors for the purpose of qualifying them to act as such, was held by one Yerkes, president of the street railroad company, as trustee for its stockholders. The rentals of the lands acquired by the tunnel company for uses and purposes of the tunnel were to go, as far as might be, to pay interest on the company's bonds, taxes, insurance, and other expenses, and the street railroad company was to make up the deficiency. It was further shown that the tunnel was to be under the exclusive control of the street railroad company for 999 years, and that it was to be kept in repair at its expense; that the street railroad company was to guarantee all of the tunnel company's bonds; that the tunnel company was to receive a yearly toll on each and every car drawn by the street railway company through the tunnel during the 999 years; that the amount of such toll was to be fixed afterwards, but was in any event to be enough to make good any deficiency between the net rentals and the interest on the tunnel company's bonds; that the bonds and the mortgage were to be renewed, or extended, from time to time, upon the request of the street railroad company; and that the construction by the tunnel company of the tunnel was to "be taken and considered as and for the construction of a tunnel by the street railroad company itself." It was held that this evidence "clearly tended to show that the tunnel company was a mere means or mode adopted by the street railroad company for the construction of its tunnel,—a mere instrument, or tool, used for that purpose,—and that the tunnel company was organized and acted simply as the agent or servant of the street railroad company." In this point of view it manifestly followed that the street railroad company was responsible for the injuries caused by the trespass complained of. But the decision in favor of the plaintiff was based partly upon the circumstance that Yerkes, acting as president of the street railroad company, had given the order for taking possession of and demolishing the building in question; the formal conclusion of the court being that from the evidence as a whole, considered in the light of the surrounding circumstances, the jury was authorized to find that the street rail-point of view the position is taken that, having regard to the closeness of the connection between the parties to the contract, the arrangement as made may properly be regarded as evidence of bad faith, in respect of its road company was a party to the trespass.

In Peoria, B. & C. Traction Co. v. O'Connor (1909) 149 Ill. App. 598, the question whether a railroad company and a construction company were identical in fact, although apparently separate and distinct organizations, or whether the relation of the construction company was that of an independent contractor, was held to have been properly submitted to the jury, where the evidence tended to show that the construction company had, since its formation, done work for the railroad only; that both companies occupied the same offices, and that their funds were deposited in the same bank, although under separate and distinct accounts; that the checks given to plaintiff, a servant of the construction company, in payment of his wages, had printed upon their face the words, "For Peoria, Bloomington, & Champaign Traction Company, No. N. 15;" and that McComb, the auditor of the construction company, afterward occupied a similar position with the appellant company.

In Asplund v. Conklin Constr. Co. (1911) 165 Ill. App. 44, the evidence introduced in support of the claim of a workman who had been injured while working for a company engaged in constructing a line for a telephone company, its codefendant, was as follows: One Parsons was district manager of the telephone company, and superintendent of the construction, and financial man for the construction company at Joliet, and had full charge and control of the work, employed the men, saw to the paying of them, and directed their movements. The two companies had the same general officers, and, at Joliet, they occupied the same office, used the same warehouse, and the same man acted as foreman for both companies. The men who worked for the construction company were often called upon to do repair work for the telephone company, and vice versa, no separate account of their time being kept. If it rained so that they could not work on construction outside, they often worked inside for the telephone company. The wages of all the men at Joliet, working for either company, were paid by the same kind of a check. Parsons determined what men should work for the construction company, and what men should work on repair work for the telephone company. He also determined what wagons should be used on construction work, and what wagons should be used on repair work. He determined what materials should be put into the construction work, and what materials should be put into repair work. He determined who should act as boss of the gang, whether it was working on construction work or on repair work. The conclusion arrived at was that the evidence clearly tended to show that the construction company was a mere means or mode adopted by the telephone company for the construction of the telephone line, that the construction company was acting as the agent or servant of the telephone company, and that the telephone company was liable to the plaintiff for the negligence of the construction company. On the first appeal, a verdict for the plaintiff had been reversed for error in certain instructions. See (1911) 154 Ill. App. 164.

In Nicholson v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1915) 95 Kan. 13, L.R.A. 1915C, 417, 147 Pac. 1123, where it was held that the conductor of a construction train was entitled to recover for injuries caused by the sinking of the track, the contention that the plaintiff was, at the time when the accident occurred, an employee of a certain railway company which had been created by the defendant for the accomplishment of its purposes in building the section of road in question, was rejected. "The branch company," said the court, "was a mere instrumentality of the Santa Fé Company. To be more plain, the Dodge City & Cimarron Valley Railway Company was a ledger heading in the Santa Fé Company's system of accounting, which did not break the relation of master and servant existing between the plaintiff and the defendant, when the plaintiff was placed in charge of the construction train."

In Williams v. Cape Fear Lumber Co. (1918) 176 N. C. 174, 96 S. E. 950, where the Camp Manufacturing Company, while engaged in cutting timber which had been "granted and sold" to being indicative of the conclusion that the contractee intended to secure the advantages of an exercise of full control over the stipulated work, without incurring the responsibilities ordinarily incident to the possession of such control.²

it by the defendant company, wrongfully cut some trees on the plaintiff's land, and removed them, the decision in favor of the plaintiff was based largely upon the theory that the grantor and grantee were identical companies, though they had different names. On the earlier appeal in (1916) 172 N. C. 299, 90 S. E. 254, this aspect of the facts was not discussed.

It may be advisable to refer, in passing, to a rule laid down in a case which did not involve the question of the independence of a contract—that the mere fact that the same men were officers of both of two companies is not sufficient evidence to justify a finding that the companies are one and the same. Athison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Davis (1885) 34 Kan. 202, 8 Pac. 146.

²In Holbrook, C. & R. Corp. v. Perkins (1906) 77 C. C. A. 462, 147 Fed. 166, where an action was held to be maintainable against the defendant partnership, by a brakeman who had been swept from the top of a car by the guy rope of a derrick, used by the Atlantic Construction Company for the purpose of performing work it had undertaken in pursuance of a subcontract, one of the provisions of this subcontract was as follows: "The corporation shall, at its own proper cost and expense, well and truly furnish all labor and materials and do all things required to complete and perform the work called for in the contract. . . . And while engaged therein the corporation shall have the entire control, management, and direction of the work, and of the employees and persons engaged thereon, and shall do whatever is necessary to guard properly the safety of such employees, and all persons engaged in and about the premises, and all others to whom the firm or corporation may owe such a duty, and the firm is hereby wholly discharged from all duties and liabilities in respect of the foregoing." The firm was to furnish and lease to the corporation all machinery, apparatus, tools, and appliances necessary, the corporation to pay as a rental therefor the sum of \$100 each month, and, upon the termination of the agreement, a further sum equal to the difference between the present value of said machinery, apparatus, tools, and appliances, and the market value. The corporation was to employ all workmen, laborers, and employees. As compensation for the execution of the work and the furnishing of said materials, the firm was to pay the corporation a sum equal to the actual cost of said work and materials, and $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent of such cost in addition. The court said: "We are of the opinion that there was very strong evidence tending to show that the so-called contract with the construction company was a mere pretense; that the parties thereto did not comply with, but, on the contrary, violated, its terms; that there was no actual and bona fide contract; and that the execution of the document was a mere piece of circumvention, devised to avoid legal liability for accidents, and the attachment of property in tort actions. The testimony of Mr. Rollins was commendably frank, and most explicit, to the effect that the Atlantic Construction Company was organized for the sole purpose of avoiding attachments, and that it was without capital. It had the same superintendent as the plaintiff in error, and was composed substantially of the same individuals who composed the firm of Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins, which firm subsequently was incorporated under the name of Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins Corporation. . . . It is quite true that individuals are permitted to form corporations for the purpose of conducting business with a limited individual responsibility. It is not true that individuals are permitted to form corporations solely for the purpose of avoiding ordinary legal liabilities. Incorporation is permitted in furtherance of business enterprises; but a franchise is not granted for the sole purpose of destroying legal accountability. If the Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins Corporation had put out of its hands all of its property merely in order to avoid legal liability for torts which it might commit in the course of its operations, we think there can be no question that such a conveyance would be void. We see no substantial difference in the arrangement made in this case. Instead of putting its property out of the hands of the Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins Corporation, the persons associated in that corporation attempted to put out of its hands the work authorized by its franchise, and for which the corporation was created, and thus, by an artificial division of its work and property, secure for the joint operations of the two corporations an immunity which could not be secured for the principal corporation. The immunity from attachment accruing to the Atlantic Construction Company is to be due to the fact that it will have no attachable assets. The immunity of the Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins Corporation is to be due to the fact that it will put all of its contracts into other hands. This arrangement between the Atlantic Construction Company and the Holbrook, Cabot, & Rollins Corporation was merely a piece of circumvention which may be regarded either as a nullity, or as making the Atlantic Construction Company the agent, or alter ego, for whose acts the defendant, as true principal, is liable."

In Towles v. Miles (1915) 131 Tenn. 79, 173 S. W. 439, where the action was brought by Miles to recover for injuries received while he was in the employ of Straley & Company, a corporation which held a subcontract for railroad construction work under the defendants, Towles & Company, a partnership, a judgment for the plaintiff was affirmed on the ground that the evidence warranted both the conclusion that the work was directed and controlled by Towles & Company, and the conclusion that the contract by which the subsection of 4 miles was sublet to the corporation was a subterfuge; that the members of the firm were the moving spirits in the creation of the company, and incorporators, directors, and officers of Straley & Company, and caused members of their office force—a stenographer and a commissary keeper—to lend their names to make the requisite five incorporators; and that the affairs of the corporation were directed and controlled by the firm. The court said: "The ease with which a corporate charter may be procured, and the facility with which a corporate entity may be manipulated by its creators and made a shield for their protection, should dispose a court to look through any such intended veil into the face of the individual or individuals behind. In this case it is apparent that the firm was, and was meant to be, the prime controlling influence over the corporation. The corporation was lacking in that element of independence of action required to constitute it an independent contractor. Imposed on it, in respect of management and control, was the will of another entity, the firm. A corporation will be treated as a distinct legal entity, ordinarily, and until proof is adduced to the contrary. But that notion will not prevail when the result would be to give countenance and effect to a mere sham, and work injustice." The precedent principally relied upon was McDonald v. Charleston, C. & C. R. Co. (1893) 93 Tenn. 281, 24 S. W. 252, involving the enforceability of a lien.

Attention may be directed to another case which, as regards its facts, illustrates the doctrine as to the effect of identity, although that aspect of the defendant's liability was only referred to incidentally. In Kansas C. R. Co. v. Fitzsimmons (1879) 22 Kan. 686, 31 Am. Rep. 203, the evidence held sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the defendant railway company was liable for injuries received by a boy while playing with a turntable was as follows: That there were only three stockholders in the improvement company, by which, according to the defendant's theory, the section of road on which the accident occurred was then being operated; that the paid-up subscriptions amounted only to $1,250; that since its completion this section of road had been operated and managed in the name of the defendant company; that all the engines, cars, and other property which had any name upon them were marked with that name; and that the improvement company was not known to the public; or to parties doing business with the railway. The court said: "The jury may have thought that the claim that the railway was operated and managed by the Washington Improvement Company, and not by the Kansas Central Railway Company, was a mere sham and fraud; and if they did so think, we cannot say that they were wrong. Even the existence of the Washington Improvement Company seems to be mythical. . . . For the purposes of this case, suppose that the § 51. Estoppel of employer to aver independence of contract.

A person employed to perform work upon terms which render him free from the control of his employer in respect of the details of that work will, in cases involving torts incident to transactions between the employer and third parties with regard to the product of the work, be treated as an agent, if the conditions under which the employer's business is carried on are such as to induce in those parties the belief that the relationship of principal and agent exists between him and the person employed.¹

In a case where the action is brought to recover for injuries sus-

Washington Improvement Company did operate the railway at the time when the accident occurred (and there was some evidence tending to show that it did), still the jury were justified in finding, if they did so find, that it operated the same not for itself alone, but for the railway company and as its agent and servant, and, therefore, that the railway company, the master, operated the road through its servant, the improvement company."

See also Larsen v. Home Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Mich. 295, 129 N. W. 894, reviewed in the preceding section, note 4. Some observations with regard to the soundness of the general doctrine applied in the cases decided in this point of view will be found in the preceding section.

¹ In Durst v. Burton (1872) 47 N. Y. 167, 7 Am. Rep. 428, affirming (1869) 2 Lans. 137, where an action brought to recover damages for fraud committed by a lessee with respect to the manufacture of cheese was held to be maintainable, the circumstances were as follows: The cheeses made at the factory in question were made from milk furnished by the defendants and their associates. They were manufactured for the defendants and their associates by one Campbell, under an agreement by which the factory was leased by defendants for the term of one year, to one Clark, who was to manufacture the milk furnished to the factory into cheese, and prepare it for market, receiving therefor $1.75 per 100 pounds. The defendants were part owners of the milk and cheese, and were authorized to, and did, sell it for themselves and their associates. The evidence proved that some curd was used in the cheeses sold to plaintiff—a fraud which seriously impaired their value. The conclusion of the court in one point of view was thus stated: "If the liability of the defendants depended upon the existence of the relation of principal and agent, or master and servant, between them and Campbell, and that is to be determined alone by the written contract, it would be difficult to sustain the judgment. By the terms of the contract, Campbell, as between him and the defendants, became the lessee of the cheese factory and premises, agreeing to pay a fixed rent, and all taxes and assessments. He also contracted to manufacture the cheese at a specified sum per 100 pounds. He had the employment, payment, and control of the necessary help for carrying on the work. No right of supervision was reserved. The details of the business were under his supervision and management. The defendants bargained for results only, and had no power to direct or control the details, nor could they control the servants employed to do the work." The court was, however, of the opinion that, having regard to the evidence, the relation of the parties as between themselves was not controlling, and that the cases proceeding on the ground that the doctrine of respondeat superior was not applicable were not decisive. The reason for distinguishing cases of that type from the one under review were thus stated: "In those cases the injury was done by the alleged agent or servant in the course of his employment, so as to create a liability against himself. The principal or master had no interest in, or connection with, and received no benefit from, the act causing the injury, but his liability depended solely upon the established relation which existed between them. . . . This case is entirely different in material circumstances from any of those referred to. The defendants represented a voluntary association which owned the factory in question, and were engaged in the business of manufacturing cheese. The business was carried on by the defendants, with materials mainly furnished by themselves and their associates. They appeared to the public, and held themselves out, as manufacturers. The cheese in question was sold by them as an ar-tained by the claimant while assisting in work performed in pursuance of an independent contract made between the defendant and the person under whose direction it was being carried on, the fact that the claimant had no knowledge of the contract, although it has no relevancy with respect to the actual character of the relationship created by the contract, will operate so as to enlarge his remedial rights, if the evidence shows that his ignorance of the real situation resulted from conduct or words which were of such a nature as to estop the defendant from denying that the relationship of master and servant existed between him and the claimant.²

An estoppel against raising the defense that the tort-feasor was an independent contractor is manifestly predicable, where it appears that, after the commission of the tort, the employer admitted himself to be liable for any loss resulting from the tort, and that the plaintiff brought the action in reliance on this statement.³

ticle manufactured by themselves, and they thus assumed and adopted the responsibility of the manufacture. They assumed the character of principals, both in the manufacture and the sale, and dealt with the plaintiff as such. As to the plaintiff and the public, they are chargeable with the defects fraudulently produced by those who appeared to be in their employ. It is not material what the legal nature of the arrangement between the defendants and those who did the work was, as between themselves. So far as the public was concerned, the business was that of the defendants acting on behalf of the patrons, and they must be held responsible for its proper prosecution. If they desired to limit the responsibility incident to their apparent position, they should have done so by proper provisions in the contract of sale, or, at least, by disclosing the arrangement with their subordinates."

² In Johnson v. Owen (1871) 83 Iowa, 512, the following remarks were made: "The acts and conduct of defendant which induced the plaintiff to believe that Nash [plaintiff's immediate employer] was defendant's servant, and to act on that belief, if intended to have that effect, would estop defendant to deny his liability for Nash's acts. But it would be obviously unjust to hold him responsible on account of acts and conduct which might be done by one not an employee, yet which would be reasonable cause of belief, in the mind of another, that he was in fact the employee. If such belief existed in the mind of plaintiff on account of the acts of defendant, and plaintiff, acting thereon, entered or remained in the service of defendant, or the like, and defendant intended to create, by his acts that belief, he would be liable. And the same would be true if such belief were the natural consequence of defendant's acts. But a bare belief of plaintiff, though founded on a reasonable cause, that Nash was defendant's servant, which in no way had influenced his action, which was not intended to be created by defendant, and which was not the natural result of his acts, could not make him liable as the employer of Nash." An instruction by which the existence of a "reasonable belief" on the part of the plaintiff that he had engaged as a laborer under the defendant was made the test of his liability was disapproved.

In Texas Bldg. Co. v. Reed (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 169 S. W. 211, Kaye, an agent of the defendant company, had hired the plaintiff to work for daily wages upon the construction of a railroad. Kaye mentioned that he was then working for the defendant company, and on the day of hiring he took the plaintiff to a hotel, paid for his lodging until he could be sent out over the road on to the work, paid his expenses at the hotel, and bought him a ticket, telling him that the conductor would put him off at the place where the work was in progress. The work was being done under the superintendence of one Clarke, and one of the grounds on which the plaintiff's claim was based was that he did not know that Clarke had made with the company the ostensibly independent contract which the company pleaded as a defense to his action for injuries sustained by him in the course of his employment. The court apparently attached a definite probative value to this want of knowledge; but its precise position is left obscure by the language of the opinion.

³ Ripley v. Priest (1912) 169 Mich. 383, 135 N. W. 258. C. B. L.

Alice Geary
v.
William J. Geary, Appt.

Nebraska Supreme Court — May 17, 1918.

(102 Neb. 511, 167 N. W. 778.)

Judgment — foreign — enforcing duty of parent.

1. An Iowa decree, if confined to divorcing husband and wife and to awarding the custody of their minor children, is not effective in Nebraska for the purpose of enforcing the continuing duty of the father to support such children after they and their parents have become residents of Nebraska.

[See note on this question beginning on page 815.]

Parent and child — duty to support — dissolution of marriage.

2. "The fact that the marriage relation is dissolved does not relieve the father of the duty to support his minor children, and will not defeat an action therefor." Eldred v. Eldred, 62 Neb. 613, 87 N. W. 340.

[See 9 R. C. L. 479; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 812.]

Infant — ward of state.

3. Resident minor children are wards of the state in whom the government is interested.

[See 14 R. C. L. 267; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 203.]

Headnotes by ROSE, J.

Courts — jurisdiction to protect minors.

4. General jurisdiction to protect minors domiciled in Nebraska, and to enforce paternal obligations to offspring has been committed by law to the district courts.

Constitutional law — enforcement of foreign judgment.

5. Nebraska courts are required to give to an Iowa judgment the effect only to which it is entitled in Iowa.

[See 15 R. C. L. 923, 929.]

— protection of procedure.

6. Mere procedure resulting in a judgment, or in the modification thereof, is not protected by the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Wayne County (Welch, J.) in favor of plaintiff in a suit to compel defendant to support two of his minor children while in plaintiff's custody. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. T. M. Zink and A. R. Davis, for appellant:

Where a question arises under the Constitution of the United States, which requires good faith and credit to be given to a judgment of another state, the court of Nebraska will take judicial notice of the laws of the state of Iowa, and it is not necessary to plead any of the jurisdictional facts.

Trowbridge v. Spinning, 23 Wash. 48, 54 L.R.A. 204, 83 Am. St. Rep. 806, 62 Pac. 125; Kunze v. Kunze, 94 Wis. 54, 59 Am. St. Rep. 857, 68 N. W. 391; Hardin v. Hardin, 168 Ind. 352, 81 N. E. 60; State ex rel. Nipp v. District

Ct. 46 Mont. 425, 128 Pac. 590, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 256; Mills v. Green, 159 U. S. 651, 658, 40 L. ed. 293, 295, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132.

Plaintiff, under the statutes and laws of Iowa, has no right or remedy for alimony, and no right or remedy thereunder to recover from the defendant any past support of the minor children in her custody, which she may have furnished them.

Spain v. Spain, 177 Iowa, 249, L.R.A. 1917D, 319, 158 N. W. 529, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1225; Ostheimer v. Ostheimer, 125 Iowa, 523, 101 N. W. 275; Blythe v. Blythe, 25 Iowa, 266; Wilde v. Wilde, 36 Iowa, 319; Kinney v. Kinney, 150 Iowa, 225, 129 N. W. 826; Lindquist v. Lindquist, 148 Iowa, 259, 126 N. W. 1109; Reid v. Reid, 74 Iowa, 681, 39 N. W. 102; Blachly v. Blachly, 169 Iowa, 489, 151 N. W. 447; Ferguson v. Ferguson, 111 Iowa, 158, 82 N. W. 490; Schlarb v. Schlarb, 168 Iowa, 364, 150 N. W. 593; Peitzman v. Peitzman, 147 Iowa, 704, 125 N. W. 218; Crockett v. Crockett, 132 Iowa, 388, 106 N. W. 944; Andrews v. Andrews, 15 Iowa, 423; Shaw v. McHenry, 52 Iowa, 182, 2 N. W. 1096; Jennings v. Jennings, 56 Iowa, 288, 9 N. W. 222; Hamman v. Van Wagenen, 94 Iowa, 399, 62 N. W. 795; Johnson v. Barnes, 69 Iowa, 641, 29 N. W. 759; Vest v. Kramer, — Iowa, —, 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1032, 114 N. W. 886; Skillman v. Wilson, 146 Iowa, 601, 140 Am. St. Rep. 295, 125 N. W. 343; Murdy v. Skyles, 101 Iowa, 549, 63 Am. St. Rep. 411, 70 N. W. 714; Schrauer v. Hoover, 80 Iowa, 243, 45 N. W. 734; Smedley v. Felt, 41 Iowa, 588; Foote v. De Poy, 126 Iowa, 366, 68 L.R.A. 302, 106 Am. St. Rep. 366, 102 N. W. 112; Delbridge v. Sears, 179 Iowa, 526, 160 N. W. 218; Graves v. Graves, 132 Iowa, 206, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 216, 109 N. W. 709, 10 Ann. Cas. 1104; White v. White, 75 Iowa, 218, 39 N. W. 277; Schrader v. Hoover, 80 Iowa, 243, 45 N. W. 734.

Neither party to the divorce has any right to maintain an independent action for alimony, custody, or support of children in the courts of a sister state, but must resort to the court of the state in which the decree of divorce was granted for modification of the decree.

Mayer v. Mayer, 154 Mich. 386, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 245, 129 Am. St. Rep. 477, 117 N. W. 890; Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761; Wagner v. Wagner (Wagener v. Latham) 26 R. I. 27, 65 L.R.A. 816, 57 Atl. 1058, 3 Ann. Cas. 578; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 16 L. ed. 226; Sampson v. Sampson, 16 R. I. 456, 3 L.R.A. 349, 16 Atl. 711; Livingston v. Livingston, 173 N. Y. 377, 61 L.R.A. 800, 93 Am. St. Rep. 600, 66 N. E. 123; Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 183, 45 L. ed. 810, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555, 162 N. Y. 405, 48 L.R.A. 679, 76 Am. St. Rep. 332, 56 N. E. 979; Page v. Page, 189 Mass. 85, 75 N. E. 92, 4 Ann. Cas. 296; Israel v. Israel, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1168, 79 C. C. A. 32, 148 Fed. 576, 8 Ann. Cas. 697; Hunt v. Monroe, 32 Utah, 428, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 249, 91 Pac. 269; Nixon v. Wright, 146 Mich.

231, 109 N. W. 274, 10 Ann. Cas. 547; Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, 37 Pac. 770, 772; Chapman v. Parsons, 66 W. Va. 307, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1015, 135 Am. St. Rep. 1033, 65 S. E. 411, 19 Ann. Cas. 543; Wood v. Wood, 59 Ark. 441, 28 L.R.A. 157, 43 Am. St. Rep. 42, 27 S. W. 641; Sprague v. Sprague, 73 Minn. 474, 42 L.R.A. 419, 72 Am. St. Rep. 636, 76 N. W. 268; Doerr v. Forsythe, 50 Ohio St. 726, 40 Am. St. Rep. 705, 35 N. E. 1055; Julier v. Julier, 62 Ohio St. 90, 78 Am. St. Rep. 697, 56 N. E. 661; Bassett v. Bassett, 99 Wis. 344, 67 Am. St. Rep. 863, 74 N. W. 780; Roe v. Roe, 52 Kan. 724, 39 Am. St. Rep. 367, 35 Pac. 808; Dawson v. Dawson, 110 Ill. 279; Husband v. Husband, 67 Ind. 583, 33 Am. Rep. 107; Chandler v. Dye, 37 Kan. 765, 15 Pac. 925; Gilley v. Gilley, 79 Me. 292, 1 Am. St. Rep. 307, 9 Atl. 623; Plaster v. Plaster, 47 Ill. 290; Johnson v. Onsted, 74 Mich. 437, 42 N. W. 62; Brown v. Smith, 19 R. I. 319, 30 L.R.A. 680, 33 Atl. 466; Holt v. Holt, 42 Ark. 495; Connett v. Connett, 81 Neb. 777, 116 N. W. 658; Camp v. Camp, 158 Mich. 221, 122 N. W. 521; Wallace v. Wallace, 74 N. H. 256, 67 Atl. 580, 13 Ann. Cas. 293; Jennison v. Jennison, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 446, note; Warren v. Warren, 116 Minn. 458, 133 N. W. 1009; Aldrich v. Aldrich, 166 Mich. 248, 131 N. W. 542; Hector v. Hector, 51 Wash. 434, 99 Pac. 13; Fulton v. Fulton, 52 Ohio St. 229, 29 L.R.A. 678, 49 Am. St. Rep. 720, 39 N. E. 729; Kell v. Kell, 179 Iowa, 647, 161 N. W. 634; State ex rel. Hookey v. Elifritz, 100 Neb. 320, 160 N. W. 113; McNees v. McNees, 97 Ky. 152, 30 S. W. 207; Karren v. Karren, 25 Utah, 87, 60 L.R.A. 294, 95 Am. St. Rep. 815, 69 Pac. 465; Leming v. Sale, 128 Ind. 317, 27 N. E. 619; Averbuch v. Averbuch, 80 Wash. 257, 141 Pac. 701, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 873; Wilkins v. Wilkins, 84 Neb. 206, 133 Am. St. Rep. 618, 120 N. W. 907; Durland v. Durland, 67 Kan. 734, 63 L.R.A. 959, 74 Pac. 274; Sistare v. Sistare, 80 Conn. 1, 125 Am. St. Rep. 102, 66 Atl. 772, 218 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 905, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1068, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061; Rogers v. Rogers, 46 Ind. App. 506, 89 N. E. 901, 92 N. E. 664; Cureton v. Cureton, 132 Ga. 745, 65 S. E. 65; Bleuer v. Bleuer, 27 Okla. 25, 110 Pac. 736; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 48 Wash. 388, 125 Am. St. Rep. 940, 93 Pac. 670; Guess v. Smith, 100 Miss. 457, 56 So. 166, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 300; State ex rel. Nipp v. District Ct. 46 Mont. 425, 128 Pac. 590, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 256; Taylor v. Stowe, 218 Mass. 248, 105 N. E. 890; Alderson v. Alderson, 84 Iowa, 198, 50 N. W. 671; Farr v. Emuy, 121 La. 91, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 744, 46 So. 112; Norval v. Zinsmaster, 57 Neb. 158, 73 Am. St. Rep. 500, 77 N. W. 373; McAllen v. McAllen, 97 Minn. 76, 106 N. W. 100; Chambers v. Chambers, 75 Neb. 850, 106 N. W. 993; Spencer v. Spencer, 97 Minn. 56, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 695, 105 N. W. 485, 7 Ann. Cas. 901; Brow v. Brightman, 136 Mass. 187; Fitler v. Fitler, 33 Pa. 50; Finch v. Finch, 22 Conn. 411; Hancock v. Merrick, 10 Cush. 41; Ramsey v. Ramsey, 121 Ind. 215, 6 L.R.A. 682, 23 N. E. 69; Johnson v. Johnson, 36 Ill. App. 152; Burritt v. Burritt, 29 Barb. 124; Wilson v. Wilson, 45 Cal. 399; Call v. Call, 65 Me. 407; Harvey v. Lane, 66 Me. 536; King v. Miller, 10 Wash. 274, 38 Pac. 1020; Cox v. Cox, 25 Ind. 303; Erkenbrach v. Erkenbrach, 96 N. Y. 456; Chester v. Chester, 17 Mo. App. 657; State v. Phillips, 1 Penn. (Del.) 11, 39 Atl. 453; Glynn v. Glynn, 94 Me. 465, 48 Atl. 105; Baldwin v. Foster, 138 Mass. 449; Hall v. Green, 87 Me. 122, 47 Am. St. Rep. 311, 32 Atl. 796; Foss v. Hartwell, 168 Mass. 66, 37 L.R.A. 589, 60 Am. St. Rep. 366, 46 N. E. 411; Libbe v. Libbe, 157 Mo. App. 610, 138 S. W. 688.

The decree of divorce granted to the defendant by the district court of Iowa in and for the county of Plymouth is within the good faith and credit clause, § 1 of article 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and must be governed by and construed in accordance with the statutes and laws of the state of Iowa, and the rights and remedies of the plaintiff thereunder determined thereby.

Bolton v. Bolton, 86 N. J. L. 622, 92 Atl. 389, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 938; Zentzis v. Zentzis, 163 Wis. 342, 158 N. W. 284; Taylor v. Stowe, 218 Mass. 248, 105 N. E. 890; Clarke v. Lyon, 82 Neb. 625, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 171, 118 N. W. 472; Lynde v. Lynde, 181 U. S. 183, 45 L. ed. 810, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555, 162 N. Y. 405, 48 L.R.A. 679, 76 Am. St. Rep. 332, 56 N. E. 979; Sistare v. Sistare, 218 U. S. 1, 54 L. ed. 905, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1068, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682, 20 Ann. Cas. 1061, 80 Conn. 6, 125 Am. St. Rep. 102, 66 Atl. 772;

Hunt v. Monroe, 32 Utah, 438, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 252, 91 Pac. 269; Mayer v. Mayer, 154 Mich. 391, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 248, 129 Am. St. Rep. 477, 117 N. W. 890; Arrington v. Arrington, 127 N. C. 190, 52 L.R.A. 202, 80 Am. St. Rep. 791, 37 S. E. 212; Gilbert v. Gilbert, 83 Ohio St. 265, 35 L.R.A.(N.S.) 521, 94 N. E. 421; Julier v. Julier, 62 Ohio St. 90, 78 Am. St. Rep. 697, 56 N. E. 661; Weidman v. Weidman, 57 Ohio St. 101, 48 N. E. 506; Wagner v. Wagner (Wagener v. Latham) 26 R. I. 28, 65 L.R.A. 816, 57 Atl. 1058, 3 Ann. Cas. 578; Israel v. Israel, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1168, 79 C. C. A. 32, 148 Fed. 576, 8 Ann. Cas. 697; Trowbridge v. Spinning, 23 Wash. 48, 54 L.R.A. 204, 83 Am. St. Rep. 806, 62 Pac. 125; Page v. Page, 189 Mass. 85, 75 N. E. 92, 4 Ann. Cas. 296; Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761; Barclay v. Barclay, 184 Ill. 375, 51 L.R.A. 351, 56 N. E. 636; Van Horn v. Van Horn, 48 Wash. 389, 125 Am. St. Rep. 940, 93 Pac. 670; Barber v. Barber, 21 How. 582, 589, 16 L. ed. 226, 229; Welch v. Sykes, 8 Ill. 199, 44 Am. Dec. 689; Eaton v. Hasty, 6 Neb. 419, 29 Am. Rep. 365; Jaster v. Currie, 198 U. S. 144, 49 L. ed. 988, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 614, 69 Neb. 4, 94 N. W. 995; Keeler v. Elston, 22 Neb. 310, 34 N. W. 891; Snyder v. Critchfield, 44 Neb. 66, 62 N. W. 306; Packer v. Thompson, 25 Neb. 688, 41 N. W. 650; Hanley v. Donoghue, 116 U. S. 1, 4, 29 L. ed. 535, 537, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242; Maxwell v. Stewart, 21 Wall. 71, 22 L. ed. 564; Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Harris, 97 U. S. 331, 24 L. ed. 959; Green v. Van Buskirk, 7 Wall. 139, 19 L. ed. 109; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308, 19 L. ed. 931; Commonwealth Mut. Ins. Co. v. Hayden Bros. 61 Neb. 457, 85 N. W. 443; Felt v. Felt, 59 N. J. Eq. 606, 47 L.R.A. 546, 83 Am. St. Rep. 612, 45 Atl. 105, 49 Atl. 1071; Wisconsin v. Pelican Ins. Co. 127 U. S. 265, 32 L. ed. 239, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1370; Cole v. Cunningham, 133 U. S. 107, 33 L. ed. 538, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269; Fred Miller Brewing Co. v. Capital Ins. Co. 111 Iowa, 590, 82 Am. St. Rep. 529, 82 N. W. 1023; Taylor v. Runyan, 3 Iowa, 474; Crafts v. Clark, 31 Iowa, 77; Melhop v. Doane, 31 Iowa, 400, 7 Am. Rep. 147; Clemmer v. Cooper, 24 Iowa. 185, 95 Am. Dec. 720; Pollard v. Baldwin, 22 Iowa, 332; Goodnow v. Wells, 67 Iowa, 654, 25 N. W. 864; Hunt v. Hunt, 72 N. Y. 217, 28 Am. Rep. 129;

Burgess v. Seligman, 107 U. S. 20, 27 L. ed. 359, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 10; Bucher v. Cheshire R. Co. 125 U. S. 555, 31 L. ed. 795, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 974; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Harding v. Harding, 198 U. S. 317, 49 L. ed. 1066, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679; Ryan v. Southern Bldg. & L. Asso. 50 S. C. 185, 62 Am. St. Rep. 833, 27 S. E. 618; Hansen v. Schlesinger, 125 Ill. 230, 17 N. E. 718; Crim v. Crim, 162 Mo. 544, 54 L.R.A. 502, 85 Am. St. Rep. 521, 63 S. W. 489; F. Mayer Boot & Shoe Co. v. Falk, 89 Wis. 216, 61 N. W. 562; Benton's Succession, 106 La. 494, 59 L.R.A. 135, 31 So. 123; Forrest v. Fey, 218 Ill. 165, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 740, 109 Am. St. Rep. 249, 75 N. E. 789; Hardin v. Hardin, 168 Ind. 352, 81 N. E. 60; Wilson v. Elliott, 96 Tex. 472, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, 73 S. W. 946.

Messrs. R. E. Evans, J. P. Shoup, and T. P. Cleary, for appellee:

The common-law duty of a father to support his minor children is a continuous one, and is not terminated by the decree of divorce, and exists thereafter.

Pretzinger v. Pretzinger, 45 Ohio St. 452, 4 Am. St. Rep. 542, 15 N. E. 471; Buckminster v. Buckminster, 38 Vt. 248, 88 Am. Dec. 652; McCloskey v. McCloskey, 93 Mo. App. 393, 67 S. W. 669; Riggs v. Riggs, 91 Kan. 593, 138 Pac. 628, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 809; Bondies v. Bondies, 40 Okla. 164, 136 Pac. 1089; Graham v. Graham, 38 Colo. 453, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1270, 88 Pac. 852, 12 Ann. Cas. 137; Spencer v. Spencer, 97 Minn. 56, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 695, 105 N. W. 483, 7 Ann. Cas. 901; Ditmar v. Ditmar, 27 Wash. 13, 91 Am. St. Rep. 817, 67 Pac. 353; Alvey v. Hartwig, 106 Md. 254, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 678, 67 Atl. 132, 14 Ann. Cas. 250; Brown v. Brown, 132 Ga. 712, 131 Am. St. Rep. 229, 64 S. E. 1092; Bennett v. Robinson, 180 Mo. App. 56, 165 S. W. 856; Debrot v. Marion County, 164 Iowa, 208, 145 N. W. 467; Connett v. Connett, 81 Neb. 777, 116 N. W. 658; Eldred v. Eldred, 62 Neb. 613, 87 N. W. 340.

Action for support of a minor child furnished after the divorce by the mother can be maintained against the father in a state other than where the divorce was granted, where the father is a resident of the foreign state.

Riggs v. Riggs, 91 Kan. 593, 138 Pac. 628, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 809; Bondies v. Bondies, 40 Okla. 164, 136 Pac.

1089; Graham v. Graham, 38 Colo. 453, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1270, 88 Pac. 852, 12 Ann. Cas. 137; Spencer v. Spencer, 97 Minn. 56, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 695, 105 N. W. 483, 7 Ann. Cas. 901; Ditmar v. Ditmar, 27 Wash. 13, 91 Am. St. Rep. 817, 67 Pac. 353; Eldred v. Eldred, 62 Neb. 613, 87 N. W. 340; Debrot v. Marion County, 164 Iowa, 208, 145 N. W. 467; Com. v. Acker, 197 Mass. 91, 125 Am. St. Rep. 328, 83 N. E. 312; Re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126.

An allowance for the support of children is not, strictly speaking, an award of alimony.

Ostheimer v. Ostheimer, 125 Iowa, 523, 101 N. W. 275; Spain v. Spain, 177 Iowa, 249, L.R.A.1917D, 319, 158 N. W. 529, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1225; Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, 83 Neb. 578, 119 N. W. 1118.

Agreements in contemplation of divorce, relating to property rights or support of children, must be fair and reasonable, and, if not, cannot be used as a defense, and will not be approved or enforced by the courts.

Slattery v. Slattery, 139 Iowa, 419, 116 N. W. 608.

The question of the support of a minor is one affecting the interests of the minor and the public, and any contract in relation thereto by the father and mother is not binding upon the courts in determining the necessity and needs of the minor.

Kirkpatrick v. Kirkpatrick, supra; Ostheimer v. Ostheimer, 125 Iowa, 523, 101 N. W. 275; Spain v. Spain, 177 Iowa, 249, L.R.A.1917D, 319, 158 N. W. 529, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1225.

Where a question of changed condition has a bearing upon the question of custody, or additional allowance for support of a minor, such changed conditions can be shown in the foreign court, and questions relating thereto do not come under the faith or credit clause of the United States Constitution.

Ex parte Mylius, 19 N. M. 278, L.R.A.1915B, 154, 142 Pac. 918, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 941; Kentzler v. Kentzler, 3 Wash. 166, 28 Am. St. Rep. 21, 28 Pac. 370; Re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126; People ex rel. Allen v. Allen, 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143.

Laws of a state where a divorce is granted, relating to a modification thereof, do not affect the right of action against the father in a foreign state, where the father is a resident of such state, for support of a minor child furnished after the decree.

Riggs v. Riggs, 91 Kan. 593, 138 Pac. 628, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 809; Bondies v. Bondies, 40 Okla. 164, 136 Pac. 1089; Graham v. Graham, 38 Colo. 453, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1270, 88 Pac. 852, 12 Ann. Cas. 137; Spencer v. Spencer, 97 Minn. 56, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 851, 114 Am. St. Rep. 695, 105 N. W. 483, 7 Ann. Cas. 901; Ditmar v. Ditmar, 27 Wash. 13, 91 Am. St. Rep. 817, 67 Pac. 353; Eldred v. Eldred, 62 Neb. 613, 87 N. W. 340; Com. v. Acker, 197 Mass. 91, 125 Am. St. Rep. 328, 83 N. E. 312; Re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126; People ex rel. Allen v. Allen, 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143; Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386, 42 Am. Rep. 47, 10 N. W. 825; Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321.

A state has full power and control over the status of parents and minors within its borders, and is not bound in relation thereto by the laws of any other state, and exercises its own judgment and enforces its own laws in the matter, and is, in relation thereto, in no way affected by the full faith and credit clause of the United States Constitution.

Re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126; Seeley v. Seeley, 30 App. D. C. 191, 12 Ann. Cas. 1058, 209 U. S. 544, 52 L. ed. 919, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570; Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321; Com. v. Acker, 197 Mass. 91, 125 Am. St. Rep. 328, 83 N. E. 312; Kline v. Kline, 57 Iowa, 386, 42 Am. Rep. 47, 10 N. W. 825; People ex rel. Allen v. Allen, 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143; Kentzler v. Kentzler, 8 Wash. 166, 28 Am. St. Rep. 21, 28 Pac. 370; Ex parte Mylius, 19 N. M. 278, L.R.A.1915B, 154, 142 Pac. 918, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 941.

Rose, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As presented on appeal this is an independent suit in equity brought in the district court for Wayne county, Nebraska, to enforce the duty of defendant to support two of his minor children while in the custody of plaintiff, their mother. To defeat the action defendant pleaded a divorce procured by him in the district court for Plymouth county, Iowa, August 12, 1907, and an executed contract for the payment of alimony. Plaintiff and defendant have eleven children. In the Iowa divorce court three minors were committed to the father and four minors to the mother. The decree of divorce and the contract for alimony are silent on the subject of support for the children. The district court for Wayne county, Nebraska, found that two of the minors committed to plaintiff are self-supporting, but made allowances for the other minors committed to her; their names being Frank Geary and Stella Geary. For the period between the bringing of the present action July 15, 1914, and the entry of the decree October 9, 1916, plaintiff was allowed $1,800. Beginning October 18, 1916, defendant was ordered to pay $30 a month for the support, maintenance, and education of Frank Geary while attending school during his minority, and $30 a month for the support, maintenance, and education of Stella Geary during her minority. It is from this decree that defendant has appealed.

In ordering defendant to support the two minor children named, did the district court for Wayne county, Nebraska, give "full faith and credit" to the Iowa judgment, within the meaning of that term as used in the Constitution of the United States? This is the question presented by the appeal. On issues raised by the pleadings the following facts are established by the evidence:

Plaintiff and defendant were married in Iowa, June 29, 1881. In a suit in which the district court for Plymouth county, Iowa, had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, while both were domiciled in that county and state, the marriage tie was dissolved August 12, 1907. The decree of divorce did not mention alimony for the wife or support for the children, but the custody of four minors, including Frank Geary and Stella Geary, was committed to their mother. The parents had entered into a contract obligating the husband to pay the wife $7,250 in full of all alimony. This sum he subsequently paid, but out of it the wife had obligated herself to pay the claims of a number of creditors. He had been a resident of Nebraska five years when sued here. Plaintiff, with the minor children in her custody, had been a resident of Nebraska nearly two years when the decree in her favor for the support of Frank Geary and Stella Geary was rendered. During her entire residence in Nebraska she has been without sufficient means to support, maintain, and educate the minor children named, and they are not self-supporting. Their father is abundantly able to support them, but refuses to perform his paternal duty in that respect. The allowances made by the district court for Wayne county, Nebraska, are both reasonable and necessary. These facts and those narrated in the preliminary statement herein are fully established by the evidence. The contract for the payment of alimony does not, on its face, include support for the minor children. In the divorce suit there was no plea for their support or for alimony. The decree of divorce did not touch those subjects.

Under the laws of Nebraska it is the continuing duty of a father to support his minor children, and his obligation to do so cannot be evaded by neglect, improper contract, or other unjustifiable means. After parents have been judicially divorced, reasonable and necessary allowances for the support of minor children in the custody of the mother, if not formerly adjudicated, may be made in an independent suit by her against the father. Resident minor children are wards of the state in whom the government is interested. Education of children is compulsory as a public function. General jurisdiction to protect minors domiciled in the state, and to enforce paternal obligations to offspring, has been committed by law to the district courts.

Courts—jurisdiction to protect minors.

Does the Iowa judgment, confined as it is to the divorce and the order relating to the custody of the minor children, suspend the power of the Nebraska court to protect them in an independent suit; parents and children now being residents of this state? The Nebraska court did not attempt to change the divorce or the custody of the children—the only questions adjudicated in the Iowa divorce court. The father argues, however, that the Iowa court first acquired, and afterward retained, jurisdiction to enforce his paternal duty to his minor children, and that their mother is limited to supplemental proceedings in that forum. If this proposition is sound, the state of Nebraska as parens patriæ, represented by the judicial department of government, must withhold from its resident wards needed relief. In that event the mother must leave her home and residence in Nebraska, go into a court in Iowa to procure for the first time an order on a nonresident of Iowa to pay to another nonresident of Iowa money for the support of minors domiciled in Nebraska. If the father's position is tenable, the mother must open up Iowa litigation that has been slumbering in executed judgment for many years, make new pleas, pray for new relief, and adduce new proofs. If she should prevail, the Iowa court would be without power to enforce its new judgment in Nebraska, and in the end she would be required to resort again to the district court for Wayne county, Nebraska. The full faith and credit provision of the Federal Constitution does not require her to pursue such a course. The Nebraska court is only required to give to the Iowa judgment the effect to which it is entitled in Iowa. Haddock v. Haddock, 201 U. S. 562, 50 L. ed. 867,

Constitutional law—enforcement of foreign judgment.

Parent and child—duty to support—dissolution of marriage.

Infant—ward of state.

26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 525, 5 Ann. Cas. 1; Harding v. Harding, 198 U. S. 317, 49 L. ed. 1066, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 679. In Iowa the decree of divorce is not

Judgment—foreign—enforcing duty of parent.

effective for the purpose of enforcing the continuing duty of the father to support his minor children, and the extraterritorial effect is no greater. Mere procedure resulting Constitutional law—protection of procedure.

in a judgment or in the modification thereof is not protected by the full faith and credit clause. That part of the supreme law is directed to the judgment. The power of the Iowa divorce court to make provision for the support of the minor children while they were residents of Iowa was not invoked or exercised. The new conditions which justified the relief granted to the mother by the Nebraska court were not in existence when the Iowa divorce was granted, and could not then have been pleaded or proved. They arose in Nebraska after parents and children became residents of Nebraska. Some courts have gone far enough to hold: "A judgment of a court of one state awarding the custody of minor children in a divorce proceeding is not res judicata in a proceeding before a court of another state, except as to facts and conditions before the court upon the rendition of the foreign decree. As to facts and conditions arising subsequently thereto, it has no controlling force, and the courts of other states are not bound thereby." 15 R. C. L. p. 940, § 417; Re Alderman, 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126.

The District Court for Wayne county, Nebraska, however, did not disturb the custody of the children, the divorce of the parents, or the stipulated alimony, but, on changed conditions, enforced only the unadjudicated, continuing duty of the father to support his own children after they and their parents had become residents of Nebraska. This was not a violation of the full faith and credit provision of the Federal Constitution.

Affirmed.

Hamer, Letton, and Sedgwick, JJ., not sitting.

Dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, November 17, 1919, 251 U. S. 535, 64 L. ed. 401, 40 Sup. Ct. Rep. 55.

ANNOTATION.

Extraterritorial effect of provision in decree of divorce as to custody of child.

- I. In general, 815.
- II. As affected by fraud or lack of jurisdiction, 818.
- III. Modified decree, 820.
- IV. Charged circumstances:
 - a. In general, 822.

I. In general.

With some variation of statement, and an occasional intimation to the contrary, it is established by the great weight of authority that in the absence of fraud, or want of jurisdiction, affecting its validity, a decree of divorce awarding the custody of a child of the marriage must be given full force and effect in other states as to the right to the custody of the child at the time and under the circumstances of its rendition; but that such a decree has no controlling effect in another state as to facts and conditions arising subsequently to the date of the decree; and the courts of the latter state may, in proper proceedings, award the custody otherwise upon proof of matters subsequent to the decree which justify the change in the interest of the child.

IV.—continued.

- b. Death of parent to whom custody awarded, 824.
- V. As affecting independent action or proceeding against father for support, 826.

United States. — Bennett v. Bennett (1867) Deady, 299, Fed. Cas. No. 1,318.

District of Columbia. — Church v. Church (1921) — App. D. C. —, 270 Fed. 359.

Alabama.—Burns v. Shapley (1917) 16 Ala. App. 297, 77 So. 447.

California. — Re Wenman (1917) 33 Cal. App. 592, 165 Pac. 1024.

Connecticut. — Morrill v. Morrill (1910) 83 Conn. 479, 77 Atl. 1 (arguendo).

Georgia.—Taylor v. Jeter (1862) 33 Ga. 195, 81 Am. Dec. 202; Hammond v. Hammond (1892) 90 Ga. 527, 16 S. E. 265; Milner v. Gatlin (1912) 139 Ga. 109, 76 S. E. 860; Milner v. Gatlin (1915) 143 Ga. 816, L.R.A.1916B, 977, 85 S. E. 1045; Woodland v. Woodland (1922) — Ga. —, 111 S. E. 673.

Illinois.—People ex rel. Hickey v. Hickey (1899) 86 Ill. App. 20.

Indiana. — Hardin v. Hardin (1907) 168 Ind. 352, 81 N. E. 60.

Iowa. — Wakefield v. Ives (1872) 35 Iowa, 238.

Kansas. — Woodall v. Alexander (1920) 107 Kan. 632, 193 Pac. 185; Pinney v. Sulzen (1914) 91 Kan. 407, 137 Pac. 987, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 649.

Mississippi. — Haynie v. Hidgins (1920) 122 Miss. 838, 85 So. 99.

Missouri. — Re Leete (1920) 205 Mo. App. 225, 223 S. W. 962.

Montana. — State ex rel. Giroux v. Giroux (1897) 19 Mont. 149, 47 Pac. 798; State ex rel. Nipp v. District Ct. (1912) 46 Mont. 425, 128 Pac. 590, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 256.

New Jersey. — Dixon v. Dixon (1909) 76 N. J. Eq. 364, 74 Atl. 995.

New Mexico. — Mylus v. Cargill (1914) 19 N. M. 278, L.R.A.1915B, 154, 142 Pac. 918, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 941.

New York. — People ex rel. Allen v. Allen (1886) 40 Hun, 611, appeal dismissed in (1887) 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143; Re Stewart (1912) 77 Misc. 524, 137 N. Y. Supp. 202.

Oregon. — Griffin v. Griffin (1920) 95 Or. 78, 187 Pac. 598.

Tennessee. — Kenner v. Kenner (1917) 139 Tenn. 211, L.R.A.1918E, 587, 201 S. W. 779, rehearing denied in (1917) 139 Tenn. 700, L.R.A.1918E, 592, 202 S. W. 723.

Texas. — Wilson v. Elliott (1903) 96 Tex. 472, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, 43 S. W. 946, ruling on question certified followed in (1903) 32 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 75 S. W. 368; Ex parte Boyd (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 157 S. W. 254; Vickers v. Faubion (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 224 S. W. 803.

Washington. — Groves v. Barto (1919) 109 Wash. 112, 186 Pac. 300.

Wyoming.—Linch v. Harden (1918) — Wyo. —, 176 Pac. 156.

In State v. Rhoades (1902) 29 Wash. 61, 69 Pac. 389, the court, in affirming a conviction of the father of the crime of kidnapping in taking a child away from the mother, to whom its custody had been awarded by a decree of divorce in another state, apparently assumed the conclusiveness of that decree as entitling the mother to the continued custody of the child, if it was within the jurisdiction of the court which rendered it; and it was held to be within such jurisdiction, the father having appeared in the action, and the child having been with the mother in the state where the divorce was granted at the time the action was commenced, although he had left the state before the decree was rendered.

In Re Lorenz (1905) 7 Quebec Pr. Rep. 101, 9 Can. Crim. Cas. 158, the court recognized and gave effect to a decree of divorce awarding the custody of a child to the father, by holding that the mother was subject to extradition on a charge of kidnapping the child.

In Re Davis (1894) 25 Ont. Rep. 579, it was held in effect that a decree of divorce in New York awarding the custody of a child to the mother, though not entitled to recognition as a matter of absolute right, was entitled to great weight in determining the proper custody of the child in a habeas corpus proceeding in Ontario; and the other circumstances being in favor of the wife, the court directed that the custody of the child be given to her until or unless some further order was made.

A decree of divorce rendered in Alabama while both parties were residing there, which gives the custody of a child of the marriage to the mother, puts the mother, as to the control of the child, in the place of the father, and makes her custody and control legal. Therefore, habeas corpus will not issue in Georgia at the instance of the father for the possession of the child, on the ground that it is illegally detained by the mother. Hammond v. Hammond (1892) 90 Ga. 527, 16 S. E. 265.

Intimations against general rule.

There are a few cases that lend some color to the view that, the interests of the child being paramount, a court before which the question of the child's custody properly comes is not bound by a provision of the decree of another state awarding the custody of the child, regardless of any question as to change in the circumstances after that decree was rendered. In some of these cases, in which the actual controversy was between the parents over the custody of the child, it is declared in effect that, while the decree of another state is binding and conclusive as between the parties, it is not conclusive as to the child.

Probably on their facts the results in these cases could have rested upon change of circumstances, and thus harmonized with the general rule.

In Re Alderman (1911) 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126, holding that a judgment in a divorce proceeding giving the father the right to receive visits from a child whose custody was awarded to the mother is not, under the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, binding upon the courts of another state to which the child and mother remove and where they take up their domicile,—the court said in effect that it was bound to give full faith and credit to the decree of the other state so far as it dissolved the marriage, but that the infant child of their union was not property, and the father could have no vested right in the child or its services under a decree divorcing the parents, the decree as to the child having no extraterritorial effect beyond the boundaries of the state where it was rendered.

In Re Bort (1881) 25 Kan. 308, 37 Am. Rep. 255, the court, in an opinion written by Brewer, J., takes the position—which in that case was applied 20 A.L.R.—52.

to such a provision in a decree rendered in another state,—that a provision in a decree of divorce awarding the custody of the children may bind the parties inter sese, but does not conclude the court as to the best interests of the children. And this principle was recognized in Avery v. Avery (1885) 33 Kan. 1, 52 Am. Rep. 523, 5 Pac. 418, though in that case the question was as to the propriety of making such a provision in a domestic decree; and the case did not involve a decree of another state.

In Kentzler v. Kentzler (1891) 3 Wash. 166, 28 Am. St. Rep. 21, 28 Pac. 370, the trial court, apparently upon the ground that a decree of divorce rendered in another state awarding the custody of a child to the mother was conclusive, awarded such custody to her in a habeas corpus proceeding, but the decision was reversed by the supreme court upon the ground that the father was the more suitable person to have the custody of the child, and that in the best interests of the child its custody should be given to him. The supreme court did not, expressly at least, base its decision upon a change in the circumstances since the decree in the other state; but the decision could, perhaps, have been justified on that ground even if the decree of the other state had been regarded as conclusive as to the facts and conditions existing at the time of its rendition.

In Keenan v. Keenan (1906) 5 Ohio N. P. N. S. 12, the court seemed to be of the opinion, in the interest of the child, the award of its custody by the decree of divorce in the other state might be disregarded, even apart from the question of jurisdiction of that court to decide as to the custody.

So, in Vetterlein's Petition (1884) 14 R. I. 378, the court expressed a doubt whether a decree of divorce rendered in another state, so far as it affects the custody of a child, could have any force outside the jurisdiction in which it was rendered, even if it were effective to divorce the husband and wife. It does not expressly appear where the husband, against whom the decree was rendered, was domiciled at the time of its rendition; but he was probably a nonresident, since it appears that he had no notice of the petition. The question, however, was not decided, since the divorce was held invalid for all purposes because of the nonresidence of the wife, who procured it.

In Woodall v. Alexander (1920) 107 Kan. 622, 193 Pac. 185, the court said in effect that a decree of divorce rendered in another state, awarding the custody of an infant child to the mother, was only res judicata as to the custody of the child so long as the situation of the parties was unchanged; and that, moreover, the welfare of the child being the paramount consideration, the circumstances pertaining to its custody may always be inquired into, and any order relating thereto may be made whenever the child's best interest so demands.

II. As affected by fraud or lack of jurisdiction.

As to the recognition of a modification of the original award of custody as affected by the question of jurisdiction, see the next heading, "Modified decree."

It will be noted that the rule as stated at the beginning of the annotation is qualified by the assumption that the decree of the other state is not impeachable for fraud or lack of jurisdiction; and in a number of cases the courts, upon one or the other of these grounds, have refused to give effect to the decree of another state awarding the custody of a child. (Any statements in these cases as to the facts which will show fraud or lack of jurisdiction rest upon their own authority, and there is, of course, no intention to discuss the soundness or unsoundness of their decisions on those points.)

An award of the custody of a child by a decree rendered in another state against a nonresident, upon constructive service, will not be regarded as a conclusive adjudication of the disposition of the child, where the evidence shows that the judgment was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentations in order to obtain jurisdiction. Matthews v. Matthews (1912) 139 Ga.

123, 76 S. E. 855. The court observed that a decree of divorce in another state based on constructive service does not fall within the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, and is not entitled to obligatory enforcement; and that no principle of comity can be invoked to give extraterritorial effect to a judgment obtained by fraud and without notice.

In Seeley v. Seeley (1907) 30 App. D. C. 191, 12 Ann. Cas. 1058, certiorari denied in (1908) 209 U. S. 544, 52 L. ed. 919, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered in Illinois—which was apparently conceded to be binding so far as the dissolution of the marriage was concerned—did not preclude a court of the District of Columbia from determining the custody of a child who was awarded to the father by the decree, but who was, with his mother, within the District when the proceeding for divorce was instituted, and had remained there ever since, the court said: "We are of opinion the Chicago court was without power to pass a decree preventing the court below from deciding concerning the custody and care of this infant all the while physically within its own jurisdiction. The welfare of infants is a matter of paramount consideration at all times and under all circumstances."

The vexed question whether a decree of divorce rendered upon constructive service of process against a nonresident who did not appear is entitled to recognition in another state, either under the full faith and credit provision of the Federal Constitution or upon principles of comity, so far as it purports to dissolve the marriage relation, is, of course, beyond the scope of the annotation. It will be observed, however, that in some cases where it was assumed that a decree rendered in such circumstances would be given full force and effect in another state so far as it purported to dissolve the marriage, it was held that it would not be given such effect so far as it purported to award the custody of the children, since in that regard it was in personam, and not in rem.

Thus, in Kline v. Kline (1881) 57 Iowa, 386, 42 Am. Rep. 47, 10 N. W. 825, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered in Wisconsin in favor of the husband, who was domiciled there, upon constructive service against the wife, who had acquired a separate domicile elsewhere, was valid and entitled to recognition in Iowa, so far as the status of the husband and wife were concerned, but was without jurisdiction and not entitled to recognition so far as it attempted to fix the custody of the minor children, who, at the time of the divorce, were living with the wife in Iowa. The decision in Kline v. Kline (Iowa) supra, is followed in Mollring v. Mollring (1918) 184 Iowa, 464, 167 N. W. 524; and to the same effect is Rodgers v. Rodgers (1896) 56 Kan. 483, 43 Pac. 779.

The refusal of the court in Harris v. Harris (1894) 115 N. C. 587, 44 Am. St. Rep. 471, 20 S. E. 187, to give any effect in a habeas corpus for the custody of a child, to a decree of divorce in favor of the wife in another state, was upon the ground that such decree was a nullity in North Carolina; it having been rendered upon constructive service against the husband, who was a resident of North Carolina.

The decision in Dekraft v. Barney (1862) 2 Hayw. & H. 405, Fed. Cas. No. 18,288, that a decree of divorce rendered in Iowa in favor of the wife, which awarded the custody of the children to her, was not conclusive, or even admissible as evidence, that the father was an unfit person to have the custody of the children, in a subsequent proceeding in the District of Columbia, was upon the ground that the decree having been rendered upon constructive service of process against the husband, a nonresident of Iowa, could have no effect as a personal judgment or decree. It does not appear where the children were at the time the divorce was rendered.

But a decree of divorce rendered in another state, though upon constructive service against a nonresident, unless modified, reversed, or set aside for cause shown to the jurisdiction, will be held conclusive in a habeas corpus proceeding in Iowa for the custody of a child which was awarded to the mother by the decree, it appearing that the child was born in the state where the decree was rendered, and was living there at the time the decree was rendered. Wakefield v. Ives (1872) 35 Iowa, 238.

The rule that a decree of divorce rendered in one state is conclusive on the parties so far as it awards the custody of a child of the marriage to one of them, when the question arises in a court of another state, was applied in Kenner v. Kenner (1917) 139 Tenn. 211, L.R.A.1918E, 587, 201 S. W. 779, rehearing denied in (1917) 139 Tenn. 700; L.R.A.1918E, 592, 202 S. W. 723, where the mother of the child, who had been previously domiciled with her husband in Tennessee, because of his misconduct went with the child to Alabama, where she became domiciled and secured a divorce on constructive service of process upon the defendant, who did not appear. Upon returning with the child to Tennessee for a visit, the father instituted proceedings to obtain the custody of the child, which, however, was denied him upon the ground that he was precluded by the Alabama decree, awarding the custody of the child to the mother, and that there had been no change in the circumstances which rendered it essential, in the best interests of the child, to make a new disposition. The court held that the Alabama court had jurisdiction to award the custody of the child, who was present with her mother in that state, even upon the assumption that the Tennessee domicile of the father remained that of the child. It may be observed that the court was of the opinion that the effect of the decree to dissolve the marriage relation should be recognized as a matter of comity, although not within the full faith provision of the Constitution.

One of the grounds in Keenan v. Keenan (1906) 5 Ohio, N. P. N. S. 12, for refusal to give effect to a decree of another state awarding the custody of the child to the father upon his cross petition in a suit instituted by the mother was that the transcript failed to show service of notice of the cross bill either upon the mother or her counsel, and that whether or not the court had jurisdiction, as in a proceeding in rem, to dissolve the marriage,—a point not decided,—it had no jurisdiction to determine the custody of the child.

In State ex rel. Hahn v. King (1902) 109 La. 161, 33 So. 121, the binding effect of a foreign judgment giving the custody of a child to one of the parents, which was attacked upon several grounds going to the jurisdiction of the court that rendered it, was recognized on the ground of estoppel. In that case, the father was ordered, under a writ of habeas corpus, to place a minor child, of whom he had possession, in the custody of its mother, under the terms of a judgment of divorce which the latter obtained in another state, he being estopped from contesting that judgment because on the trial of the writ he testified that, under its authority, he had contracted a second marriage.

Although the question as to the facts necessary to give the court jurisdiction in a divorce suit to award the custody of the children of the marriage is not within the scope of the annotation, attention is called to the case of Anderson v. Anderson (1914) 74 W. Va. 124, 81 S. E. 706, holding that a decree in a suit for divorce may be valid and binding upon the parties in another state in so far as it awards the custody of the children, even though so much of it as grants the divorce may be void, and the children may have been beyond the jurisdiction of the court at the time of its rendition.

In Milner v. Gatlin (1915) 143 Ga. 816, L.R.A.1916B, 977, 85 S. E. 1045, the court, while recognizing that as a general rule it is not permissible for a party to attack a judgment for fraud in a collateral proceeding, held that it was permissible in a habeas corpus proceeding by a mother in Georgia, in which state the parties had become residents, to secure the custody of a child, to show that the provision in the decree of divorce rendered in another state, disposing of the custody, was obtained by fraud. Two of the members of the court, while concurring in the result, dissented from that proposition upon the ground that under the full faith and credit clause a judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter rendered in another state, and valid on its face, cannot be collaterally attacked for fraud. Their concurrence in the conclusion was apparently upon the ground that the custody of the child may be changed if the circumstances arising since the decree in the other state make such a change in the best interests of the child.

So, the father may be awarded custody of the child notwithstanding that custody was awarded to the mother in a suit for divorce in another jurisdiction in consequence of her fraudulent testimony, at least if it does not appear to be for the child's interest to stay with the mother. Ryser v. Ryser, 7 West. Week. Rep. (Can.) 1275.

III. Modified decree.

Subject to the right of the court of another state to change the custody when a change in circumstances warrants it, the rule which gives effect to the provision of a decree of divorce awarding the custody applies to a modification of such provision by the court which entered the original decree, assuming that it had not lost jurisdiction.

Thus, where, after the rendition of a divorce decree by a court of record of general jurisdiction in Nebraska, awarding the custody of a minor son of the parties to the father, and impliedly prohibiting the latter from removing the son from the jurisdiction of the court, the father did remove the son to another state (Montana), in contempt and violation of the prohibition contained in the decree, whereupon the mother, upon the ground of such contempt and violation, filed in the Nebraska court a petition praying that the decree be so modified as to award the custody of the son to her, and the court, after the appearance of the father and his filing an answer resisting the petition, and after a hearing, modified the decree in accordance of the prayer of the petition,—the modified decree concludes the right of the parties, upon subsequent habeas corpus proceedings by the mother to obtain possession of the son in Montana, to which state the father has again removed him in violation of the modified decree, unless there has been a change in the fitness or condition of the mother, or other circumstances have occurred since the amendment was made, which require the Montana court, in the interest of the son, to order otherwise. State ex rel. Nipp v. District Ct. (1912) 46 Mont. 425, 128 Pac. 590, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 256. To the similar effect is Burns v. Shapely (1917) 16 Ala. App. 297, 77 So. 447, supra.

In Pinney v. Sulzen (1914) 91 Kan. 407, 137 Pac. 987, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 649, where, after the death of the mother, to whom the custody of the child was awarded by a decree of divorce in another state, the custody was awarded to the father, by the same court upon notice, it was held that that modification was not controlling in a habeas corpus proceeding in Kansas as to the fitness of the father, but was competent evidence thereof; and the Kansas court awarded the custody of the child to him.

But in Milner v. Gatlin (1912) 139 Ga. 109, 76 S. E. 860, the court refused to give effect to the modification by a Texas court of its decree of divorce by changing the award of the custody of the child from the father to the mother, the father and child having in the meantime become residents of Georgia, and there having been no provision in the original decree against taking the child beyond the jurisdiction of the court. Though the decision in Milner v. Gatlin (1915) 143 Ga. 816, L.R.A.1916B, 977, 85 S. E. 1045, a subsequent habeas corpus proceeding to obtain the custody of the child, was in favor of the mother, the correctness of the foregoing proposition as to the noneffect of the modification of the Texas decree seems to have been assumed.

And the refusal in Griffin v. Griffin (1920) 95 Or. 78, 187 Pac. 598, to recognize or give effect to a modification by a court of another state of a decree of divorce, by transferring the custody of the children from the mother, to whom they were originally awarded, to the father, was upon the ground that the court of the other state had no jurisdiction to make the modification, because of lack of proper service.

In Groves v. Bartow (1919) 109 Wash. 112, 186 Pac. 300, the court refused to recognize or give effect to a modification by the court of another state of its decree of divorce, transferring the custody of the child to the father, from the maternal grandmother, to whom the custody was awarded by the original decree, upon the ground that the modification was without jurisdiction, it having been based upon substituted service after both the mother and child had become domiciled in Washington. The original decree doubtless contemplated the removal of the child to Washington, as the grandmother was domiciled in that state.

In Clarke v. Lyon (1908) 82 Neb. 625, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 171, 118 N. W. 472, the court said that the courts of Nebraska were not required to enforce an order made by a court of Illinois awarding the custody of children to the father after the death of the mother, to whom they had been awarded by decree of divorce in the latter state, such order having been made without notice to the persons with whom the children were at the time living in Nebraska. In that case, however, the Illinois court itself, after its attention was called to the death of the mother, apparently treated the order as made without jurisdiction.

In the cases just cited the modification was made in the state where the decree was rendered. In GEARY v. GEARY (reported herewith) ante, 809, where no such modification had in fact been made the court, in reply to the argument that the court of the other state retained jurisdiction to enforce the paternal duty to the minor children, and that the mother was limited to supplemental proceedings in that forum, observed that mere procedure resulting in the judgment or in the modification thereof is not protected by the full faith and credit clause.

IV. Changed circumstances.

1a. In general.

It is a corollary of the general rule previously stated that, where the decree of divorce in one state awards the custody of a child to one of the parties, the other may lawfully obtain possession of the child in another state only upon grounds which arose since that decree. That is implied in practically all of the cases cited in support of that general rule; and is emphasized in some of them. See Church v. Church (1921) — App. D.C. —, 270 Fed. 359; Ex parte Wenman (1917) 33 Cal. App. 592, 165 Pac. 1024; Wilson v. Elliott (1903) 96 Tex. 472, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, 73 S. W. 946.

Thus, a decree of divorce in another state, in which the custody of the child is awarded to the father, is conclusive as between the parties to the decree as to his right and fitness for such custody at that time, but is not conclusive for all time. In a subsequent proceeding by habeas corpus for the possession of the child, between the parties to the decree, evidence as to the unfitness of the father will be confined to matters transpiring subsequently to the decree. Milner v. Gatlin (1912) 139 Ga. 109, 76 S. E. 860.

The proposition just cited from the Milner Case is quoted with approval in Woodland v. Woodland (1922) — Ga. —, 111 S. E. 673, a case not strictly within the scope of the annotation as the decree of the other state awarding the custody of the children to the father was not rendered in a suit for a divorce. The court was of the opinion that the evidence showing that the status of the children had materially changed subsequently to the rendition of the decree in the other state justified the decision of the court below in awarding the custody of the children to the mother.

In Vickers v. Faubion (1920) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 224 S. W. 803, the court observed that the decree of divorce in the other state foreclosed the matters in relation to cruelty, except so far as they may corroborate the subsequent conduct of the mother, to whom the custody of the child was awarded.

In Dixon v. Dixon (1909) 76 N. J. Eq. 364, 74 Atl. 995, an order awarding the custody of children of a marriage to the mother, in a proceeding instituted in New Jersey for that purpose by the father, having been modified by directing the mother to send the children to visit the father at certain intervals, and the mother having subsequently, in a suit for a divorce in Maine, procured an order awarding the sole custody of the children, pendente lite to her, the New Jersey court refused to give effect to that order upon an application for the enforcement of its own modified order, upon the ground that that modified order was conclusive on the Maine court as to the facts and conditions existing at the time that it was made, and that, while it would not preclude the Maine court from making a new order for the custody of the children, the order of that court was not in fact based on a change of circumstances, but upon a state of facts and conditions as to which the New Jersey order was conclusive.

The question as to what will amount to a change in the conditions or circumstances which will authorize the court of one state to change the custody of the child as fixed by the decree in the other state is beyond the scope of the annotation. It may be said generally, however, that the decision is largely within the discretion of the court, to be exercised in the interest of the child's welfare just as it is when a modification by reason of changed circumstances is sought after an award of custody by a domestic decree. In Dixon v. Dixon (N. J.) supra, the court, after stating that the rule is that in any controversy between parents relating to the custody of their children the award made by a competent tribunal is res judicata, and cannot thereafter be questioned on the same state of facts, said: "But the adjudication is an adjudication upon the issue presented, and upon that only. So far as children are concerned, the situation is, or may be, constantly varying. The parent fit to have the custody of his children to-day may, by reason of changed circumstances, become unfit to-morrow. The above rule does not prevent the courts of the state within whose limits the children may be, from considering whether a change in the situation may not call for a new disposition. But the changing circumstances must be, obviously, those that affect the children,—not those that concern the parents. To illustrate by the case in hand. In her petition, presented to the Maine tribunal, Mrs. Dixon says that she lived with her husband until May, 1904, and that while so living he treated her with extreme cruelty, whereby her health and life became endangered. It is manifest that evidence bearing upon his disposition, and upon his conduct towards his wife, might have an important bearing upon his fitness to have the custody of his children, either for two months in the year or for any lesser period; and that it must or should have been considered by this court when the order of July 24, 1907 [a New Jersey order antedating the Maine suit] was made. By reason of the effect of the doctrine of res judicata this evidence could not be made the basis of an independent adjudication by another court. If this were not so, the rule established by the decisions to which I have referred would be nullified. But, on the other hand, it is equally manifest that it might be shown that, since the date of the prior adjudication, the father had so conducted himself as to have become unfit to associate with his children; that any association with him would be injurious to their morals or welfare."

The case of Morrill v. Morrill (1910) 83 Conn. 479, 77 Atl. 1, is not strictly within the scope of the annotation, as it involves merely the power and propriety of a modification by a Connecticut court, of a provision of its own decree awarding the custody of the children to the mother, after the mother and children had become residents of a foreign country. The court, however, in arguing for the continuing power to modify the decree, said: "The utmost which is asserted for the extra-territorial effect of such orders is that they should, in the exercise of the customary comity of states and nations, be recognized and enforced, and in the states of our Union, by force of the full faith and credit clause of the Federal Constitution, must be recognized and enforced so long, and only so long, as the circumstances attending their adoption remain unchanged."

The judgment of a court of a sister state in a divorce proceeding granting a wife a divorce, and awarding to her the custody of a minor child, will be given full faith and credit, and taken as decisive of the facts and conditions existing at the time of the divorce; but, in a proceeding between the parents for the custody of the child in this state, the previous adjudication has no controlling force and effect upon facts and conditions subsequently arising after the decree of divorce. Haynie v. Hidgins (1920) 122 Miss. 838, 85 So. 99.

A judgment of a court of a sister state awarding the custody of minor children in a divorce proceeding is not res judicata in a proceeding before a court of this state, except as to facts and conditions before the court upon the rendition of the foreign decree. As to facts and conditions arising subsequently to the foreign decree, it has no controlling force, and our courts are not bound thereby in awarding such custody. Mylius v. Cargill (1914) 19 N. M. 278, L.R.A.1915B, 154, 142 Pac. 918, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 941.

A valid decree of divorce rendered in favor of the wife, in another state, where both parties then resided, awarding the custody of a child of the marriage to the wife, is conclusive as between the husband and wife as to the fitness and competency of the one, and the unfitness and incompetency of the other, to have the care and control of the child, and that question will not be re-examined by the courts of New York. The decision, however, is binding upon the child only for the time being, and as soon as the circumstances of the custodian change, or other circumstances arise which will make it for the best interest of the child that there should be a change, it will be the duty of the court in which the decree was originally made, or if any other court having jurisdiction, to make such change. But as between the parties to the action, the parents of the children, they are bound by the matters adjudged and determined in the action, and cannot again retry the questions therein determined. People ex rel. Allen v. Allen (1886) 40 Hun (N. Y.) 611. The court cited Thorndyke v. Rice, 24 Month. L. Rep. 20, as holding that a decree of a tribunal as to the custody of a child is never final and that the same tribunal or another where the child is either temporarily or permanently staying may consider the case upon the facts then existing, and, looking at the welfare of the child, determine whether any and what change should be made in regard to its custody.

An appeal in the Allen Case was dismissed in (1887) 105 N. Y. 628, 11 N. E. 143, for the reason that the courts below, in view of all the existing facts relating to the welfare and interests of the infants, exercised its discretion in awarding to the mother the custody of the children; and in so doing gave to the foreign decree not the force of an estoppel, or the conclusive effect sometimes due to a judgment, but simply regarded it as a fact or circumstance bearing upon the discretion to be exercised, without dictating or controlling it.

In Kenner v. Kenner (1917) 139 Tenn. 211, L.R.A.1918E, 587, 201 S. W. 779, rehearing denied in (1917) 139 Tenn. 700, L.R.A.1918E, 592, 202 S. W. 723, the court said that "as between the parents, parties to the litigation, the decree of the foreign court awarding the custody of the children is res judicata subject as between those parties, to modification only by the court that granted the decree [citing cases]. However, we think this doctrine should be understood with the qualification that, in case of the removal of the child to another state, even within the custody of the parent to whom that custody had been awarded by the foreign decree of divorce, the courts of the state to which the removal has been effected will have the power, on a change of circumstances showing such course essential to the best interests of the child, to make a new disposition of the child."

It is settled, and not doubted, that an order of the court awarding custody of the child to the parent is a judgment that should be given faith and credit by the courts of other states, as required by the Federal Constitution (Wilson v. Elliott (1903) 96 Tex. 472, 97 Am. St. Rep. 928, 73 S. W. 946, followed in (1903) 32 Tex. Civ. App. 483, 75 S. W. 368). But an order awarding custody of a child is not considered res judicata except for so long as the material circumstances existing at the time of the order remains unchanged, for it is not the object of the proceeding to award custody to establish a permanent custody. And the rule is that, where a new state of facts between the parties in relation to the child has arisen subsequently to the prior adjudication, the matter should not be adjudged res judicata. Ex parte Boyd (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 157 S. W. 254.

The case of Re Leete (1920) 205 Mo. App. 225, 223 S. W. 962, is an instance where the rule which gives effect to the decree of the other state awarding the custody of the children was the controlling factor in the decision, the court, while of the opinion that the mother was a proper person to have the custody of the child, nevertheless held that the evidence disclosed no such change in circumstances and conditions as warranted it denying the right of the father, to whom the custody had been awarded by the decree.

b. Death of parent to whom custody awarded.

The rule that the decree of the other state is conclusive only as to the rights of the parties under the then existing circumstances, and does not prevent a change of custody of the child if, by reason of changed circumstances, it is for the child's best interests, has been applied in some cases where the parent to whom the custody of the child was awarded had died and the other parent was seeking the custody of the child. See Taylor v. Jeter, 33 Ga. 195, 81 Am. Dec. 202.

Where the court of a sister state has granted a divorce and awarded the temporary custody of the children to the mother, who becomes a resident of this state and dies here, leaving such children in the hands of relatives, who are appointed guardians by the county court, the fact that the court rendering such divorce retained jurisdiction for the purpose of making further orders does not deprive the courts of Nebraska of jurisdiction to determine the merits of a controversy between the divorced father and such guardians over custody of such children,—especially where the court rendering the divorce has expressly refused to determine the material question in issue. Clarke v. Lyon (1908) 82 Neb. 625, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 171, 118 N. W. 472.

In Pinney v. Sulzen (1914) 91 Kan. 407, 137 Pac. 987, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 649, it appeared that the petitioner and his wife, having two children, a son and a daughter, had been divorced in Iowa, the decree awarding to the husband the custody of the son, and to the wife the custody of the daughter; subsequently, the divorced wife died, leaving the daughter in the custody of her sister and the latter's husband, who (his wife having since died) was the respondent in a habeas corpus proceeding instituted by the father, in Kansas, to recover the custody of his daughter. In these circumstances, the court held that, upon the death of the wife, the right to the custody of the daughter naturally and legally passed to the father, and should be given to him unless he was manifestly unfit and incapable of performing his parental obligations to the child. It also appeared that the petitioner, after the death of his divorced wife, and upon notice served on the respondent, had applied to the Iowa court, which granted the divorce for a modification of the judgment so as to give him the custody of the daughter; and that, subsequently to the institution of the habeas corpus proceeding in Kansas, the Iowa decree had been amended as desired by the petitioner, the Iowa court finding that the welfare of the children demanded that both of them be given into the absolute custody of the petitioner. Regarding this, the supreme court of Kansas, in discussing the fitness of the petitioner at the time to have the custody of his daughter, as bearing upon the question whether she should be given into his custody in these proceedings, said: "It has been held that a decree of divorce of another state awarding the custody of children to a father is not conclusive in a proceeding brought by the mother in this state to obtain their custody, but that the court has the power to change the custody if the best interests of the children require it. . . . While the action of the Iowa court in modifying the decree of divorce as to the custody of Helen [the daughter] is not conclusive, it is worthy of consideration."

In Wilson v. Mitchell (1910) 48 Colo. 454, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 507, 111 Pac. 21, holding that upon the death of a parent to whom the child was awarded by a decree of divorce the other parent becomes entitled to its custody unless such parent is disqualified, or the interests of the child require such other disposition of his person, it is not clear whether the decree of divorce was rendered in another state or not.

The courts of the state to which a child was brought by the mother after the custody was awarded to her in divorce proceedings will not, upon her death, refuse to permit the father to take it to his home in another state, and into the jurisdiction of the court which granted the divorce, merely because it is thereby being taken beyond their jurisdiction. Ex parte Barnes (1909) 54 Or. 548, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 104 Pac. 296, 21 Ann. Cas. 465.

V. As affecting independent action or proceeding against father for support.

The question involved in cases like Mayer v. Mayer (1908) 154 Mich. 386, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 245, 129 Am. St. Rep. 477, 117 N. W. 890, and Rowe v. Rowe (1915) 76 Or. 491, 149 Pac. 533, whether a provision in a decree of divorce rendered in one state for the support of the child may be enforced in another state, is not within the scope of the present annotation, as it involves considerations relating to the finality of the decree in this regard and its liability to modification common to such provisions and provisions for alimony, which are beyond the present inquiry.

The decision in GEARY v. GEARY (reported herewith) ante, 809, that a decree of divorce in one state awarding the custody of the children to the mother, but making no provision for their support, does not preclude an independent suit in another state for the purpose of enforcing the continuing duty of the father to support such children after they and their parents have become residents of the latter state, is supported by a number of other cases.

Thus, in Davies v. Fisher (1917) 34 Cal. App. 137, 166 Pac. 833, it was held that a wife who had procured a divorce in Nevada awarding the custody of a child to her, but not making any provision for its support, could maintain an action in California, where both parties then resided, for a judgment requiring the husband to contribute to the support of the child.

And in Re McMullin (1913) 164 Cal. 504, 129 Pac. 773, the court, while holding that a father was not criminally liable for a failure to support a child after a decree of divorce, obtained in another state upon substituted service of summons, granting the custody of the child to the mother, but without a provision for their child's support, and after she has sought and obtained letters of guardianship of the child in California, said that it was within the power of the wife under supplementary proceedings brought in California, with personal service upon the former husband, to have procured, if the facts warranted, an award of the custody of the children, with provision for her own and their support.

And in Riggs v. Riggs (1914) 91 Kan. 593, 138 Pac. 628, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 809, it was held that a decree of divorce in another state in favor of the wife, awarding the custody of the children to her without making any provision for her support or maintenance, did not preclude an action in Kansas, in which the parties had become residents, by the divorced wife to compel her former husband to contribute to the support, education, and maintenance of the children.

So, a decree of divorce rendered in another state, which awards the custody of the children to the mother, but makes no provision for their support, does not preclude an action by her against the estate of the deceased father to recover for necessities expended by her in support of the children after the divorce and while the parties were residents of Missouri. Winner v. Shucart (1919) 202 Mo. App. 176, 215 S. W. 905.

But it has been held that a mother who obtained a decree of divorce in another state awarding the custody of a child to her, without providing for their support or for alimony, cannot maintain a suit in equity in Michigan to compel the father to make provision for the future support of herself and the child. Judson v. Judson (1912) 171 Mich. 185, 137 N. W. 103. In the reply to the contention that, under the comity of courts and the full faith and credit provision, the mother was entitled to have the bill sustained as supplemental to the proceedings in the other state, the court said that the statute gave no authority to base an award for the support of the child on a decree of divorce obtained in a foreign jurisdiction; and that neither the Constitution nor comity authorizes or requires the chancery court of one state, limited in its jurisdiction by statute, to take over by supplemental proceedings a suit begun in the courts of another state. Viewing the suit as an independent one, the court held that, in the absence of appropriate legislation, alimony (including apparently provision for support of the child) could not be allowed in courts of equity, independently of divorce proceedings and existence of marriage relation.

In Burritt v. Burritt (1859) 29 Barb. (N. Y.) 124, denying recovery in an action by the mother against the father for the support of an infant child whose custody had been awarded to the mother by a decree of divorce in another state, which made no provision for the support of the child, the court said that the award of the care and custody of the child to the mother must be presumed to carry with it the obligation to support, in the absence of evidence to the contrary; or, at least, to relieve the father from the obligation to furnish such support upon the call of the mother; and that to make the father liable in such case there must be special circumstances averred in the complaint or appearing in the evidence, from which the obligation must arise or may be reasonably inferred.

The court also expressed a doubt whether the bill for divorce in the other state having prayed for the custody of the child, the omission to ask that defendant contribute to its further support, would not be an estoppel upon the plaintiff. The point, however, was not decided, the decision being upon the ground above stated.

A mother who has obtained a decree for alimony and for the support of herself and minor child in another state cannot maintain an original action at law in Georgia to recover necessary expenditures made by her after such decree, for the support of the child. Brown v. Brown (1919) 24 Ga. App. 512, 101 S. E. 315.

In White v. White (1903) 65 N. J. Eq. 741, 55 Atl. 739, it appears that the authority to make provision for children who are inhabitants of the state after a divorce of their parents in another state or country was expressly conferred by statute; and the question in that case was in relation to the notice necessary to support a modification of such a provision.

G. H. P.

KATE STAFFORD

v.

WILLIAM NATHAN STAFFORD.

MARY DUGGAN, Plff. in Certiorari.

Illinois Supreme Court — October 22, 1921.

(299 Ill. 438, 132 N. E. 452.)

Parent and child — keeping child within jurisdiction of court.

1. The court will not award custody of a child to its aunt in preference to its father, to prevent the father taking it out of the jurisdiction of the court where its property is located.

[See note on this question beginning on page 838.]

Courts — jurisdiction — custody of child.

2. A court acquiring jurisdiction of a divorce proceeding may, in such proceeding, dispose of the custody of children of the marriage.

[See 9 R. C. L. 472.]

— when jurisdiction terminates.

3 The court does not lose jurisdiction of orders in a divorce proceeding where a motion to open the judgment is made at the term at which they were entered, and continued from time to time as necessary.

Appeal — question raised for first time.

4. The objection that a bond for appeal to an intermediate appellate court was not filed in time, and that, therefore, the intermediate appellate court had no jurisdiction, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal to the supreme court.

Trial — consolidation of cases.

5. The court may of its own motion consolidate for one hearing an appeal from an order appointing a guardian for the infant child of a marriage and a motion to modify an order for its custody entered in a divorce proceeding between its parents.

Appeal — how far finding of facts binding in divorce proceeding.

6. The supreme court is not bound by the finding of facts by the appellate court in a divorce proceeding, since it is an equitable cause.

[See 2 R. C. L. 209.]

Trial — finding of jury advisory — divorce proceeding.

7. Upon the question of separate maintenance and custody of child in a divorce proceeding, the verdict of the jury is merely advisory.

Parent and child — right to custody of child — effect of drinking liquor.

8. A man is not utterly disqualified from having the care, control, and education of his child because he has occasionally taken a drink of intoxicating liquor.

— right of father to custody of child.

9. A father who is not shown to have forfeited such right has the right to the custody of his minor child as against the world.

[See 9 R. C. L. 471; 12 R. C. L. 1106; 20 R. C. L. 599.]

— effect of absence of property.

10. That a father was at one time without property because he had transferred it to his wife is no ground for denying him the custody of his minor child.

— effect of fact that guardian has more property than father.

11. That one appointed by the court as guardian for a minor has more property than the minor's father, or is more thrifty in accumulating property than the father, is no legal reason for depriving the father of the custody of the child.

[See 20 R. C. L. 599.]

— weight to be given preference of child.

12. The preference of a child to remain with his aunt who was appointed as guardian, rather than to go with his father, is not conclusive on the court on the question of guardianship, if he seems to have no serious objection to going with his father, for whom he has affection.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1106, 1107.]

Guardian and ward — right to change domicile of ward.

13. A guardian by nature, or a testamentary guardian, may in good faith change the ward's domicile from one state to another.

[See 12 R. C. L. 1121.]

— interest of child controls.

14. The interests of the child are controlling upon the question of its guardianship.

[See 9 R. C. L. 475; 12 R. C. L. 1106; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 810.]

— effect of divorce for father's fault on right of stranger.

15. The rule that, in case of a divorce against a father for his fault, the custody of the children will be awarded to the mother, does not apply in favor of other persons after the mother's death.

[See 9 R. C. L. 478.]

Judgment — awarding custody of child — effect on right to make testamentary disposition.

16. A final decree of court awarding the custody of a minor child to its father divests all rights which the mother had to make a testamentary disposition of it.

CERTIORARI to the Appellate Court, Third District, to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Moultrie County (Sentel, J.) modifying a decree of divorce, granting defendant custody of his minor child, and awarding guardianship of its property to the sister of the deceased plaintiff, in a proceeding for her appointment as guardian of the child, consolidated with defendant's motion to open a divorce decree. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. E. J. Miller, W. E. Redmon, and C. R. Patterson for plaintiff in certiorari.

Messrs. John R. Fitzgerald and McLaughlin & Billman, for defendant in certiorari:

A motion to modify a decree at the same term leaves the decree subject to the control of the court to amend, change, or vacate it, as justice may require.

Danforth v. Danforth, 105 Ill. 603; Cooper v. Gum, 152 Ill. 471, 39 N. E. 267; Griswold v. Smith, 116 Ill. App. 223; Shannahan v. Stevens, 139 Ill. 428, 28 N. E. 804.

The fact that the hearing on the motion to modify the decree is continued from term to term does not affect the power of the court to modify the decree, but that power remains in the court until the motion is finally disposed of.

Shannahan v. Stevens, supra; Windett v. Hamilton, 52 Ill. 180; Hibbard v. Mueller, 86 Ill. 256.

In a suit for divorce, although the death of one of the parties of itself dissolves the marriage relation, and that part of the action abates, the remainder of the suit may be continued for the purpose of adjusting the other rights of the parties concerned.

Wren v. Moss, 7 Ill. 72; Wren v. Moss, 6 Ill. 560; Danforth v. Danforth, 111 Ill. 236; Chatterton v. Chatterton, 231 Ill. 449, 121 Am. St. Rep. 339, 83 N. E. 161; Mallory v. Mallory, 160 Ill. App. 417.

A parent is the natural guardian of his children, and his right to their care and custody is paramount.

People ex rel. Good v. Hoxie, 175 Ill. App. 563; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 67 L.R.A. 787, 71 N. E. 1077, 1 Ann. Cas. 256; Wohlford v. Burckhardt, 141 Ill. App. 321; Sullivan v. People, 224 Ill. 468, 79 N. E. 695.

The court may at any time modify its decree as to the custody of minor children.

Gillett v. Bryant, 203 Ill. App. 322; Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 17.

Upon the death of one parent the usual rule and the proper practice demand that the child's custody be awarded to the other parent.

Wilson v. Mitchell, 48 Colo. 454, 30 L.R.A. (N.S.) 507, 111 Pac. 21; Taylor v. Jeter, 33 Ga. 195, 81 Am. Dec. 202.

The custody of the child should be awarded the father. The evidence shows such to be the case, and upon the grounds of natural affection and humanity the court's order should stand.

Mahon v. People, 218 Ill. 171, 75 N. E. 768; Cohn v. Scott, 231 Ill. 556, 121 Am. St. Rep. 342, 83 N. E. 191; People ex rel. Parker v. Bryson, 203 Ill. App. 325; People ex rel. White v. Culver, 189 Ill. App. 141; Hohenadel v. Steele, 237 Ill. 229, 86 N. E. 717; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 67 L.R.A. 787, 71 N. E. 1077, 1 Ann. Cas. 256; Wohlford v. Burckhardt, 141 Ill. App. 321; Sullivan v. People, 224 Ill. 468, 79 N. E. 695.

The appellant waived all questions as to the jurisdiction of her person in the matter of the appeal, by failing to plead in abatement or by special motion to dismiss for want of jurisdiction of her person, and by proceeding to trial on the merits of the case.

Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Industrial Bd. 282 Ill. 136, 118 N. E. 483; Kinsella v. Cahn, 185 Ill. 208, 56 N. E. 1119; Franklin L. Ins. Co. v. Hickson, 197 Ill. 117, 64 N. E. 248; Metropolitan Trust & Sav. Bank v. Perry, 194 Ill. App. 277; Corbett v. Physician's Casualty Asso. 135 Wis. 505, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 177, 115 N. W. 365; State ex rel. Lane v. District Ct. 51 Mont. 503, L.R.A. 1916E, 1083, 154 Pac. 200.

The guardianship matter, being heard in the circuit court on appeal, was a trial de novo, therefore the burden of proof was on appellant.

Holcomb v. People, 79 Ill. 409; Gilkerson v. Scott, 76 Ill. 509.

Circumstances, humanitarian conditions, and particularly the paramount right of the surviving parent to have the custody of the person of his child, may justify the award to him.

Cummins v. Cummins, 29 Ill. 452; People ex rel. Good v. Hoxie, supra; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 67 L.R.A. 787, 71 N. E. 1077, 1 Ann. Cas. 256; Wohlford v. Burckhardt, 141 Ill. App. 321; Sullivan v. People, supra.

Duncan, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

William Nathan Stafford, defendant in error, and Kate Duggan, now deceased, were married in Oklahoma on October 29, 1907. John William Stafford was born to this union on August 28, 1908, and in 1913 defendant in error, with his wife and child, moved to Dalton City, Illinois, the former home of his wife. He retained some business interests in Oklahoma, and on February 21, 1917, while he was absent in Oklahoma on business, his wife filed in the circuit court of Moultrie county her bill for divorce and the custody of their child, charging that he was guilty of extreme and repeated cruelty to her, had been guilty of habitual drunkenness for more than two years last past, and was wholly unfit to have the care, custody, and education of the child. He employed an attorney at Dalton City and answered the bill, specifically denying all the charges therein contained, and the cause was continued to the September term, 1917. Defendant in error's attorney enlisted in the Navy before the September term of court and notified Stafford of that fact. He employed another attorney in Oklahoma, but the cause was tried at the September term during his absence, and he was found guilty of extreme and repeated cruelty and of habitual drunkenness, and that he was not a suitable person to have the care and custody of the minor child, and a decree granting the divorce was entered and the custody of the child awarded to the mother, who died November 3, 1917, leaving a last will and testament, by which she bequeathed and devised all her property to her minor son. The will provided that the court should appoint some suitable person who should have control of her estate willed to her son until he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and out of the income of the estate support, maintain, and educate him, and that such person should look after her son and satisfy himself that any money paid over to anyone for his use and benefit should be used for the purpose intended, and should from time to time, if practicable, visit her son at the expense of her estate, and satisfy himself that he was properly taken care of and educated.

Defendant in error was informed of the death of his wife, and came from Oklahoma to her funeral, and there for the first time learned that she had obtained a divorce from him and the custody of the child. On December 7, 1917, at the September term, 1917, he filed his motion in the circuit court, supported by affidavit, to open up the decree for divorce and the custody of the child, and for leave to introduce further testimony. On November 9, 1917, Mary Duggan, plaintiff in error, the sister of Kate Stafford, filed her petition in the county court of said county asking for the appointment of herself as the guardian of said child. Defendant in error received no official notice, but on said date appeared in person with his attorney and objected to the petitioner being appointed guardian, and the matter was set for hearing on November 17, 1917, eight days later. Before the day of the hearing defendant in error was called back to Oklahoma on urgent business, and, although his attorney applied for a further continuance, that cause was heard by the county court and Mary Duggan was appointed guardian of the person and property of the child; the petition being amended on the day of the hearing to show that the petitioner asked to be appointed guardian of the person as well as of the property of the child. The guardian was required to give bond in the sum of $30,000. The property of the ward was inventoried at a valuation of $19,200. Defendant in error perfected his appeal to the circuit court of said county from the order of the county court appointing such guardian, and a trial de novo was had March 8, 1919, and the circuit court confirmed the order of the county court and appointed Mary Duggan as guardian of the estate and person of said minor; the order and judgment of the court being based largely upon the decree and finding of the circuit court in the divorce proceedings, the decree at that time being in full force and effect and unmodified. At the same

March term defendant in error moved to open up this latter order and judgment, and for leave to introduce further testimony therein, and in support of the motion he alleged that the hearing of his motion to open up the decree for divorce and to have the same modified was pending for hearing in the circuit court for May 10, 1919. The motion was granted, and the further hearings of the appeal case and of the motion to modify the decree in the divorce suit were consolidated, of the court's own motion and for its convenience in properly disposing of both matters at one and the same time. On May 10, 1919, both causes were heard by the circuit court on the evidence, and the court modified the decree of the circuit court, striking therefrom the findings that the defendant was guilty of habitual drunkenness and was an unfit person to have the care and education of the child, and the order awarding the care and custody of such child to Kate Stafford, and inserting in lieu thereof the findings that he was not guilty of habitual drunkenness and was not given to excessive use of intoxicants, but is a sober, industrious citizen and a kind and indulgent father, having great affection for his son, and that he is a fit person to have the care, custody, control, and education of his son, and has been guilty of no act or conduct to forfeit his right as a father; and further modified the decree so as to provide that he should have the care, custody, control, and education of his son, but left the decree for divorce for extreme and repeated cruelty still standing, on that ground alone. In the appeal case in the matter of the appointment of a guardian, Mary Duggan was found a fit person to be guardian of the property of the minor and was appointed guardian of his property only. Mary Duggan excepted and perfected her appeal to the appellate court for the third district, and that court affirmed the decree of the circuit court, and also the order and judgment in the appeal case, at its April term, 1920. This court granted a writ of certiorari for further review of the record on error.

The main and controlling question on this record is whether or not defendant in error, the father, is a fit and suitable person to have the care, custody, control, and education of his child. This question arises between him and Mary Duggan, the plaintiff in error and aunt, of the child. The question as originally before the circuit court in the divorce proceeding was between defendant in error and his wife, Kate Stafford, the child's mother. That court was the first court to obtain jurisdiction to settle the question of the custody of the Courts—jurisdiction—custody of child. child, and there can be no sort of question of the right and jurisdiction of the court to dispose of the custody of the child in the divorce proceedings. That court not only had the right and the jurisdiction to settle the question in the first instance, but it continued to have the right to reconsider the question upon proper application, and to make changes in its order as to the custody of the child whenever new conditions warranted it under the evidence produced. This right to modify the decree as to the custody of the minor child from time to time, as shall appear reasonable and proper, is expressly given by § 18 of our Divorce Act, which has been sustained frequently by the decisions of this court. Hurd's Stat. 1917, p. 1076; Draper v. Draper, 68 Ill. 17.

"County courts in their respective counties may, when it shall appear necessary or convenient, appoint guardians to minors, inhabitants of or residents in the same county, and to such as reside out of this state and have an estate within the same, in the county where the real estate or some part thereof may lie; or if he has no real estate, then in any county where he may have personal property." Hurd's Stat. 1917, chap. 64, § 2.

By § 4 of this act it is provided that the guardian of a minor shall have, under the direction of the court, the custody, nurture, and tuition of his ward, and the care and management of his estate; but the parents of the minor, if living, and, in the case of the death of either, the surviving parent, they being respectively competent to transact their own business and fit persons, shall be entitled to the custody of the child and the direction of its education. Section 6 of the act expressly provides that "the guardianship of the infant's estate may be appointed to one, and the custody and tuition of the minor to another."

It was therefore competent for the county court to appoint Mary Duggan guardian of the property of the minor, and at the same time, by its order, give the father the custody of the person of the child and the direction of its education, had it chosen to do so and such order had been warranted by the evidence. It was entirely competent for the circuit court, either in the appeal case or in the divorce case (which were both heard by it at the same time), to make the order appointing Mary Duggan guardian of the property of the child and at the same time award the care, custody, control, and education of the child to the defendant in error, as it did do, if the evidence before it justified such order. The circuit court had not lost jurisdiction of the order in the divorce proceedings, as the motion of the defendant in error to open up that judgment was made at the same term of court in which the divorce decree was entered, and such motion was continued from time to time until its final disposition, May 10, 1919.

—when jurisdiction terminates.

Plaintiff in error makes the point in this court that the appeal bond in the appeal case was not filed in time, and that for that reason the circuit court had no jurisdiction of the appeal. The appeal was twice heard before the circuit court, and no such objection was made by plaintiff in error at either hearing, and therefore no such question can properly arise on this record. Grier v. Cable, 159 Ill. 29, 42 N. E. 395. It was also perfectly proper and competent for the court, of its own motion, to consolidate for one hearing the case on the appeal and the motion to modify the order in the divorce case. The main question in each case was principally one and the same, and the greater part of all of the evidence in one case was admissible on the main issue in the other case. It was a timesaver for the court and also for the parties, and neither party can possibly be prejudiced by such action, as the court announced that it would hear all of the evidence in both cases and consider the evidence in each case properly bearing on the issues therein.

Appeal—question raised for first time.

Trial—consolidation of cases.

We hold, upon the question whether or not this court is bound by the finding of the facts by the appellate court, that we are not so bound. The divorce proceeding is regarded as a chancery proceeding. In such a case, upon the simple question of divorce, the parties are entitled to a jury, and upon all the issues affecting the right of divorce the verdict of the jury is not advisory merely, but is binding upon the lower court, and consequently binding upon the appellate court and this court to the extent that it cannot be set aside unless it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. Upon the question of separate maintenance or of the custody of the child the rule is the other way, that is, a verdict of the jury would only be advisory, even though the questions arose in the same suit and upon an issue that would affect the right to a divorce, were that question alone to be decided. Berg,

Appeal—how far finding of facts binding in divorce proceeding.

Trial—finding of jury advisory—divorce proceeding.

v. Berg, 223 Ill. 209, 79 N. E. 13.

The only fact alleged against the competency and fitness of the defendant in error to have the custody, care, control, and education of his child, is the alleged fact that he is an habitual drunkard. The evidence in the record is overwhelmingly against the contention that the defendant in error is an habitual drunkard and an unfit person to have the care, custody, control, and education of his child. Five of his neighbors and citizens, four of whom had known him intimately for fifteen years in Oklahoma and the other of whom had known him intimately for eleven years, testified positively and unequivocally that they were acquainted with him, and had lived near him, and done business with him, and were acquainted with the people with whom he associated and did business. They further positively and unequivocally testified that they were acquainted with his general reputation in the vicinity where he lived as to being a sober, industrious, and law-abiding citizen, and that his reputation is good; also, that they personally knew that he was not a drunkard and not addicted to intemperance; that they never saw him drunk, but state that it is a fact that he occasionally took a drink of intoxicants; that for several years he had been in the stock business, and in the last three years had made good money in buying and selling horses and mules for our allies and for the government; that he is devoted to the child and has always provided well for his family; that his credit has always been good, and that he has at all times paid his debts; and that he is a fit and suitable person to have the custody, control, and education of his son. One of the witnesses was a banker at Beaver, Oklahoma, and had resided in the same vicinity with the defendant in error, formerly as a neighbor and farmer in the country and latterly as a neighbor and banker in the same town. The second witness was a merchant of the same town and a neighbor, who saw him several times a week. The third was a stock raiser, having the same intimate acquaintance with him. The fourth was his family physician, of the same intimate acquaintance with him and his wife; and the fifth was an abstractor. The testimony of these five witnesses is corroborated by the depositions of another set of witnesses from Oklahoma, ten in number, who appear to be substantial, reliable business men of various callings. Defendant in error was further supported in this particular by twelve apparently substantial and reliable citizens of Dalton City, Illinois, who knew him intimately while he lived in that city, which is also the residence of plaintiff in error and was the former residence of his wife. Several of the witnesses were relatives of the plaintiff in error.

20 A.L.R.—53.

Opposed to defendant in error's evidence, plaintiff in error only produced two witnesses who testified contrary to the witnesses of the defendant in error. The first was Henry Nichols, who testified, in substance, that the reputation of the defendant in error is that he is "addicted to the use of intoxicating liquor." On cross-examination he stated by way of explanation that when a man drinks intoxicating liquor he is addicted to the use of it. He further testified that he considered that everybody who drinks is wrong; that the people consider Stafford a jolly good fellow, and that about the worst witness can say against him is that he takes too much liquor; that he would not state that he was unfit to have the custody of his child. The other witness was George H. Wright, who testified that he is a teetotaler and that he had seen defendant in error drunk more times than he had fingers. He also stated that his reputation as a drinking man was bad, and that he is what is known as a confirmed drunkard. Although questioned repeatedly, he could not and did not state any time or place that he had ever seen him drunk.

He also stated that he did not think a man who drinks is capable of taking care of his children. He further testified that a man who had taken a drink of intoxicating liquor would be less competent to raise a child than if he had not taken a drink, and that his competency would be lessened as the amount and frequency of the drinking increased.

The sum and substance of our conclusions on the evidence in this record is that the evidence does not show that defendant in error is an habitual drunkard, or that he has been guilty of drinking liquor to excess at any period of time, but that he has for fifteen years been a man who has occasionally taken a drink of intoxicants. The evidence also shows that he has abstained from drinking almost entirely for the last two years. There is not a blemish on his character outside of the charge of taking an occasional drink, and there is no contention in this record to the contrary. This court would not feel warranted in holding that a man is utterly disqualified from having the care, control, and education of his children

Parent and child —right to custody of child
—effect of drinking liquor.

because of the fact that he has occasionally taken a drink of intoxicating liquor. If we were to adhere to that rule it would disqualify a very large per cent of men in this country in all of the occupations and professions in which men are engaged. Taking a drink of intoxicants in the presence of a child would be setting a bad example for it. So would smoking or chewing tobacco likewise be a bad example. It may be admitted that the occasional taking of a drink of liquor or the smoking or chewing of tobacco is not a special aid to a man or a recommendation, but we apprehend that no court would undertake to hold, as a matter of law, that either or both would absolutely disqualify a man from having the custody of his child, or be considered sufficient ground for giving the custody of his child to another who has no such habit or any other bad habit.

Under the evidence in the record, defendant in error is entitled to the custody, care, control, and education of his son as against plaintiff in error. He is its father and has the natural right to have such custody. As against him the plaintiff in error has no right whatever, under the law, to the custody of the child, no more than an absolute stranger, unless it can be shown that he has in some way forfeited his right. Under the evidence he is strongly attached to the child, and has always treated it kindly, and has been a good provider for it and his wife. As father of the child he has the right to its —right of father to custody of child.

custody as against the world, because there is no showing that he has forfeited such natural right. Sullivan v. People, 224 Ill. 468, 79 N. E. 695; Cormack v. Marshall, 211 Ill. 519, 67 L.R.A. 787, 71 N. E. 1077, 1 Ann. Cas. 256; People ex rel. O'Connell v. Turner, 55 Ill. 280, 8 Am. Rep. 645; 21 Cyc. 34.

Much stress is laid upon the fact that defendant in error is shown to have had no property in his name at one time before the divorce proceedings were begun and while he and his wife were living in Oklahoma. Defendant in error admits that fact and has not sought to explain it. He has, at no time, made any claim in this litigation for any of the property of his wife. He has frankly declared that he wants nothing except his child and is willing to support it, and he has shown that he is able to support it. He has accumulated about $4,000 worth of property since the period of time referred to when he had nothing. The explanation of his having no property at that time, if that fact is seriously to be considered, is that he had transferred it all to his wife. It does appear from the testimony of witnesses that both he and his wife homesteaded and each owned 160 acres of land in Oklahoma, and that he transferred his 160 acres to her, and that she owned it all at her death. There is no evidence that he could not and did not accumulate property. It certainly ought not to be taken against him in this suit that his wife was the benefactor of his accumulations before her death, and that he has not

—effect of absence of property.

seen fit to contest with his child for any of the property in his wife's name. The remainder of the property of which she died seised she inherited from her mother. Neither is there anything in the claim that the defendant in error has interfered with Mary Duggan in the collection of the rents from his wife's estate in Oklahoma. On the contrary, it positively appears that he paid $25 of the rent to her or for her that the tenant had not paid, and relied on the tenant to repay him, when he was under no obligation to do so. We may add that the mere fact that plaintiff in error —effect of fact that guardian has more property than father.

may have more money or property of every form than defendant in error,

or might be more thrifty in accumulating property of every form than defendant in error, is no legal reason for depriving him of the custody of his child.

It is also adverted to as a reason for giving the custody of the child to Mary Duggan that the child has expressed a preference for remaining with her. The undisputed testimony of the plaintiff in error is that, just before returning to Oklahoma after attendance at his wife's funeral, defendant in error bought a trunk for his child and made arrangements to take the child back with him, to which there was no objection. At the trial his son testified that he remembered when he lived with his father and mother in Oklahoma; that his father always treated him kindly and bought nice things for him; that he bought the trunk for him; that his father talked to him about going with him, but that he did not remember what he did tell his father then; that he has talked to his aunt sometimes about going with his father; that she talked to him two or three times about it and thought he was better off by staying with her, as she would treat him better; that he believed what she told him; that he has written several letters to his father since that time, and that his father has written several to him; that he loves his father and loves his Aunt Mary and wants to live with her; and that he likes to go to school where he now goes and to play with the children there. In a very doubtful case the wish of the child is to be considered and given weight, but we do not think that the wish of the child in this case should have any great weight in determining the question of custody. The testimony of the child is that he may be equally satisfied to remain with his father after he goes with him, and that he does not have any serious objection to going with his father and will not be seriously grieved by being separated from his aunt.

—weight to be given preference of child.

It is argued that defendant in error is a resident of Oklahoma, and that it is against the policy of the law of this state and the holdings of this court that the father should be allowed to take his child to his home out of the jurisdiction and control of this court. The cases of Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43, Alford v. Bennett, 279 Ill. 375, 117 N. E. 89, and other such cases, are referred to as authority for this statement. In the Miner Case there was a question between the father and mother as to the custody of their child, and this court held that when the aid of the court is thus invoked it will not permit the one or the other to remove the child beyond its jurisdiction. The reason for the rule in that case was that the parties both had a natural right to the custody of the child, and neither would be allowed to entirely deprive the other of his or her parental right of seeing and visiting the child. In this case there is no reason for such a rule. Plaintiff in error has no natural right to the custody of the child or to visit it. Defendant in error has the natural and legal right to the custody of the child and to take it to his own domicile. No court, as against his right, ought to say that it will retain jurisdiction of the child and deny him its custody simply because of the fact that the child has property in this state in the hands of the guardian of its property. To deny the right of the father to his child under such circumstances would be to deny him a civil and legal right without any just ground whatever. The thought of a father having his legal and civil right to the possession of his child thus denied by a court would be simply intolerable. The right of this child to its property can be just as legally and just as effectually guarded by this court if the child lives with its father in Oklahoma as it can if it lived in Illinois. No legal or natural right of Mary Duggan will be taken away from her by giving the custody of the child to its father. None of the legal or political rights of the child will be taken away from it by allowing its father to take it home with him. Its father's domicile is now its domicile; the mother being dead. A guardian by nature, or a testamentary guardian, may in good faith change his ward's domicile from one state to another, or from one county to another county in the same state. As respects natural guardians, this doctrine amounts to no more than that the domicile of the parent is the domicile of the child. 21 Cyc. 63; Cummins v. Cummins, 29 Ill. 452; Mercein v. People, 25 Wend. 64, 35 Am. Dec. 653; Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige, 596, 28 Am. Dec. 451; Re Benton, 92 Iowa, 202, 54 Am. St. Rep. 546, 60 N. W. 614; Lamar v. Micou, 112 U. S. 452, 28 L. ed. 751, 5 Sup. Ct. 221.

-keeping child within jurisdiction of court.

Guardian and ward—right to change domicile of ward.

An examination of these authorities will show that the power of a court to prevent the removal of an infant out of the state by its natural or testamentary guardian should be exercised only in extreme or special cases, where such interference is necessary to prevent the guardian from working a fraud upon the infant by depriving it of the enjoyment of its full right of succession to property belonging to it. No such wrong can possibly be inflicted upon the child in question by his father, as the property is to remain in the custody of the local guardian and subject to the jurisdiction of the county court to see to its proper distribution. We are mindful of the fact that the interests of this child should be controlling in this case. Defendant in error has secured or arranged for a good home for his child in Oklahoma, where it will have the advantages of good, Christian influence and the benefit of good schools, and where he can be with it and personally look after it; and it is our conclusion, taking all matters into consideration, that it is for the best interest of the child to be in the custody of its father. Alford v. Bennett, supra, above cited by plaintiff in error, has no application to this case.

-interest of child controls.

Decisions of this court have been cited by plaintiff in error to the effect that where a divorce has been granted against the father for his fault, and he has thus caused the breaking up of the family, the mother, the other natural parent, will be decreed the custody of the child when she is shown to be a proper person for such custody. That rule does not go to the extent of giving a preference over the father to another person who has not the natural right to the child, after the mother has died, where the evidence shows that the father is a competent and fit person to have the custody of his child.

-effect of divorce for father's fault on right of stranger.

It is contended that defendant in error is guilty of perjury because of the fact that he stated that in Judge Meese's family, where he had arranged to board with his child, there were only two boys, and that they were grown and were away from home, having enlisted for the war. We do not think the record warrants any such charge against him. He voluntarily produced Judge Meese as a witness in this case for him. Judge Meese did say that he had some boys in his family of the ages of seven years and upward, but he also said that these boys were "working out" and his two oldest boys were enlisted in the Army. The testimony also discloses that defendant in error made his arrangements with Mrs. Meese and that Meese sent him to his wife for that purpose. Her testimony is not in the record, and there is no showing in the record that he did not have that understanding with her. The fact that the small boys were away from home at work is no doubt the reason for defendant in error thinking that there were no small boys at home. We are satisfied that defendant in error did not make any intentional misstatement of the facts, as he afterwards introduced Judge Meese to prove the very facts he had stated concerning his arrangement to have his child make his home there. It clearly appears that the children of Judge Meese are unobjectionable companions for defendant in error's child.

We have already recited the substance of Kate Stafford's will with reference to the disposition of this child. It contains no testamentary disposition of the child. It does not undertake to give the custody of the child to Mary Duggan, but merely asks the county court to appoint a guardian for the child. Besides, the final decree of the circuit court awarding the custody of the child to defendant in error divested all right of Kate Stafford to make a testamentary disposition of the awarding custody of child

Judgment—
—effect on right to make testamentary disposition.

child. That decree, as modified and as affirmed by the appellate court, vested the right of the custody in the father, and neither Mary Duggan nor anyone else, can assert any legal authority over the child by virtue of the will. In fact, the will of Kate Stafford seems to contemplate that the custody of her child would go to her husband. Defendant in error claims that Kate Stafford told him, in substance, that if she died she wanted him to have the custody of the child, as he would treat it better than anyone else. Plaintiff in error claims that she told her the same thing, in substance, just before she died. Whatever may be the facts in that regard, the wish or desire of Kate Stafford can have no positive significance in this case, as she did not have the right, under the divorce decree as it now stands, to dispose of her child. Plaintiff in error has established by this record that she is an entirely fit and competent person to have the care and custody of the child. There is no ground or claim for any other view of the matter so far as the question of her personal fitness is concerned, but the natural and legal right to the custody of the child belongs to the father, and he has done nothing to forfeit it.

By all the competent evidence in the record we think it clearly appears that the Circuit Court and the Appellate Court have correctly and properly disposed of the questions involved in this case, and the judgment of the Appellate Court ought to be, and is, affirmed accordingly.

Petition for rehearing denied.

ANNOTATION.

Nonresidence as affecting one's right to award of custody of child.

- I. Scope, 838.
- II. In general, 838.
- III. Preference of resident over nonresident custodian, 840.
- IV. Choice of father as child's custodian as affected by his residence, 841.
- V. Consideration of child's welfare if put in custody of nonresident, 842.
- VI. Award of child's custody to one known or believed to intend removing it beyond the court's jurisdiction, 844.

I. Scope.

As its title indicates, the purpose of this annotation is to show the consideration paid by the courts to the nonresidence of one seeking the custody of a child as a factor in the awarding of such custody. The effect in one state of a decree or order made in another state in respect of the custody of a child is not within the scope of the annotation, except as the court may have considered the element of nonresidence in determining whether the custody of the child should be awarded to the person to whom it was awarded by the foreign order or decree, or to another. The question excluded, so far as it involves the recognition and effect in one state of a provision for the custody of a child in an order or decree in a suit for divorce in another state, is treated in the annotation following Geary v. Geary (Neb.) ante, 809.

II. In general.

In judicial appointments of custodians for children, the residence, actual or prospective, of the appointee, is now a factor of minor importance,—a subordinate consideration. Although residence is not wholly ignored, it has become, in modern times at least, altogether a secondary element, influencing the court in deciding whether or not to appoint an applicant. The primary questions to be answered before that of residence arises, when a child's custodian is to be named, relate to the conservation and promotion of its interests; the safety of its estate; its welfare and happiness in a changed environment; the fitness, ability, and suitability of the proposed custodian to be intrusted with the child's care, education, and maintenance; the age, sex, and circumstances of the child, and the comparative claims of kinship to it among those from whom the choice of custodian must be made. It is only when all these questions have been satisfactorily answered in favor of the applicant that the question of residence is considered by the court, in the light of its advantages and disadvantages as a dwelling place for the child. If, then, these are favorable, the mere fact that the home is located outside of the state seems to be immaterial.

The power, when unrestrained by statute, of a court vested with jurisdiction of the subject, to appoint, when necessary, a nonresident custodian of a resident child, is everywhere conceded.

A court of competent jurisdiction in the premises, if unhampered by a statute, may commit an infant to the guardianship of a nonresident under a given set of circumstances. Speight v. Knight (1847) 11 Ala. 461.

The residence without the state, of a mother who seeks the custody of her child in the domestic courts, is no obstacle to an order awarding her such custody. Adams v. Adams (1864) 1 Duv. (Ky.) 168.

Nothing short of a statutory inhibition will abridge the power of the chancellor to award the custody of an infant to whomsoever its welfare and happiness demand, whether the proposed custodian does or does not reside within the state. Workman v. Workman (1921) 191 Ky. 124, 229 S. W. 379.

It is not an indispensable prerequisite to the appointment of a parent as tutor or tutrix for his or her own child that the appointee be domiciled in Louisiana. Gaines's Succession (1890) 42 La. Ann. 699, 7 So. 788.

The court, in Miner v. Miner (1849) 11 Ill. 43, adverting, in a divorce case, to a purpose of the wife, if given the custody of the child of the marriage, to take it out of the state, said: This cannot be tolerated and must be guarded against. While the mother is given the custody of the child, the father must not be wholly deprived of its society, and must be allowed access to it on all reasonable occasions. The child is a ward of court, and it would be a contempt of court for either parent to attempt to alienate its affections from the other; an abuse which the court would consider it a solemn duty to prevent. (The question, however, as to whether one to whom the custody of a child is awarded may properly remove it from the jurisdiction, or as to the consequences of doing so, is not within the scope of the annotation.)

A surviving parent whose fitness is unquestioned, and after the other parent is dead, is entitled to the custody of a child as against its grandparents, despite nonresidence and a purpose to remove the child out of the state. Wilson v. Mitchell (1910) 48 Colo. 454, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 507, 111 Pac. 21; Rallihan v. Motschmann (1918) 179 Ky. 180, 200 S. W. 358; Barnes v. Long (1909) 54 Or. 548, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 172, 104 Pac. 296, 21 Ann. Cas. 465.

The courts of South Carolina have held that they have jurisdiction to award the custody of minor children whose best interests and welfare demand it, to suitable and proper persons who may reside in other states. Ex parte Martin (1834) 11 S. C. Eq. (2 Hill) 71; Ex parte Davidge (1905) 72 S. C. 16, 51 S. E. 269; Hartley v. Blease (1914) 99 S. C. 92, 82 S. E. 991; Jennings v. Anderson (1920) 114 S. C. 506, 104 S. E. 189; Watkins v. Rose (1921) 115 S. C. 370, 105 S. E. 738.

If it be granted that one who seeks the custody of a child is qualified in law to be its custodian; that he or she is a fit and proper person to have its custody, able and willing adequately to care and provide for it; that the child's interests will be safe and its welfare assured if the seeker shall be intrusted with its keeping; and if the circumstances are such as to incline the court favorably towards the sought-for appointment,—the mere fact that the person under consideration for custodian does not reside within, or purposes soon to leave, the jurisdiction of the court, does not, unless there is a statute to the contrary, restrict the exercise of the court's discretion to designate him or her as custodian.

The chancellor may, and in a proper case should, award the custody of an infant to its nonresident parent. Workman v. Workman (1921) 191 Ky. 124, 229 S. W. 379.

A judge having statutory power to appoint guardians for incompetent persons, and not restricted by statute to the appointment of residents of the state, may, at discretion, appoint a nonresident such a guardian, in given circumstances making for its propriety. Berry v. Johnson (1866) 53 Me. 401.

A court of competent jurisdiction, if not hampered by statute, may give the care and custody of a child of divorced parents to a parent who resides out of the state. Stetson v. Stetson (1888) 80 Me. 483, 15 Atl. 60.

The court in this case, referring to the Maine statute conferring authority on a court decreeing a divorce to award either parent the care and custody of a child of the marriage, said: "We find no qualification or restraint of the power given, except such as may be imposed by the sound discretion of the justice presiding. That the result of the decree may cause the removal of the child beyond the limits of the state is not of itself an objection. This may be the effect in any case. Though the parent receiving the custody may at the time be a resident within the state, there is no authority, except in cases of crime, to prevent an immediate removal from the state." Ibid.

Afterwards, these views were approved and adopted by another court in Griffin v. Griffin (1920) 95 Or. 78, 187 Pac. 598.

In a case where guardians had been appointed in Ireland for Irish infants there domiciled, brought up, and educated, with fortunes in court in England, Lord Langdale, Master of the Rolls, adopted the proceedings in Ireland and appointed the same persons guardians, with authority to receive the maintenance money notwithstanding they resided out of the jurisdiction. Daniel v. Newton (1845) 8 Beav. 485, 50 Eng. Reprint, 191.

On the petition of one as next friend of two infant daughters of his brother who had died intestate residing in Ireland, the mother, who resided permanently in England, was, with her own consent, by Lord Chancellor Ashbourne, removed from her office as guardian of the girls, and the petitioner, an Irish resident, was appointed guardian in her stead. Re Lemons (1887) 19 L. R. (Ir.) 575.

The appointment of a nonresident guardian for a resident minor is not void, but at most only irregular, and is good until revoked in a proper proceeding. Martin v. Tally (1882) 72 Ala. 23.

III. Preference of resident over nonresident custodian.

As a rule, a court, in appointing a guardian for an infant, even where no statute has placed any restriction on its power of choice, will prefer a resident to a nonresident. Speight v. Knight (1847) 11 Ala. 461.

Granting the judicial power to award the custody of a child in habeas corpus proceedings to one purposing to remove it out of the United States, to a foreign country, that power ought not to be used except upon clear and satisfactory proof that the best interests of the child require it to be exercised. Mahon v. People (1905) 218 Ill. 171, 75 N. E. 768.

Although it may not be improper, in given circumstances, to award the custody of an infant child to a nonresident parent as against the other parent, yet such an award ought not to be made pending an appeal in a divorce litigation. Page v. Page (1914) 166 N. C. 90, 81 S. E. 1060.

The primary consideration being the welfare and advantage of the infant in the appointment of a guardian, a court, having to choose between two candidates for the office equally worthy, made choice of one not related, with whom the child lived and enjoyed school, church, and social privileges, and to whom it had become attached, in preference to the other, a relative who resided out of the state. Willet v. Warren (1904) 34 Wash. 647, 76 Pac. 273.

The orphans' court in Philadelphia, having a second application by a minor over fourteen years old for the appointment of another guardian, a resident of Philadelphia, in place of one residing elsewhere who had been named, but had not given the required bond, granted the request, saying: "Were we to consider nothing but the personal fitness of the minor's first nominee, or had security been entered, we should be disposed to refuse the present petition; but as we entertain the opinion that it is a better and safer practice not to approve a minor's choice of a guardian residing out of the county, we decide to allow the minor to choose the guardian named in the petition before us. It is perhaps a sufficient reason that the statutes relating to attachments do not enable us to direct that process without our jurisdiction, and we ought not at the outset to sanction a selection which makes this remedy nugatory. . . . But there is an additional consideration moving us to our present decision. All our powers relating to guardians are statutory, and we think that they are to be ascertained by that canon of construction which declares that powers granted must be set forth in express terms or by necessary implication, and that they are not given merely because they are not forbidden. It is not forbidden to us to appoint a guardian who resides in another county, but we are not authorized to make such an appointment. . . . There may be cases where the true interests of the minor could not be promoted by the appointment of a guardian residing in the county; such cases are exceptions, . . . and . . . we hold the rule by which our judicial discretion should be guided to be that we will not approve of selections of guardians whose domicils are without our jurisdiction." Hanbest's Estate (1875) 11 Phila. (Pa.) 63, 32 Phila. Leg. Int. 135.

In the past the English courts of chancery were prone to insist upon residents of England as custodians of children, whenever they were called upon to appoint a custodian. Lord Eldon, on being asked to name a guardian living in Edinburgh for infants who resided in Scotland, each having an income for maintenance of £20 a year, denied the request, saying someone residing in the jurisdiction of the court must be appointed,—that there must be someone answerable to the court. Logan v. Fairlee (1821) Jacob, 193, 37 Eng. Reprint, 822, 3 L. J. Ch. 152, 23 Revised Rep. 28.

About a score of years afterwards it was held in another case that, although Scotch testamentary tutors and curators by parental appointment of a child born and domiciled in Scotland, but temporarily dwelling in England, might have the exclusive control and administration of all its property, and be fully accountable to the Scotch courts, yet they could have no authority over the child in England, or power there to protect it, and were not entitled, by virtue of either the parental deed or international law, to be confirmed or appointed guardians in England. Johnstone v. Beattie (1843) 10 Clark & F. 42, 8 Eng. Reprint, 657, 7 Jur. N. S. 1023. That case arose upon a bill in chancery filed by the child's grandfather, an Englishman, in the name of the infant, praying that the child be made a ward of court and be prevented from returning to Scotland, where it was born of Scottish parents, but brought to England upon considerations of health by the mother, and there left an orphan after a sojourn of three years. The House of Lords (two law judges dissenting) held, affirming the decision of the court below, that there was jurisdiction of the suit, and that the court was constrained to appoint resident English guardians of the infant, notwithstanding her domicil and entire estate were in Scotland, and her father had, by a deed there executed in due form, appointed as her guardians sundry Scots who had qualified as tutors and curators, and who still survived. The power of chancery to appoint a non-resident who might be otherwise qualified and worthy, as guardian of a resident infant, jointly with a suitable person residing permanently within its jurisdiction, was conceded in the last-cited case.

Vice Chancellor Stuart, being later called upon to name in England a guardian there for the infant daughter of an expatriated Englishman, naturalized in the United States and married there to an American wife, the mother of the child, both parents being dead, and the infant having been clandestinely brought to England by a paternal aunt, while recognizing the validity of an appointment by the surrogate of New York county of an American maternal aunt as guardian of the infant, nevertheless declined to appoint her as such solely in England, but did appoint her jointly in association with the English aunt and a disinterested English gentleman, with liberty, after usual and proper inquiries in his court respecting the age, fortune, and relations of the infant, to submit a plan for her residence, maintenance, and education. Re Dawson (1854) 2 Smale & G. 199, 65 Eng. Reprint, 364, 1 Jur. N. S. 37, 2 Week. Rep. 314.

IV. Choice of father as child's custodian as affected by his residence.

It is ancient tradition of the common law that a father is the natural guardian of his child, and has ordinarily the superior right to its custody. In general this right is unimpaired by the father's nonresidence.

The custody, however, of the children of divorced parents, is not determined solely by the legal rights of the parents. These are entitled to due consideration, but there are several other important factors in the matter. Campbell v. Campbell (1875) 37 Wis. 206.

It is not a good reason for refusing a father who is a fit and suitable person in every other respect the custody of his own child on habeas corpus; where the welfare and interest of such child does not require it to remain where it may be, that the father does not reside in the state, and intends to take his child to his home in another state. Ex parte Davidge (1905) 72 S. C. 16, 51 S. E. 269.

A father who has divorced his wife, and who lives in another state, and is a man of good character and a proper person to have the custody of his minor son, should not be required to give security to bring his son back into the jurisdiction and abide the order of court as a condition of being awarded the custody of such son. Parrish v. Parrish (1914) 116 Va. 476, L.R.A. 1915A, 576, 82 S. E. 119.

As between a resident sister and a nonresident father of a girl in her teens, conceding the father to be a proper person to have the custody of his child and to have the ability to care for her, and taking into consideration the welfare and happiness of the child, the discretion of the court, in awarding her to her father in habeas corpus proceedings, will not be interfered with on the ground that the father resides out of the state. Hammond v. Murray (1921) 151 Ga. 816, 108 S. E. 203.

As against maternal grandparents, the mother being dead, a nonresident father, if a proper and suitable person, is entitled to the custody of his child and to take it out of the state. Rallihan v. Motschmann (1918) 179 Ky. 180, 200 S. W. 358.

The custody of a child of parents living apart will not be awarded on habeas corpus to its mother if she is a nonresident of the state of the forum, and the husband is domiciled in that state and a proper person to be custodian, and it does not appear that the child will be benefited by transferring it to the mother. Harris v. Harris (1894) 115 N. C. 587, 44 Am. St. Rep. 452, 20 S. E. 187.

A divorced wife who had been given the custody pendente lite of her infant son, but not by the final decree, who married again and removed to another state, is not entitled to recover the child on habeas corpus in the state where the marriage was dissolved, from the father domiciled in still another state, where both parents temporarily were sojourning in the first state, since the child's home is with his father. Lanning v. Gregory (1907) 100 Tex. 310, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 690, 123 Am. St. Rep. 809, 99 S. W. 542.

Upon default being made in a divorce suit, and a decree being in order for the husband, his counsel moved for an order awarding the custody of the children to their grandfather, as the father was a railway engineer employed in India, but Mr. Justice Wilde, judge ordinary, replied: I cannot do that, but I will make the order to the father or his agent, which will serve your purpose equally well. Ling v. Ling & Prior (1866) 13 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 683.

V. Consideration of child's welfare if put in custody of nonresident.

In modern times it has come to be the established rule that, in awarding the care and custody of children to other persons, the welfare and interest of the child is the paramount consideration, and to it all others must yield. That rule has governed in many cases in which was involved the question of residence of the proposed custodian. The rule was applied to deny to an aunt domiciled abroad the custody of a girl in her early teens whom it was purposed to take away, where the child was living in the home of worthy people who had been kind to her and were capable of caring properly for her, and whom she had loved from her infancy. Mahon v. People (1905) 218 Ill. 171, 75 N. E. 768.

If no statute prohibits, a nonresident parent should be awarded the custody of an infant child upon proving its custodian morally unfit and its environment bad. Workman v. Workman (1921) 191 Ky. 124, 229 S. W. 379.

The court may allow a parent to whom it awarded the custody of a child in a divorce suit to take the child to another state or country, should the welfare of such child require or be promoted by its removal. Re Krauthoff (1915) 191 Mo. App. 149, 177 S. W. 1112.

Conceding the power of the court to appoint a nonresident general guardian of the person and estate of a resident infant over fourteen years of age, whose father resided in a distant state, and was charged to be lacking in ability and integrity for the trust, and where the person nominated by the infant resided without the state and his fitness for the office was challenged, the court having the appointment under consideration was of the opinion, in the case in hand, that the welfare of the infant would be subserved best by the appointment of another person who was fit and disinterested. Johnson v. Borden (1885) 4 Dem. (N. Y.) 36.

It has been held error for a trial court which granted a divorce to the wife, and the custody of her infant son, to forbid her to take the boy beyond the limits of the state, where the father was unfit to be intrusted with the child, and the allowances for alimony and support were inadequate, and the mother's parents resided in another state, so that her own and her child's welfare might require her to return and dwell with her parents and among her friends. Griffin v. Griffin (1898) 18 Utah, 98, 55 Pac. 84.

In Re Alderman (1911) 157 N. C. 507, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 988, 73 S. E. 126, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 232, a father divorced in Florida by a decree in favor of his wife which awarded to her the custody of his child, but allowed him to visit such child and the child to visit him in turn, sought in North Carolina the enforcement of that right of visiting and of entertaining the child, his wife having taken up her abode with her father in North Carolina, and carried the child with her there to reside. The North Carolina courts refused the relief sought chiefly because they held it inimical to the welfare of the child to grant the father's prayer. The fitness of the father to have the custody of the child in preference to the mother was found against him, and then the court declared: "The child is now a citizen of North Carolina, and as such peculiarly under its guardianship, and the courts of this state will not remand it to the jurisdiction of another state, especially where, as in this case, it is so manifestly against the true interests of the child."

In South Dakota, in recent years, the supreme court was confronted with the dilemma of deciding which of two divorced parents should have the custody of their seven-year old daughter for the entire school year. Both parents were considered proper persons to have such custody. The father's home was in Illinois, the mother's in New Jersey. The court held that the best interests of the child required it to remain in one school the entire school year, and therefore left it in the mother's custody for the time being. Wallace v. Wallace (1916) 26 S. D. 229, 128 N. W. 143.

In Virginia a father who resided in Tennessee was refused the custody of his daughter, thirteen years old, who lived with her maternal grandparents, where she was contented and healthful, and was well cared for, when the evidence showed that, after several attempts to live in Tennessee, she was, while there, continually ill. Hutchinson v. Harrison (1921) — Va. —, 107 S. E. 742.

In Re Boyd [1917] 2 Ir. R. 98 (distinguishing Re O'Hara [1900] 2 Ir. R. 232) a mother who was a professional nurse without a permanent home, and whose husband's whereabouts were unknown, on habeas corpus, sought to obtain her son, aged thirteen years, from her sister, in whose care she had left the boy; she purposed taking her son to live in a foreign country; but the court, after examining the boy in chambers, refused the mother his custody, because it concluded that it would be for the child's benefit to leave him where he was.

VI. Award of child's custody to one known or believed to intend removing it beyond the court's jurisdiction.

It will be noted that in the reported case (STAFFORD v. STAFFORD, ante, 827) the custody of the child is awarded to the nonresident father, notwithstanding that the court assumes that the father will remove the child to his home. That has probably been the assumption in most of the cases in which the custody of the child was awarded to a nonresident. The point, however, has been emphasized in some of the cases.

It has been said that the argument that awarding the custody of a child to its father, a nonresident, would be in effect the permission of a court to take the child out of its jurisdiction, is unfounded upon any good reason. Rallihan v. Motschmann (1918) 179 Ky. 180, 200 S. W. 358.

The fact that a father seeking the custody of his child after the death of its mother resides in a distant state, and intends to take the child to his home, does not militate against his right to have the custody of such child. Brem v. Swander (1911) 153 Iowa, 669, 132 N. W. 829.

The circumstance that a father seeking the custody of his child, after the death of his divorced wife, who had been awarded it by the decree, purposes to take the child out of the state, to his home in another state, does not militate against giving him the custody as against other persons, where he is not unfit. Ex parte Barnes (1909) 54 Or. 548, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 172, 104 Pac. 296, 21 Ann. Cas. 465.

The fact that a mother seeking from her husband's parents the custody of her son after her husband's death, where he had a divorce awarding him the child, intends to take the boy out of the United States to live in England, affords no reason why the courts should deny her the possession of the child. Wilson v. Mitchell (1910) 48 Colo. 454, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 507, 111 Pac. 21.

The refusal of a trial court to take from a divorced mother the custody of a boy twelve years old awarded to her in early infancy, and transfer him to his father, where the mother had married again and contemplated removal to another state with her husband, taking her son along, cannot be deemed an abuse of its discretion reviewable on appeal, where the contesting parties are equally able and willing to support and educate the boy, and are both of good moral character, and the child's welfare does not require a change of guardianship. Darnall v. Mullikin (1856) 8 Ind. 152.

To the contention that the court was without jurisdiction in a habeas corpus proceeding to order minor children into a foreign jurisdiction, the domicil or prospective domicil of their father who sought their custody, the court replied: Without reference to the merits of this cause, it would hardly be contended that this court would be impotent to aid a father to recover the custody of his child illegally detained in this state, merely because he intended to take it to his home in another state. Ex parte Davidge (1905) 72 S. C. 16, 51 S. E. 269.

The right of a mother to continue to have the custody of her children awarded her in a decree of divorce from their father is unaffected by the circumstance that she has married again, a British subject, and has thus lost her American citizenship, where she continues to make her home within the state. Gillett v. Bryant (1917) 203 Ill. App. 322.

Mr. Justice Brewer, writing for the Kansas supreme court in a habeas corpus proceeding resulting in an award of the custody of an orphan girl to her grandmother in England, said: I cannot agree with counsel that it is never the province of the court to expatriate a citizen. In some cases I think the duty to do so is clear and absolute. Nevertheless it is a matter always to be considered. With pardonable partiality we look upon our own land, its laws, institutions, and social life as the best; and not lightly should a child be deprived of the benefit of them. Yet we may not ignore the fact that the mother country is a land of liberty and law, of education and social refinement, of morality and religion; and it would be wrong to make the matter of expatriation an excuse for depriving this little girl of that which would promote her welfare. Further, the grandmother has been appointed by the courts of England the guardian of this little girl, and if now this petition is granted she will pass under the special care of those courts, the faithfulness of whose watch in cases of this kind is a matter of universal recognition. Re Bullen (1882) 28 Kan. 781.

An objection to an award of the custody of a child of divorced parents to the mother after the father's death, on the ground that she intended to take the child out of the United States to bring it up in England, was made in Wilson v. Mitchell (1910) 48 Colo. 454, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 507, 111 Pac. 21, and overruled. The court disposed of it by saying: Plaintiffs in error assert that where other things are equal, this court should choose to make of an American boy an American citizen rather than a British subject, and that he be educated as an American, and not as an Englishman. Permitting him to be taken to England will not necessarily change his citizenship. He is American born, and must remain an American citizen until he reaches an age of maturity, and determines for himself that he shall make a change of his allegiance, or, at least, until such change occurs by some procedure recognized by the courts. "If this child were to be taken to some country governed by a despot, or where liberty under the law was not an inalienable right of a citizen, or where there were no educational advantages, or where its education would be contrary to Anglo-Saxon traditions, the objection to expatriation would require grave and serious consideration and might be insurmountable. But we take judicial notice of the fact that the Kingdom of Great Britain is a government of liberty and law, and its people accustomed to receive educational and social advantages equal to those obtainable in the United States."

But in Percy v. Provan (1840) 15 La. 69, the courts of Louisiana were held unable to give effect to and enforce a testamentary provision for a tutor of the testator's minor child, with a direction to deport it to a foreign country to live with its grandparents, because the laws of the state did not allow the expatriation of an infant under tutelage of a resident tutor.

In Nannestad v. Nannestad (1921) 44 S. D. 241, 183 N. W. 541, the court refused a father the custody of his infant son, who lived with his maternal uncle and wife, and was well cared for and regarded by them with affection, because the father was afflicted with pulmonary tuberculosis, and was about to go to California to live, and had no home of his own.

Although the question whether the child should be permitted to leave the jurisdiction as distinguished from the question as to the award of the custody of a child to a nonresident is not within the scope of the annotation, it may be noted here that the English courts generally have long been loath to allow infants and other wards to leave the Kingdom, even temporarily, and where persuasive considerations of comfort, economy, education, or health appeared in favor of such a course, and when departure was allowed, the courts usually required the parent or guardian to give security for the child's or ward's return to the jurisdiction when required. Jeffrys v. Vanteswarstworth (1740) Barnard. Ch. 141, 27 Eng. Reprint, 588; Creuze v. Hunter (1790) 2 Cox, Ch. Cas. 242, 2 Ves. Jr. 157, 30 Eng. Reprint, 113, 570, 2 Revised Rep. 38; Mountstuart v. Mountstuart (1801) 6 Ves. Jr. 363, 31 Eng. Reprint, 1095; DeManneville v. DeManneville (1804) 10 Ves. Jr. 65, 32 Eng. Reprint, 767, 7 Revised Rep. 340; Anonymous (1821) cited, Jacob, 265, 37 Eng. Reprint, 849 (and said in note to Stephens v. James (1833) 1 Myl. & V. 627, l. c. 631, 39 Eng. Reprint, 821, to be Jackson v. Hankey); Wellesley v. Wellesley (1828) 2 Bligh, N. R. 124, 4 Eng. Reprint, 1078; 1 Dow, & C. 152, 6 Eng. Reprint, 481; Stephens v. James (1833) 1 Myl. & K. 627, 39 Eng. Reprint, 820, supra; Lethem v. Hall (1834) 7 Sim. 141, 58 Eng.

Reprint, 790; Biggs v. Terry (1836) 1 Myl. & C. 675, 40 Eng. Reprint, 535; Campbell v. Mackay (1836) 2 Myl. & C. 25, 40 Eng. Reprint, 550; Johnstone v. Beattie (1843) 10 Clark & F. 42, 8 Eng. Reprint, 657, 7 Jur. N. S. 1023; Re Jones (1844) 1 Phill. Ch. 461, 41 Eng. Reprint, 707; Re Stair (1846) 1 Coop. t. Cott. 227, 47 Eng. Reprint, 832; Dawson v. Jay (1854) 3 DeG. M. & G. 764, 43 Eng. Reprint, 300, 2 Week. Rep. 366; Re Agar-Ellis (1878) L. R. 24 Ch. Div. 317, 53 L. J. Ch. N. S. 10, 50 L. T. N. S. 161, 32 Week. Rep. 1, 13 Eng. Rul. Cas. 30; Re Callaghan (1884) L. R. 28 Ch. Div.

(Eng.) 186, 54 L. J. Ch. N. S. 292, 52 L. T. N. S. 7, 83 Week. Rep. 157; Ex parte Preston (1847) 5 Dowl. & L. (Eng.) 233, 17 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 21, 2 Saund. & C. 169, 11 Jur. N. S. 1039; Re Plumley (1883) 47 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 283; Stuart v. Moore (1861) 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. (Eng.) 1, 9 Week. Rep. 722, 7 Jur. N. S. 1129, 4 L. T. N. S. 382.

The courts of Ireland have likewise manifested reluctance to permit wards to be taken out of the country. Re Medley (1871) Ir. L. R. 6 Eq. 339; Re Birch (1892) Ir. L. R. 29 Eq. 274; Re Hackett (1854) 3 Ir. Ch. Rep. 375.

J. B. G.

SHUBERT THEATRICAL COMPANY

v.

GEORGE RATH et al., Appts.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit — February 16, 1921.

(271 Fed. 827.)

Contract — fairness — appearance under rival management.

1. A contract providing that a theatrical performer shall not, during the term of his employment by the other contracting party, publicly appear under any other management or in connection with a rival company, is not unfair.

[See note on this question beginning on page 861.]

Injunction — against breach of contract — unique theatrical performance.

2. Injunction lies to prevent one who has contracted to render services in giving a theatrical performance of an extraordinary and unique nature for the other contracting party, and not to render them for any other, from breaching the contract by performing for another.

[See 14 R. C. L. 386; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 223.]

— when damages are irreparable.

3. Damages for breach of a contract for personal services which can be estimated only by conjecture, and not by any accurate standard, are irreparable within the rule giving equity jurisdiction to restrain the breach.

Contract — mutual — employment of actor.

4. A contract binding a theatrical manager to employ an actor for at least twenty weeks in a year at a stipulated salary, and binding the actor to perform for that number of weeks at the salary stated exclusively for the manager, is not void for lack of mutuality so as to prevent the issuance of an injunction against its breach.

[See 14 R. C. L. 389; see also note in 9 A.L.R. 1480.]

— closing option — mailing reply.

5. The mailing of a letter exercising an open option to employ another's services for a specified time, properly stamped and addressed, closes the contract.

[See 6 R. C. L. 613.]

Definition — "option."

6. An option when based on sufficient consideration is a contract by which one binds himself to sell property or perform services, and leaves it discretionary with the other to take the property or accept the services on the terms specified.

[See 6 R. C. L. 603.]

Option — acceptance by mail.

7. One having a right to exercise in writing an option to secure the services of another who may, when the acceptance is exercised, be in another city, may communicate the acceptance by mail.

[See 6 R. C. L. 606.]

— mistake in date — effect.

8. An exercise of an option to secure services from September to September is not void because of the misuse of the word "October" for "September," if it is stated to be "in accordance with the terms of the contract."

Sunday — contract for Sunday theatrical performance — validity.

9. A contract for Sunday performance of a theatrical nature in places where such performances are permitted by law is not invalid.

[See 25 R. C. L. 1434.]

— performance for twenty weeks.

10. An agreement to render theatrical performances for twenty weeks is not a contract to perform on Sunday.

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York (Manton, Cir. J.) in favor of complainant in a suit brought to enjoin defendants from performing for any manager other than complainant, and from performing in any other theater or place of public amusement, or in any other company except that of complainant until the expiration of the term mentioned in an agreement made between them. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Argued before Ward, Rogers, and Hough, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Nathan Burkan for appellants.

Messrs. William Klein and Charles H. Tuttle, for appellee:

Plaintiffs are not seeking specific performance, but merely an injunction against the breach of an express negative covenant.

McCall Co. v. Wright, 198 N. Y. 143, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 91 N. E. 516; Hoyt v. Fuller, 47 N. Y. S. R. 504, 19 N. Y. Supp. 962; Duff v. Russell, 39 N. Y. S. R. 266, 14 N. Y. Supp. 134, affirmed in 133 N. Y. 678, 31 N. E. 622; Cincinnati Exhibition Co. v. Marsans, 216 Fed. 269; Philadelphia Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 58 L.R.A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627, 51 Atl. 973; Guffey v. Smith, 237 U. S. 101, 59 L. ed. 856, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526; Stocker v. Wedderburn, 3 Kay & J. 393, 69 Eng. Reprint, 1162, 26 L. J. Ch. N. S. 713, 5 Week. Rep. 671; Standard Fashion Co. v. Siegel-Cooper Co. 30 App. Div. 564, 52 N. Y. Supp. 433, affirmed in 157 N. Y. 60, 43 L.R.A. 854, 68 Am. St. Rep. 749, 51 N. E. 408; Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Union Buttonhole & Embroidery Co. 1 Holmes, 253, Fed. Cas. No. 12,904; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 24 Fed. 516; Lacy v. Heuck, 12 Ohio L. J. 209; Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phill. Ch. 52, 41 Eng. Reprint, 861, 1 Coop. t. Cott. 72, 10

Jur. 60; 2 High, Inj. § 1166; Warren v. Ray County Coal Co. 200 Mo. App. 442, 207-S. W. 883.

The evidence amply established the fact that the services of the defendants were extraordinary and unique; and the finding of the trial judge based thereon, and on his own view of their performance, should not be disturbed.

Bijur Motor Lighting Co. v. Eclipse Mach. Co. 156 C. C. A. 298, 243 Fed. 600; Brookheim v. Greenbaum, 141 C. C. A. 89, 225 Fed. 763; Comstock v. Lopokowa, 190 Fed. 599; Edwards v. Fitzgerald, N. Y. L. J. Jan. 16, 1895, p. 949; Daly v. Smith, 6 Jones & S. (N. Y.) 158; Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ward, 24 Abb. N. C. 393, 9 N. Y. Supp. 779; Philadelphia Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 58 L.R.A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627, 51 Atl. 973; Shubert v. Angeles, 80 App. Div. 625, 80 N. Y. Supp. 146.

The defense of illegality by reason of any breach of the Sunday observance law must be pleaded, in order to be available.

Re Rule, 178 Iowa, 184, 159 N. W. 699; Finley v. Quirk, 9 Minn. 194, Gil. 179, 86 Am. Dec. 93; Riech v. Bolch, 68 Iowa, 526, 27 N. W. 507; Chlein v. Kabat, 72 Iowa, 291, 33 N. W. 771; Ray v. Catlett, 13 B. Mon. (Ky.) 532; Roop v. Roop, 35 Pa. 59; Fox v. Mensch, 3 Watts & S. 444; Herndon v. Henderson, 41 Miss. 584.

The contract is not illegal on its face, but its alleged illegality must depend upon certain alleged extraneous facts. Since those facts are not pleaded, the defense of illegality is not available to the defendants.

Fish v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. 211 N. Y. 374, 105 N. E. 661; Frank V. Strauss & Co. v. Hammerstein, 152 App. Div. 128, 136 N. Y. Supp. 613; Nelson v. A. H. Woods Prod. Co. N. Y. L. J. Jan. 9, 1913; 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 389; Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 115, 86 Am. Dec. 292; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Lowenstein, 171 App. Div. 137, 157 N. Y. Supp. 5; Zenatello v. Hammerstein, 231 Pa. 56, 79 Atl. 922; Quast v. Fidelity Mut. L. Ins. Co. 226 N. Y. 270, 123 N. E. 494; Milbank v. Jones, 127 N. Y. 370, 24 Am. St. Rep. 454, 28 N. E. 31; Drake v. Siebold, 81 Hun, 178, 30 N. Y. Supp. 697.

The contract as renewed did not necessarily require the performance of any prohibited act on Sunday in violation of any Sunday observance law, and therefore was not void.

Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 115, 86 Am. Dec. 292; Zenatello v. Hammerstein, 231 Pa. 56, 79 Atl. 922; Nelson v. A. H. Woods Prod. Co. N. Y. L. J. Jan. 9, 1913; Frank V. Strauss & Co. v. Hammerstein, 152 App. Div. 128, 136 N. Y. Supp. 613; 37 Cyc. 568; Kelly v. London Pavilion, 77 L. T. N. S. 215; Goddard v. Morrissey, 172 Mass. 594, 53 N. E. 207; Bergere v. Parker, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 170 S. W. 808.

The plaintiff proved both an oral and a written notice of renewal.

Treat v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 108 C. C. A. 98, 185 Fed. 760.

The plaintiff is not prevented by anything in the complaint or the record from showing its oral exercise of the option.

Hovey v. American Mut. Ins. Co. 2 Duer (N. Y.) 554; Fowler v. Martin, 1 Thomp. & C. 317.

Irrespective of the oral notice of renewal, and irrespective of the evidence of the receipt of the written notice of renewal, the incontestable fact that this written notice was duly mailed shows a complete compliance with the provisions of the contract relating to the option on defendants' services for another year.

Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; White v. Corlies, 46 N. Y. 467; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511; Mactier v. Frith, 6

Wend. (N. Y.) 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Taylor v. Merchants' F. Ins. Co. 9 How. 390, 13 L. ed. 187; Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 50 L. ed. 1057, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 924.

The notice of June 7, 1920, is not vitiated by the typographical error of inserting "October 1st" instead of September 1st.

29 Cyc. 1124; 1 McAdam, Land. & T. p. 60; People ex rel. Gleahill v. Schackno, 48 Barb. (N. Y.) 551; Burns v. Bryant, 31 N. Y. 453.

Even if the notice of June 7 were defective or ineffective in itself, the conversations and correspondence of July 15 constituted acquiescence by the defendants in its sufficiency and in a renewal of the contract.

Leslie v. Robie, 84 N. Y. Supp. 289.

Rogers, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff corporation is organized under the laws of the state of New York, is in business as a theatrical manager and producer of plays, and for a number of years last past was and still is engaged in producing plays and attractions at various theaters in the city of New York. It likewise presents plays on the road in a tour of the United States and Canada and among the plays so produced is one known as "The Passing Show of 1919," in which the defendants appear.

The plaintiff on July 8, 1919, entered into a written agreement with the defendants by the terms of which the plaintiff engaged them to render their exclusive services to it for a period of one year commencing from September 1, 1919. It was agreed therein that the defendants should appear at all times as directed by the plaintiff during the year, and it was guaranteed that they should be employed for twenty weeks in the minimum, and their salary was fixed at the sum of $250 per week while appearing in the city of New York and $275 per week while on the road. It was further provided that the plaintiff had an option on the services of the defendants for the theatrical year beginning September 1, 1920, and ending September 1, 1921, provided plaintiff gave notice of its desire to exercise such option prior to July 1, 1920. If the plaintiff exercised the option reserved to it, the agreement provided that the guaranty of twenty weeks should again apply for the period, but that the salary should be $300 per week while appearing in the city of New York and $325 per week while appearing on the road. On June 7, 1920, the plaintiff, pursuant to its option, employed the defendants for the year beginning on September 1, 1920. Notwithstanding this, the defendants advised the plaintiff that they refused to perform according to their agreement; and it appears that they have contracted with a rival manager to appear in a production to be presented in a rival theater in the city of New York.

An injunction is asked to restrain the defendants from performing for any managers other than the plaintiff, or from performing in any other theater or place of public amusement, or in any other company, except that of the plaintiff, until the expiration of the term mentioned in the agreement made between the plaintiff and the defendants. The court below granted the injunction as prayed.

The contract is found in a letter addressed by the plaintiff to the defendants and signed "Shubert Theatrical Company, by J. J. Shubert." Then follows:

We have read the foregoing. The same contains our full understanding, and, with our signatures at the bottom hereof, let this be deemed a contract between us.

Geo. & Dick Rath,
by Geo. H. Rath.

The letter (contract) contains the following: "You [the defendants] agree throughout the term hereof that you shall not render your services, nor will you appear publicly for any other firm or corporation, whether moving pictures or otherwise, without our written consent first had and obtained, and shall you attempt to appear for any other management or in moving pictures, we shall have the right to apply to any court having competent jurisdiction for an injunction restraining your appearance, and you agree, for the purpose of such lawsuit, that your services are extraordinary and unique, and you cannot be replaced, except for Morris Gest."

20 A.L.R.—54.

The performances which the defendants contracted to give are acrobatic in character. The testimony shows that their feats are unique and extraordinary. A prominent theatrical manager and producer of wide experience, and not associated with the plaintiff, testified. One of the feats of the defendants' performances, as he described it, is that one of the defendants, with one hand, raises the other defendant, a full-grown man, from the floor, his body being stretched at full length upon the floor. The witness, in describing it, said this was done without apparent effort, "just as easy as you would lift a straw." In reply to a question by the court, he declared: "It is a fact that it is the most marvelous thing that has ever been before."

He added that it had never before been done with a grown-up man in the history of this country. Another theatrical manager, of whom defendants' counsel said, "I will concede that he is a great manager and producer, and cannot be equaled in the theatrical business," and who was asked by the court whether the performances of the defendants were unique and unusual, answered, "Absolutely." He added that he did not know of any imitator in the world. Another theatrical producer, having an experience of nearly thirty years and who is widely known, testified that their performance was "absolutely unique and extraordinary."

This is an excerpt from his testimony:

One of the moves they make is taking a man underneath his body; and raising him right over his shoulder, and standing him up straight on his hands, something that has never been done, as long as my experience has been in the show business. I have never seen anything like it.

Q. Are you an athlete yourself?

A. I am.

Q. And do these features impress you as being peculiarly difficult?

A. It has never been done as long as I remember seeing anything in the show business.

Q. Yes. Do you know from your experience whether it would be possible to replace that act by other people?

A. Absolutely impossible.

The finding of the trial court that the performances of the defendants are unique and unusual is amply justified by the testimony. The services of the defendants are extraordinary, unique, and cannot be replaced.

These services were to be given to the plaintiffs exclusively, and the contract contains an express negative covenant that they would not be given under any other management during the period named. By

Injunction—against breach of contract—unique theatrical performance.

a negative covenant the covenantor promises that something shall not be done. The relief appropriate to a breach of such a contract is an injunction. The leading authority, as respects covenants of personal service, is the well-known case of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De G. M. & G. 604, 42 Eng. Reprint, 687, 21 L. J. Ch. N. S. 898, 16 Jur. 871, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 652. In that case a famous singer agreed to sing in the opera house of the complainant for a certain time, and not to sing for anyone else during that time. The opinion in that case reviews the authorities and contains what is regarded as a very able and convincing discussion of the principle applicable in such cases. As the services contracted for were those of a person possessing special and extraordinary qualifications, Lord Chancellor St. Leonards granted an injunction restraining the defendant from singing at any other theater than that belonging to the plaintiff. It was held that the fact that the court would have been unable to enforce specifically the defendant's affirmative covenant to sing at the plaintiff's theater did not affect the complainant's right to an injunction to restrain a violation of the negative covenant not to sing elsewhere.

In McCaull v. Braham (C. C.) 16 Fed. 37, Judge Addison Brown continued an injunction restraining Lillian Russell from the breach of a negative covenant not to sing in comic opera during the season at any other than the plaintiff's theater. In addition to the negative covenant, the contract contained an affirmative covenant to sing in the employment of the plaintiff whenever required. In the course of his opinion Judge Brown said: "Contracts for the services of artists or authors of special merit are personal and peculiar; and when they contain negative covenants which are essential parts of the agreement, as in this case, that the artists will not perform elsewhere, and the damages, in case of violation, are incapable of definite measurement, they are such as ought to be observed in good faith and specifically enforced in equity. That violation of such covenants will be restrained by injunction is now the settled law of England."

In Cincinnati Exhibition Co. v. Marsans (D. C.) 216 Fed. 269, the complainant had employed defendant as a ball player for a certain specified period, and defendant had covenanted not to render similar service to others during the continuance of the contract. An injunction issued to prevent the breach of the negative covenant. The court, by Judge Sanborn, said: "It is a settled rule of law that where a person agrees to render services that are unique and extraordinary, and which may not be rendered by another, and has made a negative covenant in his agreement whereby he promises not to render such service to others, the court may issue an injunction to prevent him from violating the negative covenant in order to induce him to perform his contract. The facts of this case seem to me to bring it under this rule."

In Philadelphia Ball Club v. Lajoie, 202 Pa. 210, 58 L.R.A. 227, 90 Am. St. Rep. 627, 51 Atl. 973, it was held that, where a baseball player had contracted to play with a particular club for a certain term, he would be enjoined from playing with another club during the continuance of the term, where the evidence showed that he was an expert player in any position, and had a great reputation among the patrons of the sport for his ability and skill.

In Pomeroy on Specific Performance, p. 31, the principle is stated as follows:

"Where one person agrees to render personal services to another, which require and presuppose a special knowledge, skill and ability in the employee, so that in case of a default the same services could not easily be obtained from others, although the affirmative specific performance of the contract is beyond the power of the court, its performance will be negatively enforced by enjoining its breach."

The basis upon which the decisions rest in all such cases is that the damages for the breach of such contracts cannot be estimated with any certainty, and the employer cannot, by means of any damages, purchase the same services from others. The injury in such cases is irreparable. Damages which can be estimated in cases of this class only by conjecture, and not by any accurate standard, constitute such an irreparable injury as courts of equity will restrain by injunction.

In 5 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence, § 289, p. 518, it is said that the doctrine of Lumley v. Wagner has been generally accepted, both in England and in this country, upon a similar state of facts. The author also states that "the most frequent application has been in cases of actors and actresses of established reputation. Contracts for their services often stipulate that they shall not perform elsewhere during their engagement with a particular manager. Their services being extraordinary and special, an injunction is generally granted against the breach of such a stipulation. It will likewise be granted when an artist agrees to work for the complainant and for no one else."

In the argument in this court counsel for the defendants insisted that the contract between the parties is so lacking in equitable mutuality that a court of equity should not enforce it. We are not impressed by the argument. The contract binds the complainant to give the defendants employment for at least twenty weeks in the theatrical year, "not necessarily consecutive," for which the plaintiff is bound to pay a certain specific amount. The contract also binds the defendants to render their services to the plaintiff for a like number of weeks at least, and to do so for the specified salary. That there is mutuality of obligation in such an agreement is too plain for controversy, and mutuality of obligation is sufficient to justify the issuance of an injunction to restrain the breach of the agreement if the services to be rendered are unique, special, or extraordinary, and the contract be not otherwise inequitable or oppressive. Whether the contract is inequitable or oppressive will be considered in a subsequent part of this opinion.

An application for an injunction in a case like this does not depend, as counsel for the defendants in his argument in this court seemed to think, upon the principle applicable to cases for specific performance. It is not necessary in the present case for us to inquire as to what the mutual—employment of actor.

Contract—

—when damages
are irreparable.

doctrine of mutuality means in cases of specific performance. There is a distinction between actions brought to compel the specific performance of an affirmative covenant and those which are brought to restrain by injunction the breach of a negative covenant in the same agreement. It is familiar doctrine that courts of equity do not exercise their jurisdiction to grant the remedy of an affirmative specific performance of a contract for personal services. This they decline to do, because they cannot in any direct manner compel an actor to act or a singer to sing. But the rule is established in England and in this country that the courts of equity may restrain by injunction the breach of a negative covenant by which an actor or a singer of unusual gifts has agreed not to act or not to sing in a specified period, except under the management of the other party to the contract. That this may result or may not result in indirectly compelling the specific performance of the affirmative covenant is not a matter with which this court needs in the present case to concern itself. There has been a great difference of opinion, especially in the English courts, over the question whether an injunction can issue to prevent the breach of a contract unless it contains an express negative covenant. But with that question also we are not concerned in this case, as the contract here involved does contain an express negative covenant. It is sufficient for our present purpose that a distinction exists between suits brought to compel specific performance of an affirmative covenant for personal services, and suits brought to restrain by injunction the violation of a negative covenant respecting such services. McCall Co. v. Wright, 198 N. Y. 143, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 91 N. E. 516.

The contract gave the plaintiff an option to renew its contract for the theatrical year from September 1, 1920, to September 1, 1921, provided it gave defendants notice in writing or orally of its desire to exercise such option prior to July 1, 1920. If the option was not exercised according to its terms, the contract has expired, the defendants have not violated it, and no injunction can issue.

The testimony shows that Mr. Shubert, the vice president of the plaintiff corporation, and who had full charge of such matters, dictated to his stenographer on June 7, 1920, a letter exercising the option; that she typed it and then handed it to Shubert, who signed it and gave it back to her; that she then handed it, properly addressed, to the head of the mailing department in the Shubert office, telling her that it was important and to mail it herself; and that the latter person stamped it and herself mailed it on the same day in a regular United States government postoffice box. The letter was mailed in a Shubert envelop having a return address stamped on it, and it was never returned for nondelivery. The letter was addressed to defendants, in care of the Detroit Opera House, Detroit, Michigan, where the defendants were engaged for the week beginning on that day.

The court below has found as a fact that the letter was written and mailed. We concur with him in that finding. The court also said that in writing and mailing the letter the plaintiff did all that was required of it under the contract. In that proposition we also fully concur; the letter having been written prior to the expiration of the option. Prior to that time the defendants are deemed in law to have been making to the plaintiff a continuing offer, and the mailing of the letter was an acceptance of it. An option, when based on a sufficient consideration, is a contract by which one binds himself to sell property or perform services, and leaves it discretionary with the other to take the property or accept the services on the terms specified. In such a contract two elements exist: First, the offer to sell or to render service which does not become a contract until accepted; second, the completed contract to continue the offer or leave it open for the time named. Black v. Maddox, 104 Ga. 157, 162, 30 S. E. 723.

—closing option
—mailing reply.

Definition—
"option."

An option is said in Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. v. Rhea, 60 C. C. A. 103, 123 Fed. 11, to be nothing more than a continuing offer to sell. In Standiford v. Thompson, 68 C. C. A. 425, 430, 135 Fed. 996, it is defined as "an unaccepted offer to sell," and it is said to be "a continuing offer until the expiration of the time limited." In McMillan v. Philadelphia Co. 159 Pa. 142, 28 Atl. 220, it is said that an option is an unaccepted offer, which becomes a binding contract when the holder of the option signifies that he accepts the offer within the time fixed. And an option is defined in Adams v. Peabody Coal Co. 230 Ill. 469, 82 N. E. 645, as a continuing offer, which the offerer may not withdraw until the expiration of the time limited. In Rease v. Kittle, 56 W. Va. 269, 49 S. E. 150, it is said that "an option contract to purchase is but a continuing offer to sell." In 35 Cyc. 56, it is said that an option is a continuing offer or contract by which the owner stipulates with another that the latter shall have the right to buy the property at a fixed price within a certain time. And see Ganss v. J. M. Guffey Petroleum Co. 125 App. Div. 760, 110 N. Y. Supp. 176, 177; Sizer v. Clark, 116 Wis. 534, 93 N. W. 539; Snider v. Yarbrough, 43 Mont. 203, 115 Pac. 411; Bates v. Woods, 225 Ill. 126, 80 N. E. 84; John v. Elkins, 63 W. Va. 158, 59 S. E. 961.

The law is settled that, if a letter accepting an offer is made in the manner either expressly or impliedly indicated by the party making the offer, it makes no difference whatever that the letter is never received because of some mistake of the postoffice authorities, or through accident in transmission, or because in some way it becomes lost. Patrick v. Bowman, 149 U. S. 411, 37 L. ed. 790, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 811, 866; Taylor v. Merchants' F. Ins. Co. 9 How. 390, 13 L. ed. 187; Burton v. United States, 202 U. S. 344, 384-386, 50 L. ed. 1057, 1072, 1073, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 688, 6 Ann. Cas. 362; Mactier v. Frith, 6 Wend. 103, 21 Am. Dec. 262; Vassar v. Camp, 11 N. Y. 441; Trevor v. Wood, 36 N. Y. 307, 93 Am. Dec. 511; White v. Corlies, 46 N. Y. 467; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Mercer Electric Mfg. Co. v. Connecticut Electric Mfg. Co. 87 Conn. 691, 89 Atl. 909; Perry v. Mt. Hope Iron Co. 15 R. I. 380, 2 Am. St. Rep. 902, 5 Atl. 632. The law of England is to the same effect, Brogden v. Metropolitan R. Co. 2 App. Cas. 666, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 94; Re Imperial Land Co. L. R. 15 Eq. 18, 42 L. J. Ch. N. S. 372.

It is necessary, therefore, to inquire whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff had a right to use the mails for the purpose of communicating its exercise of its option. The plaintiff was expressly authorized by the defendants to exercise the option in writing orally. We think that this gave it the right to communicate by mail its written acceptance of the offer. Authorization to communicate acceptance by mail is implied in two cases:

Option—acceptance by mail.

(1) Where the post is used to make the offer, and says nothing as to how the answer is to be sent.

(2) Where the circumstances are such that it must have been within the contemplation of the parties that according to the ordinary usages of mankind the post might be used as a means of communicating the acceptance. Henthorn v. Fraser [1892] 2 Ch. 27, 61 L. J. Ch. N. S. 373, 66 L. T. N. S. 439, 40 Week. Rep. 433; Carey v. Roots, 5 Alberta L. R. 125, 21 West L. R. 795, 2 West Week. Rep. 678, 5 D. L. R. 670; Ellis v. Block, 187 Mass. 408, 73 N. E. 475; Campbell v. Beard, 57 W. Va.

501, 509, 50 S. E. 747. See 13 C. J. p. 300, § 116.

Where authority is given to accept in writing an offer which was made orally, the offeree has a right to understand, in our opinion, that he is at liberty to send his answer by post; and if he incloses the writing in an envelop properly stamped and addressed, and deposits it either in the postoffice or in a street letter box, which is a part of the postoffice system for the transmission of mail, he has done all that is required. Wood v. Callaghan, 61 Mich. 402, 1 Am. St. Rep. 597, 28 N. W. 162.

It appears, however, that the written notice which was deposited in the mails was not in all respects accurate. The notice was in the following form:

June 7, 1920.

Dear Sirs:—In accordance with the terms of our contract dated July 8, 1919, we hereby notify you that we exercise our option for your services to continue with us, commencing October 1, 1920, and expiring on October 1, 1921, at salary as contained in said contract.

Very truly yours,

Shubert Theatrical Company,
by J. J. Shubert.

Rath Bros. Passing Show, Detroit
Opera House, Detroit, Michigan.
JJS/HC

Under the contract the period of renewal, as before pointed out, was from September 1, 1920, to September 1, 1921. The notice as given substituted "October" for "September." But the notice distinctly described itself as a renewal "in accordance with the terms of our contract" "at salary as contained in said contract." The mention of "October" for "September" was a pal-

—mistake in
date—effect.

pable slip, which could have misled no one, and which did not vitiate the notice. Where a contract is specifically mentioned in a notice given under it, the terms of the contract are controlling. A notice given under a contract is to be construed according to the intention of the contract. 29 Cyc. 1124.

Counsel for defendant insisted in this court that the contract is illegal and cannot be enforced, because it requires the defendants to give acrobatic performances in the city of New York on Sundays, the giving of which is prohibited by the Penal Law of the state of New York (Consol. Laws, chap 40). Section 2143 of that law is as follows: "All labor on Sunday is prohibited, excepting the works of necessity and charity. In work of necessity or charity is included whatever is needful during the day for the good order, health or comfort of the community."

Section 2152 of the law expressly mentions acrobatic performances among the performances the rendition of which on Sunday is declared unlawful and punishable as a misdemeanor. The provision is found in part in the margin.¹

The statute of 29 Charles II. chap. 7, 1676, seems to have laid the foundation for the Sunday observance laws of England and of those in this country. It provided in its first section that "no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever shall do or exercise any worldly labor, business or work of their ordinary callings, upon the Lord's Day, or any part thereof (works of necessity and charity only excepted)."

In 27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 389, it is said that "at common law judicial proceedings only were prohibited on Sunday. A person was not prohibited from doing his ordinary labor on Sunday, and the making of contracts was lawful."

¹ "The performance of any tragedy, comedy, opera, ballet, farce, negro minstrelsy, negro or other dancing, wrestling, boxing with or without gloves, sparring contest, trial of strength, or any part or parts therein, or any circus, equestrian or dramatic performance or exercise, or any performance or exercise of jugglers, acrobats, club performances or rope dancers on the first day of the week is forbidden; and every person aiding in such exhibition, performance or exercise by advertisement, posting or otherwise, and every owner or lessee of any garden, building or other room, place or structure, who leases or lets the same for the purpose of any such exhibition, performance or exercise, or who assents to the use of the same, for any such purpose, if it be so used, is guilty of a misdemeanor. . . ."

In 37 Cyc. 545, it is also said that "at common law all business other than judicial proceedings could be lawfully transacted on Sunday."

In Frolich on the Law of Motion Pictures & Theater, p. 391, it is said: "Sunday was not a dies non under the common law, and all regulations respecting the observance of Sunday and the prohibition of particular lines of activity are purely of statutory creation."

The law as above stated is supported by a number of court decisions. See Heisen v. Smith, 138 Cal. 216, 94 Am. St. Rep. 39, 71 Pac. 180; Ward v. Ward, 75 Minn. 269, 77 N. W. 965; Merritt v. Earle, 29 N. Y. 116, 86 Am. Dec. 292; Boynton v. Page, 13 Wend. 429; Eden v. People, 161 Ill. 296, 32 L.R.A. 659, 52 Am. St. Rep. 365, 43 N. E. 1108; Marengo v. Rowland, 263 Ill. 531, 105 N. E. 285, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 198. In Richardson v. Goddard, 23 How. 28, 42, 16 L. ed. 412, 417. Mr. Justice Grier, of the Supreme Court of the United States, calls attention to the fact that in England formerly the courts sat even on Sunday, and that contracts made on that day were not regarded as void till the statute of 29 Charles II. chap. 7 (not 27, as he erroneously states), was enacted.

We assume that, in the absence of a statute, participation in innocent amusements on Sunday is lawful. We also assume that contracts to perform on Sunday something prohibited by statute are void. It has been held that, where a contract provides for the performance on Sunday of acts prohibited by the statute, the entire contract is void, and no recovery can be had for the part performance on a secular day. Stewart v. Thayer, 170 Mass. 560, 49 N. E. 1020; Handy v. St. Paul Globe Pub. Co. 41 Minn. 188, 4 L.R.A. 466, 16 Am. St. Rep. 695, 42 N. W. 872; Williams v. Hastings, 59 N. H. 373.

The contract here involved, as expressly stated in its opening paragraph, is an engagement of the exclusive services of the defendants at any place or places that the plaintiff designates in the United States of America and Canada. So far as Sunday performances are referred to, the contract provides as follows: "In states where Sunday performances are expressly permitted by law, you agree to appear and perform."

And it also provided that "we have the right to the use of your services in any theaters wherein we shall give Sunday concerts, and you shall appear and play in such concerts whenever we shall give you two (2) days' notice prior thereto of our desire to have you appear and naming the place where. Should you be out of the city of New York if such notice reaches you, you shall pay your expenses to the city where said concert is given and the return to your city of engagement."

An examination of these clauses shows not only that the parties did not agree to violate any Sunday observance statute, but that the intention was that there should be no performances by the defendants on such days, except in states where Sunday performances "are expressly permitted by law." The two clauses of the contract relating to Sunday performances must be read together, and they in no way bind the defendants to ap-

Sunday—contract for Sunday theatrical performance—validity.

appear anywhere in violation of any Sunday law. The reference to the city of New York, found in the second clause, is not a reference to that city as a place of performance, but as fixing the length of notice. If the plaintiff undertook to require the defendants to perform on Sunday in any state where such performances are prohibited by statute, the defendants would have been under no obligation to appear, and their refusal would not have involved any breach of contract.

An agreement to perform for twenty weeks is not an agreement to perform on Sunday. Goddard v. Morrissey, 172 Mass. 594, 53 N. E. 207. In Kelley v. London Pavilion, 77 L. T. N. S. 215, where a music hall artiste engaged to perform "every evening," this was held to mean "every evening on which the music hall may be legally opened and the artistes called upon to perform." In Zenatello v. Hammerstein, 231 Pa. 56, 79 Atl. 922, the plaintiff had bound himself to sing certain operas "each day of the week" in New York and elsewhere in the United States. The court said the law would not presume that the parties intended an unlawful thing. The presumption was that the plaintiff would not be required to sing on Sundays, except in places where such singing was permitted; and in the instant case it cannot be said that the contract in any way violates the Sunday observance law of the state of New York.

It certainly will not be claimed by anyone that there is anything intrinsically immoral or any immoral tendency connected with an athletic performance such as that given by these defendants. In this connection it is interesting to note a decision under the Sunday law of Missouri. The statute prohibited horse racing, cock fighting, or playing cards or games of any kind on Sunday. The statute was construed in St. Louis Agri. & Mechanical Assn. v. Delano, 37 Mo. App. 284. In an opinion written by Judge Seymore D. Thompson, he said that "this court is of opinion that this prohibition is against games of chance or other games of an immoral tendency, and that it does not involve a prohibition of athletic games or sports, which are not of an immoral tendency, but which tends to the physical development of the youth, and are rather to be encouraged than discouraged."

The case was affirmed by the supreme court in 108 Mo. 217, 18 S. W. 1101.

But it is said that a court of equity does not grant an injunction to prevent the breach of a negative covenant where the contract is inequitable, or harsh, or in any way oppressive. We do not dispute the statement. It is not applicable to the particular contract under review. We have examined its provisions with care, and we have failed to discover that it contains anything which can be regarded as unfair, oppressive, or in any way inequitable. It guarantees to the defendants a salary for the year of the renewal of at least $6,000, with a possible maximum of $16,900. In accordance with its provisions and during the first year of the contract the defendants received from the plaintiff over $10,000.

During the year of the renewal the defendants were to receive a larger salary, and might realize in that year about $28,000, or $29,000 from the contract. The salary paid them was three times the salary received by the usual acrobatic performers. There is nothing unusual or unfair in the provision that during the period of their engagement with the plaintiff the defendants are not publicly to appear under another management or in connection with a rival company. The contract was not induced by fraud or misrepresentation. The defendants made it of their own free will and with full knowledge of all that it contained. Contracts are made to be kept, and not broken, and the parties who make them are in duty and in law bound to perform them. The injunction should issue as prayed.

Decree affirmed.

NOTE.

The validity and enforceability of restrictive covenants in contracts of employment are the subject of the annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1456, which is supplemented by the annotation following MENTER Co. v. BROCK, post, 861.

Contract—fairness—appearance under rival management.

MENTER COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

ARTHUR M. BROCK et al., Respts.

Minnesota Supreme Court — December 24, 1920.

(147 Minn. 407, 180 N. W. 553.)

Injunction — against breach of contract — absence of damage.

The employee, upon entering the service, agreed that, for a certain period after the service ceased, he would not, directly or indirectly, engage in the same business as the employer in the city. Within the prescribed period he engaged in a like business in the city. In this action to enjoin him from working in the new employment, plaintiff failed to show that it had sustained or was likely to sustain irreparable damage on account of his conduct, and for that reason the dismissal ordered when plaintiff rested was right.

[See note on this question beginning on page 861.]

Headnote by HOLT, J.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Hennepin County (Waite, J.) dismissing an action filed to enjoin defendants from carrying on the same business in which plaintiff was engaged. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Kingman, Cross, & Cant and Henry W. Haverstock, for appellant:

A restrictive covenant forbidding an individual from carrying on a business within a single town is not unreasonable.

Kronsnabel-Smith Co. v. Kronsnabel, 87 Minn. 230, 91 N. W. 892; Southworth v. Davison, 106 Minn. 119, 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 769, 118 N. W. 363, 16 Ann. Cas. 253; Holliston v. Ernston, 124 Minn. 49, 144 N. W. 415.

The restriction is not more extensive than the protection of plaintiff's interests requires.

Owl Laundry Co. v. Banks, 83 N. J. Eq. 230, 89 Atl. 1055; American Ice Co. v. Lynch, 74 N. J. Eq. 298, 70 Atl. 138.

Plaintiff, by the contract, was given the right to elect whether it would sue for damages at law, or in equity for injunctive relief, and insists that the negative covenant be observed and the contract performed.

Watrous v. Allen, 57 Mich. 362, 58 Am. Rep. 363, 24 N. W. 104; Simms v. Burnette, 15 Ann. Cas. 697, note; Ropes v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; Smith v. Bergengren, 153 Mass. 236, 10 L.R.A. 768, 26 N. E. 690; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464, 13 N. E. 419; Zimmerman v. Gerzog, 13 App. Div. 210, 43 N. Y. Supp. 339; A. L. & J. J. Reynolds Co. v. Dreyer, 12 Misc. 368, 33 N. Y. Supp. 649; Stees v. Kranz, 32 Minn. 313, 20 N. W. 241; American Ice Co. v. Lynch, 74 N. J. Eq. 298, 70 Atl. 138; Harris v. Theus, 149 Ala. 133, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 204, 123 Am. St. Rep. 17, 43 So. 131; Bradshaw v. Millikin, 173 N. C. 432, L.R.A.1917E, 880, 92 S. E. 161; Grant County v. Allphin, 152 Ky. 280, 153 S. W. 417; Wills v. Forester, 140 Mo. App. 321, 124 S. W. 1090; Gillis v. Hall, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 342.

Mr. William B. Anderson, for respondents:

The employment of defendant Brock as the manager of plaintiff's establishment created no such intimate relationship with its customers as to warrant the issuance of an injunction.

H. W. Gossard Co. v. Crosby, 132 Iowa, 155, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1115, 109 N. W. 483; Osius v. Hinchman, 150 Mich. 603, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 393, 114 N. W. 402; Strowbridge Lithographic Co. v. Crane, 20 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 24, 35 N. Y. S. R. 474, 12 N. Y. Supp. 899; Burney v. Ryle, 91 Ga. 701, 17 S. E. 986; Simms v. Burnette, 55 Fla. 702, 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 389, 127 Am. St. Rep. 201, 46 So. 90, 15 Ann. Cas. 690; Hahn v. Concordia Soc. 42 Md. 460; Martin

v. Murphy, 129 Ind. 464, 29 N. E. 1118; Magid v. Tannenbaum, 164 App. Div. 142, 149 N. Y. Supp. 445; O'Neal v. Hines, 145 Ind. 32, 43 N. E. 946; Dills v. Doeblér, 62 Conn. 366, 20 L.R.A. 432, 36 Am. St. Rep. 343, 26 Atl. 398; Miller v. Chicago Portrait Co. — Tex. Civ. App. —, 195 S. W. 619; Stafford v. Shortreed, 62 Iowa, 524, 17 N. W. 756.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is to enjoin defendants from carrying on the same business which plaintiff is engaged in in the city of Minneapolis. When plaintiff rested, the court dismissed the action. The appeal is from the judgment of dismissal.

No error is claimed in the dismissal of any defendant other than Brock. As to Brock the facts are these: Plaintiff operates a chain of clothing stores in many of the large cities of this country. It has one in Minneapolis, and Brock became its manager on April 4, 1916, at the weekly salary of $35. The contract of employment was in writing, signed by both parties. It contains numerous covenants and agreements to be kept and performed by Brock; but we look in vain for one to be carried out or kept by plaintiff. It does not agree to keep him in its employ for a single day, nor does it, in terms, agree to pay the salary he bound himself to accept. In March, 1918, Brock and two other employees of plaintiff organized a corporation to engage in a business similar to plaintiff's, rented a store two blocks away from plaintiff's, and are now conducting a business there. The basis of the asserted hold on Brock is a paragraph in the contract mentioned, which provides, in substance, that in consideration for the employment by the week, and the knowledge thereby obtained in plaintiff's method and trade secrets, Brock agreed that, for a period of four years after his employment by plaintiff should cease, he would not, directly or indirectly, enter into or engage in the same business as plaintiff in the city of Minneapolis, or work in such line of business. If his employment ceased before the end of one year, the prohibited period should be four times as long as the time he actually worked. In case of a violation of the foregoing covenant Brock must forfeit and pay to plaintiff $3,000, which is "agreed upon as liquidated damages therefor and shall be considered as such, and not as a penalty."

The proof showed that, when Brock notified plaintiff that he desired to quit its employ, no difficulty was experienced in at once supplying his place, and in fact more business was transacted thereafter than during Brock's management. While some witnesses for plaintiff referred in general terms to trade secrets and special methods of doing business possessed by plaintiff, when required to name any in particular they failed utterly, or else pointed out methods known and practised generally in carrying on business like plaintiff's. The only tangible evidence is that Brock ordered for the use of his corporation books of account and records similar in form to plaintiff's and from the same firm that supplies it. However, it does not appear that the books and records used by plaintiff are copyrighted, or that there is any special peculiarity about them whereby their use by a competitor could cause loss to the plaintiff's business.

The record does not indicate the grounds for the dismissal. Counsel for appellant seemingly thinks that, because of the provision in respect to the payment of liquidated damages, the court concluded the only remedy was an action at law; for much effort is expended in combating that proposition. We think that question was not reached by the court below, and, as the proof stands, need not be considered here.

Equity will not enjoin the breach of a negative covenant in a contract, unless it is made to appear that irreparable injury has resulted, or will in all probability result, to complainant from such breach. In cases where an established business or trade and its good will have been sold, and as part of the transaction the seller has covenanted not to engage in the same business in the vicinity for a certain period, the mere breach strongly points to irreparable injury, in that the old business built up by him and his name will lose by having its customers drawn to a similar new enterprise when he enters it. By the purchase the buyer, upon a supposedly adequate consideration, secured a going business and its protection by the covenant from encroachment by the seller. Examples of such cases are furnished by Holliston v. Ernston, 124 Minn. 49, 144 N. W. 415; Andrews v. Kingsbury, 212 Ill. 97, 72 N. E. 11; Ropes v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464, 13 N. E. 419. We think the breach of a like covenant in an employment contract does not so readily indicate irreparable injury to the employer. Injury is not shown by the mere fact that the employee has left the service and has entered the employ of a rival concern. In McCall Co. v. Wright, 198 N. Y. 143, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 249, 91 N. W. 516, the rule applicable is, in substance: Where the services have been of such a character that the employee's name carries with it the good will of the employer's business, or where the employee has obtained knowledge of secrets in such business the disclosure of which would result in irreparable damage to the employer, it appearing that the subsequent employment was to obtain the benefit of the secrets, or there was danger that such secrets would be disclosed in the subsequent employment, injunctive relief will be granted. See, also, Simms v. Burnette, 55 Fla. 702, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 389, 127 Am. St. Rep. 201, 46 So. 90, 15 Ann. Cas. 690; Osius v. Hinchman, 150 Mich. 603, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 393, 114 N. W. 402. Tested by that rule this case fails. There is no evidence that Brock, in the position of manager, came in contact with customers of plaintiff so as to obtain any personal hold upon the good will of the business, or that he had made or threatened to make any effort to secure or attract plaintiff's patrons. Plaintiff's business is selling men's and women's clothing on the instalment plan, the purchaser of the garment signing a contract to pay for the same in small future instalments. We have already adverted to the absence of any so-called trade secrets or peculiar methods possessed only by plaintiff in conducting this business; hence no reason exists for an injunction to protect these, under the rule of such cases as Magnolia Metal Co. v. Price, 65 App. Div. 276, 72 N. Y. Supp. 792. Nor is this case like one where a person is hired to work up a route or territory and serve the customers obtained therein, as, for instance, a milk or laundry route, and the like. There the employee comes directly in contact with the customers. They may be attracted to him personally, and are likely to go with him should he enter the service of a competitor. Typical cases of this sort are found in Mutual Milk & Cream Co. v. Heldt, 120 App. Div. 795, 105 N. Y. Supp. 661; A. L. & J. J. Reynolds Co. v. Dreyer, 12 Misc. 368, 33 N. Y. Supp. 649; American Ice Co. v. Lynch, 74 N. J. Eq. 298, 70 Atl. 138; Eureka Laundry Co. v. Long, 146 Wis. 205, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 119, 131 N. W. 412. The right to injunction there is rested on the principle that the employer's business is wrongfully interfered with, and such interference readily appears when the former employee invades the route in behalf of a new employer. Of course, cases relating to services of a unique kind, such as those of an opera singer, actor, or person of special qualifications, are not in point here.

It is readily seen that courts are and should be cautious in complying with the request of an employer to enjoin a former servant who has violated a covenant of this sort, from earning a livelihood. It may well be surmised that such a covenant finds its way into an employment contract, not so much to protect the business, as to needlessly fetter the employee, and prevent him from seeking to better his condition by securing employment with competing concerns. One who has nothing but his labor to sell, and is in urgent need of selling that, cannot well afford to raise any objection to any of the terms in the contract of employment offered him, so long as the wages are acceptable. There-

Injunction—against breach of contract—absence of damage.

fore some proof of irreparable damage ought to be adduced in such a case before equitable relief by way of injunction will issue. In W. J. Johnston Co. v. Hunt, 66 Hun, 504, 21 N. Y. Supp. 314 (affirmed in 142 N. Y. 621, 37 N. E. 564, on opinion of court below), where the defendant, in bad faith, flagrantly violated his agreement to work for the plaintiff, injunctive relief was nevertheless denied, the court saying: "It was shown that the plaintiff, immediately after defendant had broken his contract, substituted in his place another; and, while there is some slight evidence to show that the effect of the withdrawal of the defendant Hunt and the substitution of another resulted, for the time being, in some loss of advertising to the plaintiff's paper, yet it failed to establish what is required in cases of this kind; viz., that the injury was irreparable."

We quote from Dockstader v. Reed, 121 App. Div. 846, 106 N. Y. Supp. 795: "Whether equity will intervene to restrain by injunction the violation of a restrictive covenant in relation to personal services depends in large measure upon whether a substitute for the employee can readily be obtained, and whether such substitute will substantially answer the purpose of the contract."

The substitute in the case at bar did, and no attempt was made to show an injury by any attempt to seek or solicit plaintiff's customers or trade. Magid v. Tannenbaum, 164 App. Div. 142, 149 N. Y. Supp. 445.

Injunction will not be granted to enforce the provisions of a contract unless the court is satisfied that the enforcement will be just and equitable and will not work hardship or oppression. Bradshaw v. Millikin, 173 N. C. 432, L.R.A. 1917E, 880, 92 S. E. 161. As already remarked, this contract is so one sided as to obligations that the court might well hesitate at the enforcement of the one now invoked, and which is in restraint of the right to labor. Here when Brock was offered a position of uncertain tenure at a modest salary, he must also needs sign an ironclad contract binding him to do and refrain from doing many specified things, while plaintiff, the employer, assumed no obligation whatever. In Sternberg v. O'Brien, 48 N. J. Eq. 370, 22 Atl. 348, the court refused to enjoin one who, when employed by the complainant as a collector in its business, conducted somewhat like plaintiff's here, had agreed not to work in the same line for a certain period after ceasing to work for complainant, saying of the latter: "He wants the court to restrain the defendant from working at a particular employment in two of the largest cities of the state. To many persons the right to labor is the most important and valuable right they possess; it is their fortune, constituting the only means they have to obtain food, raiment, and shelter, and to acquire property. To such persons a deprivation of this right is ruin, and to abridge it is to do them an injury which will very likely result in their ruin. When, therefore, a court is asked either to deprive a person of this right or to abridge it, it is its duty, before it acts, to consider with the utmost care whether, if it does what it is asked to do, it will not, on a careful comparison of consequences, do more injustice than justice."

We think the situation presented relief asked. The dismissal was by the evidence in this record shows right. the absence of every element that Judgment affirmed. would incline a court to grant the

ANNOTATION.

Validity and enforceability of restrictive covenant in contracts of employment.

I. General considerations:

- a. In general, 861.
- b. Distinction between a covenant ancillary to the sale of a business and to a contract of employment, 863.
- c. Distinction between covenants applicable during term of employment and subsequently thereto, 863.

[No later decisions herein.]

II. Covenant not to accept service from anyone except employer during term of contract:

- a. In general, 864.
- [No later decisions herein.]
- b. As affected by character of service to be performed, 864.

III. Covenant not to engage in similar or competing business after termination of the contract:

- a. In general, 864.
- b. Reasonable restrictions; illustrative cases:
 1. Contracts for employment in mercantile or manufacturing business, 865.

This annotation supplements an annotation on the same subject in 9 A.L.R. p. 1456.

I. General considerations.

a. In general.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1456.)

A covenant by an employee not to engage in a business similar to that to which his employment relates, even where restricted as to time and territory, is not necessarily subject to enforcement to the extent of adjoining a breach thereof, since equity jurisdiction will be denied as an aid to the employer if, under all the circumstances, such relief would be unduly oppressive upon the employee, or if it is sought to protect the em-

III. b—continued.

2. Contracts for employment in professional capacity, 866.

- c. Unreasonable restrictions as to period of restraint, 867.
- d. Unreasonable restrictions as to territory, 867.
- e. [New.] Unreasonable restrictions as to character of business, 867.

IV. Effect of want of equity in contract:

- a. In general, 869.
- [No later decisions herein.]
- b. Sufficiency of consideration, 869.
- [No later decisions herein.]
- c. Lack of mutuality of obligation, 869.

V. Effect of provision for liquidated damages or penalty, 870.

VI. Injunctive relief as affected by comparison of injury to the parties, 870.

[No later decisions herein.]

VII. Effect of infancy of employee, 870.

[No later decisions herein.]

ployer as to matters which, under the circumstances, he is not entitled to be protected; and this is true even though, under some circumstances, the restraint as to time and space might be held to be reasonable. In this regard it may be observed that an employer is not entitled to be protected from competition by his former employee unless there is bad faith or unfair conduct by the employee, or the taking of an unfair advantage, or making an unfair use of his former employment. The late English cases show a tendency to restrict the enforcement of these covenants by employees unless the primary purpose thereof is to protect the employer from unfair practices or conduct by the employee in taking advantage of the prior relationships (See infra, III. e, "Unreasonable restrictions as to character of business.")

In Attwood v. Lamont [1920] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 571, in refusing to enforce any portion of an agreement by an employee, of this character, on the ground that it was too wide as to the character of the business, Lord Sterndale said that the tendency of the later decisions on the subject is towards a stricter application of the rule of enforcement, hence the result is that statements in some of the earlier cases require, in the light of the later decisions, considerable modification before acceptance.

In the same case Younger, J., remarked: "The restraint must be reasonable not only in the interests of the covenantee, but in the interests of both the contracting parties. This disposes of the almost passionate protest of Neville, J., in Henry Leatham & Sons v. Johnstone White [1907] 1 Ch. Eng. 189, 76 L. J. Ch. N. S. 119, 23 Times L. R. 144, that no agreement was invalid, provided the restriction was reasonably necessary for the protection of the employer, however oppressive to the employee and fatal to his chance of obtaining his own living in this country it might be. This is no longer so, although under Bowen, L. J.'s rule the statement was, I think, justified. This modern view of the House of Lords does not, however, involve the restoration of the old principle at one time obtaining, that the consideration received by the employee for his covenant must be adequate. It has not. 'The court no longer considers the adequacy of the consideration in any particular case,' says Lord Parker in Herbert Morris v. Saxelby [1916] 1 A. C. (Eng.) 688, 85 L. J. Ch. N. S. 210, 114 L. T. N. S. 618, 32 Times L. R. 297, 60 Sol. Jo. 305, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 537, but it does involve, per Lord Shaw in the same case, and the consideration is of importance in the present case, that as the time of restriction lengthens or the space of its operation grows, the weight of the onus on the covenantee to justify it grows, too."

In Bowler v. Lovegrove [1921] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 642, 124 L. T. N. S. 695, 37 Times L. R. 424, [1921] W. N. 88, 65 Sol. Jo. 397, 90 L. J. Ch. N. S. 356, the court, referring to the later decisions on the subject, said that these decisions show clearly that when, as in the present case, the covenant is between employer and employee, the clause is prima facie invalid, and that to establish its validity it is incumbent on the plaintiff to prove that there existed some special circumstances which rendered it reasonably necessary for the protection of the plaintiff's business.

Upon this point in Kaumagraph Co. v. Stampagraph Co. (1921) 197 App. Div. 66, 188 N. Y. Supp. 678, the court said: "Covenants ancillary to a contract of employment restricting the employees' right to labor along the same line, either for themselves or others, upon the termination of their employment, are not favored by the law, and will not be enforced, unless there are special circumstances that render the restriction a reasonable protection to the employer's business, to prevent the employee from using knowledge that he has acquired in the course of his employment, of the secrets of the trade, methods, or processes of the employer. If the covenant, taking these circumstances into consideration, is not more extensive as to time or space than will afford a reasonable protection to the employer's business, it will be enforced. . . . Where, however, the employee brings to the employment skill previously acquired, and does not obtain, in the course of his employment, knowledge of the methods and processes which are exclusively within his employer's control and right to use, it cannot be said that such a restraint is reasonably necessary to the employer's protection. . . . In contradistinction to the sale of a business an employee ordinarily receives no consideration other than the fact of present employment; his labor is a full return for his wage. Contracts by employees, unreasonably limiting their right to pursue their trade or occupation in the future, are held to violate public policy, because the employees' means for procuring a livelihood for themselves and family are thereby diminished. They are deprived of the power of usefulness, and the public is deprived of the benefit of the exercise by them of their knowledge and skill."

For the employer successfully to invoke equitable aid, he must also make it appear that he had suffered or would suffer irreparable damage on account of the breach complained of. MENTER CO. v. BROCK (reported herewith) ante, 857. It is also pointed out in this case that the courts should be cautious in enjoining the breach of covenant by an employee not to engage in a similar business, since it may well be surmised that such a covenant is incorporated into employment contracts, not so much to protect the employer's business, but needlessly to fetter the employee, and prevent him from seeking to better his condition.

b. Distinction between a covenant ancillary to the sale of a business and to a contract of employment.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1462.)

As observed in the annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1456, the courts are not less inclined to restrain the breach of a negative covenant by an employee, in effect obligating him not to engage for himself or as employee in a competing business, than they are to restrain the breach of similar covenants entered into by the seller of a business. This tendency upon the part of the courts is emphasized in late House of Lords decisions.

Upon this point in Attwood v. Lamont [1920] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 571, Younger, L. J., remarked: "Now, we are here dealing with a branch of the law which has at all times been peculiarly susceptible to influence from current views of public policy. Its modern developments have grown up under the shadow of the 'laissez faire' school of economics, and, until recently, have, in consequence, been uniformly in the direction of extending the principle of freedom of contract in relation to such bargains, a tendency that has not yet ceased to be operative when the covenant in question is one exacted from a vendor on the sale of the good will of his business. But current opinion on the relations between employers and employed has moved rapidly in recent years, and thus it is that the House of Lords, itself bound by comparatively few of the numerous previous decisions on the subject, took the opportunity in 1918, when the validity of a restrictive covenant entered into by an employee came in question before it, to examine the whole problem afresh, with the result that the supreme tribunal, for the guidance of every court, has now placed upon the permissibility of such covenants a limit which the general interest, including, of course, that of employees themselves, had not previously seemed to require. In consequence it must now, I think, be recognized in all courts that there is every difference in the matter of its validity between such a covenant as we find here embodied in a contract of service and the same covenant when found in an agreement for the sale of good will; and the dispute between the parties in this action must be decided with due regard to that difference. This declared difference is, as I have said, a matter of recent development, and although it has not been put forward by the House of Lords as a new departure, its effect upon previously accepted views has already been as complete as if it were. Moreover, it may be doubted whether all of its incidental consequences have even now become apparent."

And see Kaumagraph Co. v. Stampagraph Co. (1921) 197 App. Div. 66, 188 N. Y. Supp. 678, supra.

c. Distinction between covenants applicable during term of employment and subsequently thereto.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1460.)

II. Covenant not to accept service from anyone except employer during term of contract.

a. In general.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1463).

b. As affected by character of service to be performed.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1463.)

In SHUBERT THEATRICAL CO. v. RATH (reported herewith) ante, 846, it is held that an injunction would issue to restrain the breach of an agreement by acrobats giving the complainant an option upon their services for a continued term, where it appeared that the performance of these acrobats was so unique in character that substitutes could not be procured.

III. Covenant not to engage in similar or competing business after termination of the contract.

a. In general.

The grounds upon which the breach of a negative covenant by an employee is restrained appear in Clark Paper & Mfg. Co. v. Stenacher (1919) 108 Misc. 399, 177 N. Y. Supp. 614, affirmed in (1920) 193 App. Div. 924, 184 N. Y. Supp. 914, wherein the court said: "Following his entry into plaintiff's employ he was given full access to his business, taught its details and methods, and generally received careful and prolonged instruction therein, particularly in the branch of sales of wrapping paper. Notwithstanding this painstaking care, he was unable to earn for plaintiff sufficient profit during the first year to offset his salary and expenses. He was, nevertheless, retained, and the second year, partly by reason of improved business conditions and partly because of his increased experience and knowledge his earnings justified his employer's confidence in his ability when trained, and a profit was recovered from his work, in which he shared by increase of compensation. Presumably his third year would have had results equally good, if not better. In April, however, he left plaintiff's employ without notice or warning. Competition in plaintiff's line of business is exceedingly vigorous, and, before leaving plaintiff, defendant had procured a position with one of his employer's competitors at a salary in excess of that which he was receiving. His work for plaintiff had been, as originally contemplated, almost entirely in the city of Rochester, where he had become well and personally known to all of plaintiff's customers. The value to him, as well as to a competitor of plaintiff, of the knowledge with which he had been supplied and the experience gained at plaintiff's expense, may be understood from the fact that he obtained his new employment largely on the strength of his acquaintance with the Rochester trade, and immediately upon leaving plaintiff was set at work to procure that trade for his new employer. This alone may or may not be deemed sufficient to demand the enforcement of his negative covenant to plaintiff, but another matter still more surely impugning his good faith and honesty of purpose must be considered therewith. He had, as said, been made fully acquainted with plaintiff's business, and almost immediately after entering the competitor's employ disclosed to that competitor certain matters connected therewith, generally unknown to the trade, and knowledge of which in the possession of a competitor could undoubtedly be used to plaintiff's great damage and loss. How many other of plaintiff's affairs he divulged to his new employer may only be surmised, but with his knowledge thereof, and his willingness to use same improperly, so established, the danger to plaintiff is evident. He had been trained at his request and solicitation until his services had become special, extraordinary and not easily replaced. He had become possessed of complete knowledge of plaintiff's customers, trade methods, and confidential information. He had disclosed some, and the inference that he will, if permitted, disclose others, is irresistible. The very nature of the situation is such that no action for money damages can avail to protect or recompense plaintiff for the wrong done and threatened; only the equity power of the court can be usefully interposed in his behalf."

b. Reasonable restrictions; illustrative cases.

1. Contracts for employment in mercantile or manufacturing business.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1468.)

In Srolowitz v. Roseman (1919) 263 Pa. 588, 107 Atl. 322, the court enjoined the breach of a provision by an employee not, for one year after the termination of the employment, either directly or indirectly to enter into a competing business, either for himself or in the employ of anyone engaged in a competing business within the city of Philadelphia. See infra, V., as to the effect of provision in this case for "liquidated damages."

In J. & J. G. Wallach Laundry System v. Fortcher (1921) 116 Misc. 712, 191 N. Y. Supp. 409, although expressing some doubt as to the validity of the covenant, the breach of the same was restrained where the employee of a laundry company, who was employed as a driver and solicitor over a specific route, covenanted in effect, upon leaving the plaintiff's employ, to surrender to it a full list of its customers, and that he would not solicit, directly or indirectly, similar work from any of the plaintiff's customers, and that for a period of two years after the termination of his services he would not, directly or indirectly, engage in the laundry business within a prescribed district; to wit, the route upon which he had served.

In the Eastman Kodak Co. v. Powers Film Products (1919) 189 App. Div. 556, 179 N. Y. Supp. 325, leave to appeal denied in (1920) 190 App. Div. 970, 179 N. Y. Supp. 919, where it appeared that the employer taught the employee a certain line of work in connection with the making of films and gave him possession of various processes and formulas secret in character, he agreeing not to disclose the same to others, and also not to engage in a similar business for himself or for others in any part of the United States except Alaska, for the period of two years after the termination of his employment, the breach of this negative covenant was enjoined. Upon the merits the court said: "It is also apparent that the value of Warren's services to the defendant company arises from his experience while in the plaintiff's employ, growing out of the practical application of these trade secrets, and not otherwise. It is because of his special training and special knowledge that the defendant company must necessarily involve his bringing to its aid such knowledge as he has and which is entirely developed in connection with these secret processes. In this view, if he is permitted to enter this employ, injunctive relief in form against the imparting of such special knowledge is more than likely to prove inefficient. The mere rendition of the service along the lines of his training would almost necessarily impart such knowledge to some degree. Warren cannot be loyal both to his promise to his former employer and to his new obligations to the defendant company. Quite evidently it was exactly this situation which led to the making of the contract. We cannot say that the period of two years specified therein is unreasonable. Probably that lapse of time will have developed still further improvements and changes such as would render the knowledge now possessed by Warren more or less ineffectual in harm of the plaintiff. The contractual provision against his going into the photographic business is clearly aimed at preventing the acquisition by competitors of his special knowledge. Affirmance of the modifying order being so likely to render nugatory in practical effect the injunctive province against the imparting of knowledge and the resulting damage to the plaintiff, possessing such possibilities of serious interference with its lawful business and such extensive resulting damage, we should not, in advance of trial, give our sanction to Warren's taking his special training, dependent and interwoven as it is, with his special knowledge of the secret processes of the plaintiff, into the camp of a competitor obviously engaged in systematic effort to acquire to itself precisely that benefit."

In Fred A. H. Garlich's Agency Co. v. Anderson (1920) — Mo. App. —, 226 S. W. 978, an employee of a company who was also a director thereof, was restrained from breaching a covenant not to engage in a competing business for the period of five years. The covenant provided that the employee should not, either for himself or for his employees or associates in any capacity, as a partner or otherwise, with any person or persons or corporation, directly or indirectly, through an office located in Buchanan county, Missouri, or at any other place, engage in any branch of the insurance business, or permit any other person, corporation, or association to use his name in any branch of such business within the limits of Buchanan county, for a period of five years after the termination of the contract; it also provided that the contract might be terminated by the agency company for wrongful conduct of the employee; it was held that this provision applied where the agency company terminated the contract for wrongful conduct of the employee in violation of the provisions of the contract.

In Spence v. Mercantile Bank [1921] 37 Times L. R. (Eng.) 745, there was involved the question of the validity of a provision in the contract of employment, in effect that no employee subscribing to a pension fund would be entitled to any return in respect of contributions to the fund if he left the service of the employer and entered the service of "any other Eastern exchange bank." Since the validity of the provision was presented to the court in the footing that the rule was to be treated in the same way as if it had been a covenant in restraint of trade, the court dealt with the question on that basis, and held that the rule was not wider than was reasonably necessary to protect the employer.

2. Contracts for employment in professional capacity.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1472.)

In Fitch v. Dewes [1921] 2 A. C. (Eng.) 158, a covenant by a person accepting employment as a solicitor's clerk not to engage in the same profession within 7 miles of the town hall in the place of employment was held valid, and a breach thereof was enjoined. It appeared in this case that the employee had for many years been in the employment of the employer, and during this time he had come in contact with a large portion of the latter's clients.

Upon the point that a covenant, although unlimited as to time, will nevertheless be held valid where it was reasonably limited as to space in the last cited case, Viscount Cave said: "Where there is a good will to be protected, a covenant in restraint of trade, even when imposed as a condition of employment, may be so framed as to give adequate protection not only to the covenantee himself, but also to his successors in the business, and this although it may be necessary for that purpose to impose a restriction upon the covenantor for the remainder of his life. Here the practice to be protected is that of a solicitor, to which a good will is no doubt attached. It is manifest that a person employed in such a practice as managing clerk must, in the course of his duties, acquire a knowledge of the affairs, the documents, and the disposition of the clients of the business, such as to give him a special equipment which he could, if not restrained by contract, use in obtaining employment as their legal adviser, and that in this manner the good will of the employer's business might be impaired and perhaps destroyed. Now, the object being to protect the employer's business against the use of that special advantage, was it unreasonable to extend this covenant to the life of the employee? I think not. It is impossible to say that there must in every case be some specified limit of time defined by a figure. Nor can we say that the contract ought to be confined to the life of the covenantee, for he might die in the next year or so, and the good will might then be lost to his successors. It 'was no doubt thought necessary to continue the protection throughout the period during which the covenantee and his successors in interest might carry on the practice, and for that purpose to bind the appellant (so far as the limited area was concerned) for the remainder of his life. I cannot think that in the circumstances of this case the restriction imposed was unreasonable from any point of view."

c. Unreasonable restrictions as to period of restraint.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1473.)

In Kaumagraph Co. v. Stampagraph Co. (1921) 197 App. Div. 66, 188 N. Y. Supp. 678, the appellate division reversed the action of the lower court in enjoining the breach of a negative provision by employees, in effect, not to engage in a similar business at any time, it being unlimited as to time and not limited as to territory, except within the United States, east of the Mississippi, and the Dominion of Canada, and it not appearing that the employee had gained any of the business secrets of the employer; and it also appearing that he had been engaged in the same business for many years prior to accepting employment with the complainant. The court said that the purpose of the covenant was not to protect the plaintiff from the revelation or use of the secrets of its business, but was to remove from possible competition one whose knowledge and skill acquired before he came into its employ, had been found valuable to it, and to prevent that same knowledge and skill being utilized for the benefit of the employee and others after he had ceased to be employed by the plaintiff. Such a covenant, the court said, was an unreasonable restraint of trade and competition, and will not be enforced in a court of equity.

d. Unreasonable restrictions as to territory.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1473.)

A contract is a restraint of trade and void where it prohibits an employee from, directly or indirectly, giving any person any information in regard to the whole or any part of the plant or processes of the employer, and from doing anything which might injure, by competition or otherwise, the employer, its successors or assigns, in the business, since the restraint is unlimited as to time and place. Victor Chemical Works v. Iliff (1921) 299 Ill. 532, 132 N. E. 806.

In Ropeways Limited v. Hoyle (1919) 88 L. J. Ch. N. S. (Eng.) 446, 120 L. T. N. S. 538, 35 Times L. R. 285, the court refused to enforce a covenant world wide in its territorial scope, not to engage in a business of a certain kind, on the ground that the employee would be unable to divulge any trade secrets of the employer or solicit from the employer's customers, since the character of the business of the employer was of such a nature as to make it extremely improbable that the employee could have obtained any influence with the employer's customers.

So, in Clarke, S. & Co. v. Solomon (1921) 37 Times L. R. (Eng.) 176, affirming (1920) 36 Times L. R. 759, the court refused to restrain the breach of a covenant by a person entering the employ of another as a commercial traveler, where the covenant as to territory was broader than the field covered by the employee. The court held, also, that the contract was not severable.

e. Unreasonable restrictions as to character of business.

While the case (Bowler v. Lovegrove [1921] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 642) was really disposed of upon the ground that the covenant was not violated, nevertheless the court also considered the validity of a covenant not to engage in a certain business for a period of time within a designated place. In holding the agreement to be invalid, since it was not necessary in order to protect the employer from the wrongful use by the employee of any confidential information he received, the court clearly distinguished between the right of the employer so to protect himself and his right to protect himself against competition, and his right in the latter regard is denied. On this point the court said: "In my opinion this attempt fails. It is true that the defendant came into personal contact with the plaintiffs' customers. But this fact loses its significance when the nature of the business carried on by the plaintiffs and the duties of the defendant in such business are considered. The plaintiffs' customers with whom the defendant came into personal contact were not the ordinary recurring customers such as exist in most businesses. Although Mr. Blake asserted that not all of the customers of the plaintiffs in their auctioneers' and estate agents' business were customers in one isolated transaction only, and said that such of their customers as had more than one property to sell sometimes came again if the plaintiffs had effected a good sale for them, yet when pressed he could not remember the name of a single customer who had done so. Moreover the plaintiffs admitted that (as is usual in this class of business) persons in Portsmouth and Gosport who are desirous of selling or letting their properties generally placed such properties in the hands of other estate agents in Portsmouth besides the plaintiffs, and advertised them for sale in the newspapers, and that persons in Portsmouth and Gosport who were desirous of becoming purchasers or tenants of property went to other estate agents in Portsmouth besides the plaintiffs, to see what they had on their registers, and also advertised their wants in the local newspaper. So, the wants of every customer were generally known in the locality, and each customer was open to be (and no doubt was in fact) canvassed by every estate agent in the district.

The fact is that it is the essence of the plaintiffs' business of auctioneers and estate agents to obtain a perpetual succession of new customers by canvassing, and it was expressly for this purpose that the defendant and the other canvassing and negotiating clerks were employed. In these circumstances it is difficult to see what knowledge or information the defendant could have obtained in the course of his employment which he could, if he had been so minded, have misused to the injury of the plaintiffs after he had left such employment. Any skill and efficiency in canvassing or negotiating, and any knowledge of the locality which the defendant had acquired in the plaintiffs' service, are his own to make use of, if he chooses, for competing with the plaintiffs."

In Whitmore v. King (1918) 119 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 533, it is held that a covenant is invalid as embracing in its scope more than was necessary to protect the employer, where it provided that the employee was not to engage within the prohibited area in any business whatsoever in any way connected with the wood business and the slate business, the employer being engaged in the buying at wholesale and selling at retail of wood and slate. The court said that the restriction was not limited to the wood business or the timber business as carried on by the employer. It was urged by counsel for the plaintiff that what was really meant was that the defendant was not to engage in any business which was a section of a branch or department of the trade carried on by the employer. But the language does not bear that interpretation; and so to hold "would be to remodel the agreement altogether; to redraw it in a different sense. The restriction is against carrying on any business whatsoever in any way connected with the wood business within the prohibited area. . . . The language as so drawn is much wider than anything necessary for the reasonable protection of the business of the vendors, and that being so, it is a covenant which the courts will not enforce."

In Attwood v. Lamont [1920] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 571, there was a negative covenant by a person accepting employment as the head of one department in a retail department business, that at any time thereafter, either in his own behalf or in behalf of others, he would not engage in the trade of a tailor, dressmaker, general draper, milliner, hatter, haberdasher, gentleman's, ladies, or children's outfitter, at any place within a radius of 10 miles of the employer's place of business; this provision was held to be broader than necessary to protect the employer against any knowledge that the employee might gain as to the employer's business, and hence, broader than necessary for the legitimate protection of the employer. It was also held not to be a severable agreement so that the agreement might be confined to that portion of the business of which the employee had charge, and hence the entire agreement was held to be invalid and unenforceable.

It is pointed out by Younger, J., that "an employer is not entitled by a covenant taken from his employee to protect himself after the employment had ceased against his former servant's competition per se, although a purchaser of good will is entitled to protect himself against such competition on the part of his vendor. There are at least two reasons given for this distinction. An employer may not, after his servant has left his employment, prevent that servant from using his own skill and knowledge in his trade or profession, even if acquired when in the employer's service. That skill and knowledge are only placed at the employer's disposal during the employment. They have not been made a subject of sale after that employment has ceased: . . . The employer's good will is always necessarily subject to the competition of all persons, including the employee, who choose to engage in a similar trade. 'The employer in such a case is not endeavoring to protect what he has, but to gain a special advantage he could not otherwise secure.' Accordingly covenants against competition by a former servant are as such not upheld; and the permissible extent of any covenant imposed upon a servant must be tested in every case with reference to the character of the work done for the employer by the servant while in the service, and by the consideration whether in that view the covenant taken from him goes further than is reasonably necessary for the protection of the proprietary rights of the covenantee. 'The reason, and the only reason,' says Lord Parker in Morris v. Saxelby [1916] 1 A. C. (Eng.) 700, 'for upholding such a restraint on the part of an employee, is that the employer has some proprietary right, whether in the nature of trade connection or in the nature of trade secrets, for the protection of which such a restraint is—having regard to the duties of the employee—reasonably necessary. Such a restraint has, so far as I know, never been upheld, if directed only to the prevention of competition or against the use of the personal skill and knowledge acquired by the employee in his employer's business.' "

IV. Effect of want of equity in contract.

a. In general.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1478.)

b. Sufficiency of consideration.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1479.)

c. Lack of mutuality of obligation.

(Supplementing annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1480.)

Although an agreement by an employee not to engage in a competing business with his employer for a period of eight years is unilateral in form, there being no reciprocal agreements by the employer, and there being no definite time for the employment, it being possible for either party to terminate the same at any time, the stipulation will nevertheless be enforced where the parties have carried the contract out according to its intent, and the employment therein provided for has been fully and completely given for so long a period as the employee desired it to continue, and has been finally terminated by him, he during this time having possessed himself of the very knowledge and opportunities misuse of which by him the negative covenant was intended to guard against. Clark Paper & Mfg. Co. v. Stenacher (1919) 108 Misc. 399, 177 N. Y. Supp. 614, affirmed in (1920) 193 App. Div. 924, 184 N. Y. Supp. 914.

V. Effect of provision for liquidated damages or penalty.

(For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1481.)

In Srolowitz v. Roseman (Pa.) supra, III. b, 1, breach of the covenant was enjoined notwithstanding that there was a provision for what was denominated "liquidated damages," but there was also a provision to the effect that the payment of "liquidated damages" should not preclude the employer from taking such legal actions or proceedings as he may have against the other party in law and in equity for the breach of the covenant, and that the liquidated damages should be payment in addition to the other damages, and not in substitution thereof. The decree granting an injunction was affirmed on the conclusions below, which included a conclusion that "the penal sum or sums named in the contract are not liquidated damages, and do not oust the jurisdiction of a court of equity.

VI. Injunctive relief as affected by comparison of injury to the parties.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases, see annotation in 9 A.L.R. 1482.)

VII. Effect of infancy of employee.

(No later decisions herein. For earlier cases see 9 A.L.R. 1483.)

A. G. S.

FRANCIS H. LEE, Claimant.

WASHBURN & HAYWOOD CHAIR COMPANY, Employer.

AMERICAN MUTUAL LIABILITY INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court — March 2, 1922.

(— Mass. —, 134 N. E. 268.)

Workmen's compensation — injury by play of fellow employees — arising out of employment.

Injury to a workman by being pushed by the body of a fellow workman who himself was pushed by a third in play in which the injured workman took no part, while they were on their way to ring out on the time clock at the noon hour, does not arise out of his employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[See note on this question beginning on page 882.]

APPEAL by the insurer from a decree of the Superior Court for Suffolk County in favor of claimant in a proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act to recover compensation for personal injuries received while in the course of his employment. Reversed.

It was found by the industrial accident board that the injury to plaintiff arose out of and in the course of his employment; that "the conditions under which the work of registering time was required to be performed called for all employees to ring out at 12 o'clock noon." One member of the board dissented.

Further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Sawyer, Hardy, Stone, & Morrison and Gay Gleason for appellant.

Crosby, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While the employee was on the premises of his employer, and, after leaving the building in which he worked, was about to enter the one where the time clock was, in order to ring out his time at noon, he was knocked down, by a fellow workman who was pushed out of the doorway of that building by another employee, and received injuries for which he seeks compensation.

The claimant's injuries were the result of fooling or horseplay of fellow employees, in which he took no part. The board member found that he "was the innocent victim of a friendly scrap between three other employees, one of whom was thrown out of the doorway, his body striking the claimant and throwing him to the ground, causing the injury to his shoulder and back."

As he was on his way to the time clock during the noon hour to ring out his time, it is obvious that his injuries were received in the course of his employment. The question remains whether the injuries arose out of his employment. It has been held by this court that, where an employee is injured as a result of fooling or play by employees in which he participates, such injury does not originate in any risk connected with, and caused by, his employment; and that such injury does not arise out of the employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act (Laws 1911, chap. 751, amended by Laws 1912, chap. 571). Moore's Case, 225 Mass. 258, 114 N. E. 204. The precise question presented by this record is whether an injury received by an employee in the course of his employment, as the result of fooling or play by other employees in which he takes no part, can be said to have arisen out of the employment. While this issue has been decided in other jurisdictions, it has not been directly adjudicated by this court. It is clear that there was no causal connection between the employment and the injury. The injury did not arise because the employee was exposed, by the nature of his employment, to some peculiar danger; it did not follow as a natural incident of his work; and it does not appear "to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." McNicol's Case, 215 Mass. 497, 499, L.R.A. 1916A, 306, 102 N. E. 697, 4 N. C. C. A. 552. The interpretation of the Workmen's Compensation Act enunciated in the case last cited, when applied to the facts in the present case, makes it plain that the injury to the claimant cannot be said to have arisen out of his employment. The pushing of Wallet out of the doorway by other employees and

Workmen's compensation—
injury by play of fellow employees—arising out of employment.

against the claimant, assuming it was a wrongful act, was not within the scope of his employment. Such acts, whether done in a spirit of play or from a malicious motive, have no relation whatever to the employment; and they are wholly outside the scope of the employment of those who caused the injury.

The weight of authority in England and in this country is in harmony with the result we have reached. Armitage v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. [1902] 2 K. B. 178, 71 L. J. K. B. N. S. 778, 66 J. P. 613, 86 L. T. N. S. 883, 18 Times L. R. 648; Fitzgerald v. Clarke & Son, 1 B. W. C. C. 197, [1908] 2 K. B. 796, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1018, 99 L. T. N. S. 101; Craske v. Wigan, 2 B. W. C. C. 35, [1909] 2 K. B. 635, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 994, 101 L. T. N. S. 6, 25 Times L. R. 632, 53 Sol. Jo.

560; Wilson v. Laing, 2 B. W. C. C. 118, [1909] S. C. 1230, 46 Scot. L. R. 843; Blake v. Head, 5 B. W. C. C. 303, 106 L. T. N. S. 822, 28 Times L. R. 321; Hulley v. Moosbrugger, 88 N. J. L. 161, L.R.A. 1916C, 1203, 95 Atl. 1007; Federal Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Havolic, 162 Wis. 341, L.R.A.1916D, 968, 156 N. W. 143; Chicago v. Industrial Commission, 292 Ill. 406, 15 A.L.R. 586, 127 N. E. 49; Tarpper v. Weston-Mott Co. 200 Mich. 275, L.R.A.1918E, 507, 166 N. W. 857; Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, L.R.A.1916F, 1164, 158 Pac. 212, 12 N. C. C. A. 789; Pierce v. Boyer-Van Kuran Lumber & Coal Co. 99 Neb. 321, L.R.A. 1916D, 970, 156 N. W. 509. See Rayner v. Sligh Furniture Co. 180 Mich. 168, L.R.A.1916A, 22, 146 N. W. 665, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 386, 4 N. C. C. A. 851.

The cases of Craske v. Wigan, 2 B. W. C. C. 35, [1909] 2 K. B. 635, 78 L. J. K. B. N. S. 994, 101 L. T. N. S. 6, 25 Times L. R. 632, 53 Sol. Jo. 560; Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co. 7 B. W. C. C. 1, [1914] A. C. 62, 7 B. R. C. 128, 83 L. J. K. B. N. S. 197, 109 L. T. N. S. 759, 30 Times L. R. 174, 58 Sol. Jo. 184, 51 Scot. L. R. 861, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 495; Simpson v. Sinclair, 10 B. W. C. C. 220, [1917] A. C. 127, 86 L. J. P. C. N. S. 102, 116 L. T. N. S. 609, 33 Times L. R. 247, 61 Sol. Jo. 350, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 188, cited in the majority decision of the industrial accident board, are not at variance with the conclusion which we have reached. Willis v. State In- dustrial Commission, 78 Okla. 216, 190 Pac. 92, and other cases cited in the decision, so far as they are contrary to the result arrived at in the case at bar, we cannot follow.

Cases which hold that an injury resulting from acts of a fellow employee who was known by the employer as a man of dangerous disposition, or who was known to be given to play or fooling, have no application to the present case. McNicol's Case, supra. See also, Reithel's Case, 222 Mass. 163, L.R.A.1916A, 304, 109 N. E. 951, 11 N. C. C. A. 235; Cranney's Case, 232 Mass. 149, 15 A.L.R. 584, 122 N. E. 266; Marshall v. Baker-Vawter Co. 206 Mich. 466, 173 N. W. 191; William Baird & Co. v. M'Graw, 13 B. W. C. C. 233, 89 L. J. P. C. N. S. 188, 64 Sol. Jo. 650, 57 Scot. L. R. 491, 150 L. T. Jo. 4.

As the evidence did not warrant a finding that the claimant's injuries arose out of his employment, the decree must be reversed and a decree entered in favor of the insurer.

So ordered.

NOTE.

The right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act for injuries sustained through horseplay or fooling is the subject of the annotation in 13 A.L.R. 540, which is supplemented by the annotation following TWIN PEAKS CANNING CO. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION, post, 882.

TWIN PEAKS CANNING COMPANY et al. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF UTAH.

Utah Supreme Court — March 10, 1921.

(— Utah, —, 196 Pac. 853.)

Workmen's compensation. — horseplay — course of employment.

1. That a boy went to another floor of the factory where he was employed to visit for a purpose of his own and in no way connected with his duties, upon the temporary stopping of the machinery, and while there cut the power off the elevator upon which a coemployee was riding for a practical joke, does not prevent his death by being caught in the machinery when attempting to restore the power, from arising in the course of his employment, and compensation may therefore be awarded for his death under a statute permitting such award for injuries in course of employment.

[See note on this question beginning on page 882.]

Appeal — from Industrial Commission — examination of evidence.

2. The court will, in a proceeding to review the decision of the Industrial Commission, examine the evidence only to ascertain whether or not there is any substantial evidence to support the findings of the commission and whether it has acted either without or in excess of its jurisdiction.

[See 28 R. C. L. 828, 829.]

Workmen's compensation — effect of disregard of rule.

3. The mere disregard by an employee of a rule of the master, which results in his injury, does not deprive him of the right to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act if the statute excludes only those injuries which are purposely self-inflicted.

APPLICATION for a writ of review to the Industrial Commission to review its award under the Workmen's Compensation Act in favor of applicant for the death of her son. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Booth, Lee, Badger, & Rich, for plaintiffs:

There was nothing to show that the deceased was doing anything whatsoever desirable or convenient in connection with his employment at the time he sustained his injuries. What the deceased did was wholly unconnected with his employment and has no causal relation to his employment.

Plumb v. Cobden Flour Mills Co. [1914] A. C. 62, 7 B. R. C. 128, 83 L. J. K. B. N. S. 197, 109 L. T. N. S. 759, 30 Times L. R. 174, 58 Sol. Jo. 184, 51 Scot. L. R. 861, 7 B. W. C. C. 6, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 495; Whitehead v. Reader [1901] 2 K. B. 48, 70 L. J. K. B. N. S. 546, 65 J. P. 403, 49 Week. Rep. 562, 84 L. T. N. S. 514, 17 Times L. R. 387, 3 W. C. C. 40; Reimers v. Proctor Pub. Co. 85 N. J. L. 441, 89 Atl. 931, 4 N. C. C. A. 738; Gonzales v. Lee Moor Contracting Co. 2 Cal. Ind. Acc. Com. Dec. 302; Weighill v. South Heaton Coal Co. 4 B. W. C. C. 141; Parker v. Hambrook [1912] W. N. 205, 107 L. T. N. S. 249, 56 Sol. Jo. 750, [1912] W. C. Rep. 369, 5 B. W. C. C. 608, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1; Koza's Case. 236 Mass. 342, 128 N. E. 400; Rochford's Case, 234 Mass. 93, 124 N. E. 891; Moyer v. Packard Motor Car Co. 205 Mich. 503, 171 N. W. 403; Di Salvo v. Menihan Co. 225 N. Y. 123, 121 N. E. 766; Kuca v. Lehigh Valley Coal

Co. 268 Pa. 163, 110 Atl. 731; Yodakis v. Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Co. 193 App. Div. 150, 183 N. Y. Supp. 768; Andractan v. Cobb, Mass. Workm. Comp. Cas. No. 1582; McHenry v. American Mut. Liability Ins. Co. 2 Mass. Workm. Comp. Cas. 789; Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 31 Cal. App. 701, 162 Pac. 1040; Kowalek v. New York Consol. R. Co. 229 N. Y. 489, 128 N. E. 888; Ross v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 222 Mass. 560, 111 N. E. 390; Inland Steel Co. v. Lambert, 66 Ind. App. 246, 118 N. E. 162.

Messrs. Harvey Cluff, Attorney General, and J. Robert Robinson, Assistant Attorney General, for defendant:

The Workmen's Compensation Act should be liberally construed, and doubts respecting the right to compensation should be resolved in favor of the employee or his dependents.

Ogden City v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 193 Pac. 857; State Road Commission v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 252, 190 Pac. 544, 20 N. C. C. A. 65.

The supreme court will not weigh the evidence, but will examine the same for the purpose, only, of determining whether there is any substantial competent evidence to sustain the finding or to support the award made by the Commission, and where it does not clearly and indubitably appear that the discretion of the Industrial Commission has been abused, its decision is final and unassailable.

Globe Grain & Mill. Co. v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 193 Pac. 642; Geo. A. Lowe Co. v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 519, 190 Pac. 934; McVicar v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 342, 191 Pac. 1089.

Where an employee is performing an act while on the premises where he is employed to work, which is customary among the employees, and the employer has acquiesced in such custom for a considerable length of time, an injury received by such employee when so engaged is held to arise within the course of employment, although the act causing the injury is only incidental thereto.

Re Loper, 64 Ind. App. 571, 116 N. E. 324; Phil. Hollenbach Co. v. Hollenbach, 181 Ky. 262, 13 A.L.R. 524, 204 S. W. 152; Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. L. 72, 86 Atl. 458, 3 N. C. C. A. 585; Gurski v. Susquehanna Coal Co. 262 Pa. 1, 104 Atl. 801; Re Ayers, 66 Ind. App. 458, 118 N. E. 386; Robinson v. State, 93 Conn. 49, 104 Atl. 491; Baltimore Car Foundry Co. v. Ruzicka, 132 Md. 491, 4 A.L.R. 113, 104 Atl. 167; Rish v. Iowa Portland Cement Co. 186 Iowa, 443, 170 N. W. 532; Holt Lumber Co. v. Industrial Commission, 168 Wis. 381, 170 N. W. 366; Thomas v. Proctor & G. Mfg. Co. 104 Kan. 432, 6 A.L.R. 1145, 179 Pac. 372; Barber v. Jones Shoe Co. — N. H. —, 108 Atl. 690.

An accident arises in the course of employment if it occurs while the employee is doing what a man so employed may reasonably do in the time during which he is employed, and at a place where he may reasonably be during that time.

Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. L. 72, 86 Atl. 458; Barber v. Jones Shoe Co. — N. H. —, 108 Atl. 690; White v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co. 104 Kan. 90, 177 Pac. 522; Thomas v. Proctor & G. Mfg. Co. 104 Kan. 432, 6 A.L.R. 1145, 179 Pac. 372.

The employment of an employee is not broken by mere intervals of leisure.

Honnold, Workmen's Comp. p. 379; State Road Commission v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 252, 190 Pac. 544, 20 N. C. C. A. 65; Northwestern Iron Co. v. Industrial Commission, 160 Wis. 633, 152 N. W. 416; Humphrey v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 372, 120 N. E. 816; Sundine's Case, 218 Mass. 1, L.R.A.1916A, 318, 105 N. E. 433, 5 N. C. C. A. 616.

There is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the brief visit of the deceased to the second floor was at all out of the ordinary, or was inconsistent with the duty to his employer. He was still "on duty," notwithstanding his temporary absence from his place of employment, and under such circumstances accidents are held to arise within the course of employment.

North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 260, 58 L. ed. 596, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159, 9 N. C. C. A. 109; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. United States, 231 U. S. 119, 58 L. ed. 146, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 26.

Frick, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original application to this court for a writ of review. The application is made pursuant to the provisions of chapter 100, Utah Laws 1917, as the same is carried into Utah Comp. Laws 1917, §§ 3061 to 3165, inclusive, and as amended by chapter 63, Utah Laws 1919.

One Edith Bohling made application in due time and form to the Industrial Commission of Utah, hereinafter called Commission, to obtain compensation for the death of her son, one Charles Brandley, who was fourteen years and ten months of age at the time of his death. The Commission awarded the mother compensation as a partial dependent in the sum of $7.71 per week for a period of 312 weeks, and, in addition thereto, the sum of $150 for funeral expenses. The award was based upon the decision and findings of the Commission. The decision reads as follows: "It appears that Charles Brandley was killed in an accident on the 11th day of August, 1920, at Murray, Utah. Decedent had been employed by the defendant Twin Peaks Canning Company for several weeks, his work consisting of caring for the cans in the capping department on the main floor. About the hour of 11:30 A. M. the machine had stopped, and for some purpose the deceased left his place of work, and, using the freight elevator, ascended to the next floor, and, in watching another boy descend in a like manner, playfully shut off the power of the elevator, causing the elevator to stop between the first and second floors. The decedent climbed to the second floor and turned the power on. The elevator ascended at once and crushed the decedent. It is alleged by the applicant, Edith Bohling, that she is the mother of the decedent by a former marriage; that subsequently she was married to Joseph Bohling and maintained a home in which the decedent had lived for the past seven years; that all earnings of the decedent, both in the past and at the time of said accident, were given to the applicant, and used for herself and family's support."

While the findings of fact in substance follow the decision, yet the findings are very general, merely indicating when and where the accident occurred, the average weekly wage earned by the deceased, and that the applicant was "partially dependent upon the deceased." In the so-called conclusions of law, after fixing the amount to be paid, etc., the Commission further says: "It appears that the employees were cautioned against using the elevator except under conditions which the work demanded, and then only by boys whose work required it. However, this rule does not appear to have been enforced; also, that not only the decedent, but other boys, used the elevator to go to the second floor; also, that they left their post when the machines were stopped during working hours. This practice was indulged in to such an extent as to suggest common practice. The Commission concludes that the decedent was within the course of his employment at the time of the accident, although he may not have been doing that which his employment required, but that which his employment permitted and allowed. The question of whether or not the decedent had business in going to the second floor is not now a matter that can be definitely determined. It does appear, however, that he had made the trip before for the purpose of talking to a friend; also, that he sometimes ate his lunch on said floor."

It is not easy to understand why the foregoing statements are incorporated into the so-called "conclusions" of the Commission. It is, however, immaterial what the statements or findings of the Commission are called, and we have inserted them here only for the purpose of showing what induced the Commission to make the award in this case.

The facts, in substance, are as follows:

Charles Brandley, hereinafter called the deceased, entered the employ of the Twin Peaks Canning Company, hereinafter called Canning Company, on the 21st day of July, 1920. The Canning Company operated a canning establishment composed of a two-story building, and the deceased and his "chum," Alvin Mitchell, were working on the first floor while several other boys were working on the second floor of the establishment. There were perhaps a dozen or fifteen boys engaged in the establishment. It was the duty of the deceased and Mitchell to "catch" the cans after they were filled with vegetables in the canning room on the second floor, when the same were passed down to them by gravity by means of what is called a "chute," and to place the cans at a place indicated for them on the first floor. There was an electric elevator connecting the two floors which was used to take the empty cans as they arrived at the canning establishment to the second floor. Neither the deceased nor Mitchell was required to perform any duties whatever on the second floor, nor was either required to go there for any purpose. It seems that the cans went through some sort of a machine on the second floor, and that was also the case when they reached the first floor, and the duties of the deceased and Mitchell were confined to the machine on the first floor. The cans, however, would not be placed in the chute in a continuous stream; so that there were intervals of rest, or intermissions, at which times the machines were not in operation. The deceased and Mitchell were, however, supposed to remain at their posts so that they would be prepared to take up their work at any time, and as soon as the machines commenced operating after the intermissions, which might occur at any moment. The evidence is to the effect that when the machines were at rest both the deceased and Mitchell, and especially the deceased, would frequently, by means of the elevator, ascend from the first to the second floor. The deceased sometimes, during the noon hour, would go to the second floor by means of the elevator to eat his lunch, which he brought from home. One of the boys testified that the deceased went up to the second floor on the elevator "almost daily" between the 21st day of July, 1920, the day the deceased commenced work, and the 11th day of August following, when he was killed. On the 11th day of August aforesaid the deceased and Mitchell were working on the first floor as before stated, when, at about 11:30 A. M., the machines stopped, and the deceased, by means of the elevator, went from the first to the second floor, operating the elevator himself. After the deceased had reached the second floor, and after the elevator had been returned in a manner the testimony does not make very clear to the first floor, Mitchell also went into the elevator and adjusted the switch so as to start the elevator upwards. It seems there was one switch on the elevator by means of which the power could be turned on to operate the elevator, and that there was also another switch on the second floor by means of which the power could be turned either on or off at that place. When Mitchell thus attempted to go from the first to the second floor, and when he had reached a point "a little more than halfway up" between the two floors the deceased, in attempting a practical joke or prank, disengaged the switch on the second floor and shut off the power from the elevator, leaving Mitchell in it midway between the two floors. Mitchell, it seems, did not disengage the switch on the elevator, but left it so that if the power were turned on the elevator would continue upwards. He, however, climbed up from the elevator where it was stopped by the deceased to the second floor. While the deceased and Mitchell were on the second floor, they were "joking, talking, and laughing" with the other boys who were working on that floor. There was an elevator gate on the second floor which worked automatically, so that when the elevator came up the gate would lift upwards out of the way of those using the elevator, and when the elevator went down the gate would slip into place to prevent anyone from walking or falling into the elevator shaft. When the deceased had thus stopped the elevator midway between the two floors the gate was in place. The visit of the boys on the second floor had continued only for a short time on the day in question when there was some indication that the machines would go into action, and both Mitchell and the deceased were anxious to get back to their machines on the first floor. The deceased thus went to the elevator and leaned over or climbed on to the gate aforesaid and adjusted the switch on the second floor so as to let on the power. He, it seems, did this without knowing or realizing that Mitchell had left the switch in the elevator connected when he climbed out of it to the second floor. As soon, therefore, as the deceased connected the switch on the second floor, and as he was leaning over or was on top of the gate, the elevator commenced to ascend, and the deceased was carried up on the gate against the beam, which dislocated his neck, causing almost instant death. The accident thus occurred as the result of what in the books is ordinarily denominated as practical joking, horseplay, or pranks.

There is evidence in the record that the boys on the first floor were forbidden to use the elevator, and that only a few days preceding the accident the manager had again specially instructed them not to use the elevator to pass from one floor to the other. Mitchell, the chum of the deceased, was positive in his statement that he knew nothing about such an order, and that he had received no instruction or caution, although the elevator had been used frequently by him, and the deceased, and others as hereinbefore stated. Another boy, however, testified that he heard the manager tell a large number of the boys not to use the elevator, and that he felt quite positive, but not absolutely certain, that the deceased was present among the number. The manager also testified that he was of the impression that the deceased was present when he cautioned the boys, but he could not state positively that such was the case. There is no direct evidence, however, that the Canning Company knew that the boys were using the elevator for the purpose aforesaid, or the extent thereof. In view, however, that the manager testified that only a short time before the accident he had cautioned the boys against using the elevator, he, therefore, must have heard that they were using it, or else he personally must have known that they, or some of them, were doing so.

While the case is not one, therefore, that it can be said that the Canning Company encouraged or authorized the use of the elevator for the purpose for which the boys were using it, yet the nature and frequency of the use were such that the Commission was authorized to infer from the evidence that the Canning Company either knew or should have known that the boys were using the elevator to pass from the first to the second floor, although they could have passed between the two floors by means of a stairway which was intended for that purpose.

We remark that, in view of the many leading questions that were propounded to the witnesses both by the referee and by counsel representing the several parties, it has been somewhat difficult to make a statement within the limits of an ordinary opinion which would thoroughly reflect all of the peculiar shades respecting the facts and circumstances. From a careful reading of the statements of all of the witnesses, however, we are satisfied that the foregoing statement covers all the essential elements.

Counsel for plaintiffs insist that, in view of the evidence, the accident did not arise "in the course of the employment," and that the evidence does not support the findings of facts of the Commission, or justify its conclusions of law.

This court is now firmly committed to the doctrine that it will examine into the evidence only to ascertain whether there is any substantial evidence in support of the findings of the Commission, and whether it has either acted without or in excess of its jurisdiction. We refer to the following cases: Geo. A. Lowe & Co. v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 519, 190 Pac. 934; McVicar v. Industrial Commission, 56 Utah, 342, 191 Pac. 1089; Littsos v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 194 Pac. 338; Utah Fuel Co. v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 194 Pac. 122; Ogden City v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 193 Pac. 857; and Globe Grain & Mill. Co. v. Industrial Commission, — Utah, —, 193 Pac. 642. We have cited the foregoing cases for the reason that they present a great variety of circumstances under which that doctrine was applied. In the last case cited the findings of the Commission were held not to be supported by any substantial evidence, and hence the award was set aside.

Appeal—from Industrial Commission—examination of evidence.

The question to be determined is: Are counsel's contentions tenable? In considering that question, it must not be overlooked that our statute materially differs from most of the statutes in force upon the subject of employers' liability in the several states of the Union. In most of the states the statutes cover accidents "arising out of and in the course of the employment," while our statute (Utah Laws 1919, chap. 63, § 3113) covers all accidents "arising out of or in the course of the employment." (Italics ours.) In order to obtain compensation under our statute, it is only necessary to show that the accident occurred "in the course of the employment," and not that it arose "out of the employment." It is important to keep the distinction in mind when the compensation cases from the various jurisdictions are considered. The attorney general, who represents the Commission in this proceeding, earnestly contends that the award of the Commission is not only supported by the undisputed facts, but that it is fully justified under our statutes and the decisions. He cites and relies upon the following among other cases: Re Loper, 64 Ind. App. 571, 116 N. E. 324; Phil Hollenbach Co. v. Hollenbach, 181 Ky. 262, 13 A.L.R. 524, 204 S. W. 152; Gurski v. Susquehanna Coal Co. 262 Pa. 1, 104 Atl. 801; Re Ayers, 66 Ind. App. 458, 118 N. E. 386; Thomas v. Proctor & G. Co. 104 Kan. 432, 6 A.L.R. 1145, 179 Pac. 372; Barber v. Jones Shoe Co. 79 N. H. 311, 108 Atl. 690; Rish v. Iowa Portland Cement Co. 186 Iowa, 443, 170 N. W. 532. To the foregoing might be added Humphery v. Industrial Commission, 285 Ill. 372, 120 N. E. 816; White v. Kansas City Stock Yards Co. 104 Kan. 90, 177 Pac. 522, and Judson Mfg. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 181 Cal. 300, 184 Pac. 1. In some of the foregoing cases the accident and consequent injury resulted from practical jokes, or what is commonly called horseplay, while in others they were caused by some act of the injured workman which was forbidden by the employer, or while the workman was engaged in play during the noon hour and while he was off duty. It is not practicable to review all of the cases. We shall, however, refer to two for the purpose of showing the theory upon which the courts proceed in such cases.

In Gurski v. Susquehanna Coal Co. 262 Pa. 1, 104 Atl. 801, the injured miner was working in a coral mine. Gas in dangerous quantities appeared in that part of the mine where he was working, and he was directed to leave there and work at another place a considerable distance away. That portion of the mine where the gas appeared was "closed off" by posting notices that that portion of the mine was dangerous, and by warning the workmen of the danger. One of the miners, working under contract and who had before mined coal in the "fenced-off" portion of the mine, had left his "mining machine," which he wanted, in the fenced-off portion of the mine. He was again notified on the morning of the accident not to enter that part of the mine, but he did not heed the warning, and, notwithstanding the notice and warning of danger, he, with his "helper," went to get the machine in the fenced-off portion of the mine, where, while in the act of doing so, he was suffocated by gas, and then and there died. Application was made for compensation by his wife under the Pennsylvania Compensation Act, and compensation was allowed by the court of common pleas, on an appeal to that court from the compensation board, which had disallowed the widow's claim. A further appeal was taken to the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and that court affirmed the judgment of the court of common pleas. In that case it was contended, as it is here: (1) That the accident did not arise in the course of the employment; (a) that, even though that were not conceded, yet that no recovery could be had because the deceased workman had wilfully disregarded the instructions and warnings of the employer. It is important to state here that the Pennsylvania Compensation Act is like ours in that it is only necessary to show that the accident arose in the course of the employment, and not that it arose out of it. The supreme court of Pennsylvania held that the accident arose "in the course of the employment," and that the failure of the deceased to heed and obey the warning of the coal company merely constituted negligence, which, under the act, did not affect the right of the widow to recover compensation. The case, in so far as the failure of the miner to obey the directions and warnings goes, goes farther than, under the evidence in this case, we are asked to go by the attorney general.

The only other case we shall attempt to review is the case of Thomas v. Proctor & G. Co. 104 Kan. 432, 6 A.L.R. 1145, 179 Pac. 372. In that case a young girl, about seventeen years of age, was injured while she, with two other girls during the lunch hour, was riding around the room on a small truck which was used by the company in hauling articles from place to place in the factory. The truck was in a room where the girls ate their lunches, and after they had eaten, and with the knowledge and consent of the assistant foreman, they would ride around the room on the truck for amusement. The injured girl, on the date of the accident, just as the whistle had called the workmen to commence work, in some way fell off the truck and was injured. She made application for compensation, and it was contended that the accident did not "arise out of and in the course of the employment." Under the Kansas statute the accident must arise out of and in the course of the employment in order to entitle the employee to recover compensation. The supreme court of Kansas held that, in view that the assistant foreman had permitted and encouraged the girls to use the truck for the purpose aforesaid on that and other occasions, for that reason, when considered in connection with other circumstances, the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and affirmed the award. That case, in our judgment, goes very far in upholding the award upon the ground that it arose out of the employment as well as in the course thereof.

About all of the other cases to which we have referred, and in which the accident was the result of some practical joke, prank, or horseplay, are distinguishable from the case at bar in that in those cases the injured employee did not voluntarily join in the horseplay, and at the time he was injured was discharging his usual duties in the course of his employment. Upon the other hand, there are a number of cases which are cited by plaintiff's counsel in which compensation was disallowed because the accident there in question resulted from practical joking, horseplay, or pranks, or because the injured employee had disregarded the positive orders of the employer. The following cases are illustrative of that class of cases: Reimers v. Proctor Pub. Co. 85 N. J. L. 441, 89 Atl. 931, 4 N. C. C. A. 738; Rochford's Case, 234 Mass. 93, 124 N. E. 891; Moyer v. Packard Motor Car Co. 205 Mich. 503, 171 N. W. 403; Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 31 Cal. App. 701, 162 Pac. 1040; Re Loper, 64 Ind. App. 571, 116 N. E. 324. In the last case cited, the appellate court of Indiana, in the course of the opinion, states the rule thus: "The books contain many cases involving injuries to workmen caused or occasioned by some sportive act of a fellow workman, done by him independent of or disconnected from the performance of any duty of his employment, and characterized by the courts and law-writers as 'practical joking,' 'skylarking,' or 'horseplay.' With practical uniformity, the courts hold, both under the English act and also under the various American statutes, that an injury so suffered does not arise out of the employment within the meaning of the governing statute, and consequently that its compensatory provisions are not thereby invoked."

In support of the statement contained in the quotation the court cited the following cases: Federal Rubber Mfg. Co. v. Havolic, 162 Wis. 341, L.R.A.1916D, 968, 156 N. W. 143; Hulley v. Moosbrugger, 88 N. J. L. 162, L.R.A.1916C, 1203, 95 Atl. 1007; Fishing v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 690, 158 Pac. 215; Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, L.R.A.1916F, 1164, 158 Pac. 212, 12 N. C. C. A. 789; Pierce v. Boyer-Van Kuran Lumber & Coal Co. 99 Neb. 321, L.R.A.1916D, 970, 156 N. W. 509, and De Filipis v. Falkenberg, 170 App. Div. 153, 155 N. Y. Supp. 761. We have carefully examined every one of the foregoing cases, and while it is true that in those cases the accidents were caused as a result of skylarking, horseplay, or pranks, yet it is also true that compensation was denied, upon the ground, however, that the accidents did not arise "out of the employment," or for the reason that the accidents were caused by the "wilful misconduct" of the employee in question, and not because they did not arise "in the course of the employment." Indeed, in almost every one of the cases, it is conceded in the course of the opinions that the accident there in question may have arisen in the course of the employment, yet that it did not arise out of the employment, and the decisions are based upon the latter ground.

What has just been said also applies to the cases first cited in support of plaintiff's contention. Moreover, in all of those cases, the courts specially refer to the statute which limits recovery to accidents "arising out of the employment." The courts in deciding those cases, however, did not hold that an employee, or, in case of his death, his dependents, may not recover compensation merely because the accident was the result of some practical joke, prank, or horseplay. What the courts hold is that, in case the joke, prank, or horseplay was such that it could not be said that the accident arose out of the employment, then no recovery could be had under the statute. Our statute, as we have pointed out, is, however, broader than were the statutes under consideration in those cases, in that all accidents which arise "in the course of the employment" are protected, as well as those which arise "out of the employment." It is universally conceded, as it must be, that the term "arising in the course of the employment" is broader and of larger scope and effect than is the term "arising out of the employment." It must, however, be obvious to all that an accident which arose out of the employment must necessarily also have arisen in the course of the employment. It is, we think, equally obvious that the converse of the proposition does not follow. The question, however, still remains: Did the accident in this case arise in the course of the employment?

As hereinbefore stated, the case at bar differs from nearly all of the so-called horseplay or practical-joke cases in this, that in most of those cases the victim of the joke or horseplay either did not participate in the joke or horseplay at all, or if he did, it was because he was forced to do so, while in this case the deceased was the instigator and the principal, if not the sole, actor, in the horseplay; that is, it is clearly inferable from the evidence that, if the deceased had not shut off the power from the elevator when Mitchell was coming up to the second floor with it, the accident would not have happened. Again, if he had not leaned over or "climbed" on to the gate, and had not shifted the switch so as to put the power on the elevator, he would not have been hurt. In view of the foregoing, it is not entirely clear to the mind of the writer why it may not be contended with some force that the acts of the deceased were not taken in the course of his employment. Even though it be conceded that he was doing no wrong in going to the second floor, yet it does not follow, from that, that what he did was in the course of his employment. An act need not necessarily be wrongful to carry it beyond the course of the employment. So far as the evidence disclosed, there was no reason why the deceased should have left the first floor and gone to the second one at the time of the accident. It seems also reasonable to assume that in doing that he was not engaged in any matter or thing which in any way redounded to the good of the service in which he was engaged. Nor was it directly connected with that service. There is, therefore, much force to the contention that the accident in question did not arise out of the employment, and there is also some force to the argument that it did not arise in the course of the employment. A careful reading of the decided cases will, however, disclose that the mere fact that the injured employee, at the time of the accident, was not in the discharge of his usual

Workmen's compensation—horseplay—course of employment.

duties, or was not directly engaged in anything connected with those duties, does not necessarily prevent him from recovering compensation in case of accidental injury. In that connection it must be remembered that, while a human being may do no more than what a machine might do, yet he cannot be classed as a machine merely. If during his working hours there are intervals of leisure, he may, during such intervals, within reasonable limits, move from place to place on the premises of the employer, in case he refrains from exposing himself voluntarily to known or visible hazards or dangers. In moving about, as aforesaid, he may also have social intercourse with his coemployees, and within reasonable limits may "visit" with them. In doing these things within the bounds of reason, the employee does not go outside of the course of his employment. Every employer understands that, in case boys of immature years are employed, he is charged with notice of their natural propensities to congregate, to communicate, and to play with one another. If, therefore, the employer employs any boys and girls, and gives them work which is not continuous, so that there are intervals of leisure, he must assume that during such intervals they may seek communion with their fellow workmen, and he, therefore, must govern himself accordingly. In thus communicating with their fellow workmen—ordinarily, at least—they do not pass beyond the sphere of their employment. Nor is it necessarily detrimental to the service to permit workmen to communicate with each other, and neither the general law nor the industrial act prohibits such intercourse. The movements of the employees and their associations with one another may therefore, within reasonable limits, be well said to be in the course of the employment. While, therefore, in view of all the circumstances of this case, there may be some reason for reasonable minds to differ with respect to whether the accident in question arose in the course of the employment, yet, in view that we are required to construe the act liberally and with the view of effectuating its purpose, and so as to protect the unfortunate employee, and, in case of his death, those who are dependent on him for support, we feel constrained to hold that the accident in question arose in the course of the employment.

20 A.L.R.—56.

It is, however, contended that the deceased violated the orders of the Canning Company in using the elevator, and that he used it for an illegitimate purpose, and that for that reason the applicant may not recover compensation. It is true that in Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 31 Cal. App. 701, 162 Pac. 1040, the compensation was denied because the accident there in question was caused by the "wilful misconduct" of the boy that was killed. The boy there in question was sent upon an errand, and after returning he, in violation of the express instruction of the employer, used an elevator to go to the upper story in the building and was killed. Here, again, it becomes important to have recourse to the terms of the statute. Our statute only excludes those injuries which are "purposely self-inflicted." As we read the statute, therefore, it is not enough that the employee merely disregards some rule, regulation, or order of the master, since such conduct may constitute nothing more than ordinary negligence on the part of the employee, and mere negligence does not destroy the right to compensation. Nor does the fact that the employee may have violated some rule or order necessarily prevent him from obtaining compensation in case of accidental injury. That doctrine is illustrated and applied in a number of the cases hereinbefore cited. But we are here not dealing with an adult, with a man of mature years and experience, but with a mere boy, without experience, and with an abundance of life and vigor. Here we meet a situation where the injured lad had outgrown his childish fears, but had not yet reached the age when, by reason of his experience and judgment he would exercise a very great degree of care or caution for his own safety and protection. While, therefore, the acts of the deceased which resulted in his death, in view of all of the circumstances, are not to be commended, yet, in view of his age and immaturity of mind, they were not unnatural or without the bounds of reason. At all events, they were not of that character which would authorize us to hold that the injuries which he suffered were "purposely self-inflicted" within the purview of the statute.

—effect of disregard of rule.

It is true that in some of its aspects this may be a border-line case, and if the deceased had been a man of mature years and experience we might have reached a different conclusion. It is, however, also true that in view of all the circumstances, and for the reasons stated, and in accordance with the great weight of authority, the Commission was justified in awarding compensation to the mother of the deceased, and therefore the award should be, and it accordingly is, affirmed; costs to be taxed against plaintiffs.

Corfman, Ch. J., and Weber, Gideon, and Thurman, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Workmen's compensation: right to compensation in case of injuries sustained through horseplay or fooling.

This annotation is supplementary to that in 13 A.L.R. 540.

As to right to compensation under Workmen's Compensation Acts for injury from assault, see annotation to Chicago v. Industrial Commission, 15 A.L.R. 588.

It will be observed that in LEE'S CASE (reported herewith) ante, 870, an injury received by an employee in the course of his employment as a result of horseplay by other employees, in which he took no part, was held not to have arisen out of his employment.

It will be noted that the decision in TWIN PEAKS CANNING CO. v. INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION (reported herewith) ante, 872, holding that the death of the victim of his own practical joke is compensable was under a statute which only requires that the accident arise in the course of the employment, "or" out of the employment, using "or" instead of "and" used in most of the acts.

The decision in Leonbrun v. Champion Silk Mills (1920) 229 N. Y. 470, 13 A.L.R. 522, 128 N. E. 711, set out at page 543 of earlier annotation, was relied upon in Janschewsky v. E. W. Bliss Co. (1921) 198 App. Div. 8, 189 N. Y. Supp. 154, where an injury, sustained when an employee, who was looking for his tools among those of another employee, was pushed by the latter and a struggle ensued, was held to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment.

And in Verschleiser v. Stern (1920) 229 N. Y. 192, 128 N. E. 126, the injury was held to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment, where someone dropped a piece of flesh about the neck of an employee in an abattoir, and he struck another employee whom he believed responsible, and was injured by the latter.

In Stark v. State Industrial Acci. Commission (1922) — Or. —, 204 Pac. 151, it was held that the injury was caused by an accident which arose out of and in the course of the employment where two employees of a shipbuilding company participated in a scuffle with an air hose used in the work, and one of them stumbled and fell in such a position that air from the hose entered his rectum and caused peritonitis. The court said: "The injury in question was caused by an industrial accident. It was a peril of the service. Under the usual conditions there prevailing the employees were more or less subject to such peril. It was an unexpected accident, but nevertheless may reasonably be said to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment. It was an incident of such employment by reason of the appliance used in the work, and the custom which prevailed of the employees, without the infraction of any enforced rule of the establishment, diverting the use of the air hose to sport. The play which had been going on between Stark and Cooper was entirely mutual. The question as to who started the sport can become material only for the purpose of fixing the fault; and, as we have already pointed out, fault of the injured employee under certain conditions, such as prevailed in this case, does not constitute a reason for not allowing compensation."

But in Stein v. Williams Printing Co. (1921) 195 App. Div. 336, 186 N. Y. Supp. 705, where a fellow employee pushed the claimant in a playful manner, and caused the latter to assault the employee, who then injured the claimant, it was held that no compensation could be had under the New York Workmen's Compensation Act. The court said: "While it is probably true that technically Schults made the initial assault in this particular instance, it appears that these men had been in the habit of going through more or less of horseplay, and there is no claim that Schults had any intention of doing anything more than had been customary. There was no such insulting conduct as in Verschleiser v. Stern (N. Y.) supra, nor any apparent latent ill will, and no reason, so far as appears, why Schults should have anticipated any trouble on account of his playful grabbing of the claimant's blouse. The claimant, on his part, appears not only to have made a vicious assault upon Schults by the throwing of the milk bottle, but to have followed it with an effort to get hold of a cobblestone, after trying to bite Schults. It was while he was in this last act, and when the safety of Schults was fairly menaced, that the claimant received the blow which resulted in his injuries. The Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, chap. 67) provides for compensating injuries 'arising out of and in the course of his employment, without regard to fault, on the part of the claimant, except where the injury is occasioned by the wilful intention of the injured employee to bring about the injury or death of himself or of another' (§ 10), and the statute is to be read in connection with this exception. There can be no doubt that the claimant's injury resulted from his efforts to injure Schults. He was not in any danger from Schults; no one suggests that the claimant had anything to fear from the horse play of Schults, and it is not contended that this playful act was interfering with the discharge of any duty which the claimant owed to the employer. He appears to have suddenly changed his attitude of playfulness, and to have left the service of the employer for the purpose of injuring Schults, and he received his injuries while following out that purpose, rather than any purpose of the master."

In Federal Mut. Liability Ins. Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1921) — Oal. —, 201 Pac. 920, where an employee engaged in sweeping a floor was struck in the eye and injured by a grape which another employee, engaged in putting grapes into a machine, threw at a third employee, the injury was held not to have arisen out of and in the course of the employment, the court stating that there was nothing in the nature of the employment in which any of the workmen were engaged which required any of them to throw grapes at another; that the act was a playful or malicious act of one employee toward another, having no connection whatever with the work in which he was engaged.

In Great Western Power Co. v. Industrial Acci. Commission (1921) — Cal. —, 201 Pac. 931, the court refused to adopt the view allowing compensation in case an employee was injured through another's prank to which the one injured was not a party, and held that an injury to an employee did not arise out of his employment where he was passing over a platform on his way from a tool house to the place where he was working, when two employees, who were engaged in a friendly wrestling match, fell on him and broke his leg, and it was not claimed that the scuffling was habitual, or that the employer had any knowledge of the horseplay, or that it had any other characteristic which would make it a risk of the employment. J. T. W.

OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP CELIA, Appts.,
v.
OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP VOLTURNO, Respts.

House of Lords—July 28, 1921.

([1921] 2 A. C. 544.)

Damages — loss proved in foreign currency — rate of exchange — proper date for conversion into English currency.

In an action arising out of a collision between an English ship and an Italian ship both ships were held to blame, and the cross claims for damages were agreed, subject to a question raised by the owners of the Italian ship as to the rate of exchange in respect of a claim calculated in Italian lire for detention during the period that the ship was undergoing repairs. Held, by Lord Buckmaster, Lord Sumner, Lord Parmoor, and Lord Wrenbury, Lord Carson dissenting, that the proper date for ascertaining the rate of exchange for the purpose of converting the amount payable into English currency was the date at which the detention occurred.

[See note on this question beginning on page 899.]

APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal in [1920] W. N. 300, 90 L. J. Prob. N. S. 109, 125 L. T. N. S. 191, affirming an order of Hill, J.

The action arose out of a collision which occurred in the Mediterranean between an English steamship, the Celia, and an Italian steamship, the Volturno. At the trial Hill, J., found both ships equally to blame and referred the question of damages to the registrar. The cross claims for damages were agreed subject to a question raised by the owners of the Volturno as to one item of their claim, which was calculated in lire, as to the rate of exchange.

That question was whether, in calculating the amount which the respondents, the owners of the Volturmo, were entitled to recover from the appellants, the owners of the Celia, in respect of damages for loss of the use of their vessel, the rate of exchange to be taken should be taken at the time the loss was incurred or at the time of assessment or payment. The facts are stated in the report of the case before Hill, J., and in the judgment of Lord Buckmaster. The registrar held that the date upon which the rate of exchange should be ascertained was the date of payment. Hill, J., held that the rate of exchange in respect of the claims for detention should be fixed as at the periods of detention, and the Court of Appeal, without delivering any reasoned judgment, affirmed this decision on the ground that the case was covered by a previous decision of the Court in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36.

Present: Lord Buckmaster, Lord Sumner, Lord Parmoor, Lord Wrenbury, and Lord Carson.

Raeburn, K. C., and Langton, for the appellants:

The proper date for ascertaining the rate of exchange is the date of the judgment. This was so held in the case of breach of contract by Roche, J., in Kirsch & Co. v. Allen H. & Co. [1919] W. N. 301, 36 Times L. R. 59, 148 L. T. Jo. 198, 122 L. T. N. S. 159, 25 Com. Cas. 63. That decision was reversed by the Court of Appeal on the ground that there was no binding or effective contract, but the question as to the rate of exchange was not discussed. 25 Com. Cas. 174, [1920] W. N. 73, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 265, 123 L. T. N. S. 105, 36 Times L. R. 245. However, in the later case of Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 2 K. B. 704. Roche, J., relied from his former opinion and held that the proper date was the date of the breach; and this view has been adopted by Bailhache, J., in Barry v.

Van den Hurk [1920] 2 K. B. 709, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 899, 36 Times L. R. 663, 123 L. T. N. S. 719, 64 Sol. Jo. 602, and by McCardie, J., in Lebeaupin v. Crispin [1920] 2 K. B. 714, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1024, 36 Times L. R. 739, 64 Sol. Jo. 652, 25 Com. Cas. 335, 150 L. T. Jo. 24. Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. has since been affirmed by the Court of Appeal in [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36, and this is really an appeal from that decision unless it can be distinguished on the ground that this is a case of tort, and not of breach of contract. The appellants submit, first, that, whether the case be one of breach of contract or tort, the proper date is the date of judgment; secondly, that damages for tort stand on a different footing. The respondents are resident in Italy, and proved their loss in Italian currency, and upon a proper application of the principle of restitutio in integrum they should receive such a sum in pounds sterling as would produce the number of lire proved to have been lost, and no more, but the judgments of Hill, J., and of the Court of Appeal, would give them more lire than they have lost. The amount of lire which the respondents should recover ought not to be made dependent upon a fluctuating rate of exchange. Further, in an action in tort, the damages may go on increasing from the day upon which the tort is committed until the day they are ascertained, and they are not ascertained until they are assessed. Until the recent series of cases there does not appear to be any reported case in England where this point has ever been argued, much less decided. [They referred to Scott v. Bevan, 2 Barn. & Ad. 78, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1073, 9 L. J. K. B. 152, and Bertram v. Duhamel, 2 Moore, P. C. C. 212, 12 Eng. Reprint, 984.] Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times, L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498, assists the appellant's contention and it shows the extreme inconvenience which may arise from fixing the date of the breach as the proper date for ascertaining the rate of exchange. The view contended for by the appellants is that which prevails in the United States. Marburg v. Marburg, 26 Md. 8, 90 Am. Dec. 84; Story, Confl.

L. 8th ed. §§ 308, 311A; Sedgw. Damages, 9th ed. § 274.

Sir John Simon, K. C. (with him A. D. Bateson, K. C., and Balloch), for the respondents:

In an action for tort the English court is concerned with nothing except with awarding in sterling the amount of the defendant's liability. It ascertains the rights of the parties and awards that which measures the loss at the time when the loss occurs. Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498, is really an authority against the appellants. All three judges in the Court of Appeal agreed that, if that were an ordinary action for damages for breach of contract, the plaintiff would be entitled as at the date of the breach, and the judgment of the majority proceeded, rightly or wrongly, upon the form of the action. The view of the majority was that, the action being an action for an account, it was an action for the balance found due on the taking of the account, and not for the several items to be included in it, and that, therefore, the rate of exchange was to be fixed as at the date when that balance was ascertained. For the purpose of the present appeal there is no difference between an action for tort and an action for breach of contract.

Raeburn, K. C., replied.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord Buckmaster:

My lords, on December 17, 1917, a collision occurred in the Mediterranean between the steamship Celia, which belongs to the appellants, and the Italian steamship Volturno, which is the property of the respondents.

The dispute as to liability for the collision was determined in this country in an action before Hill, J., who decided, on July 22, 1919, that both vessels were to blame, and referred the question of damages to the registrar. The cross claims for damages were agreed between the parties. The claims of the owners of the Volturno included one for loss due to the fact that the vessel was under hire to the Italian Ministry of Marine at all material dates, and that in consequence of her detention for the necessary repairs from December 25 to 30, 1917, at Gibraltar, and January 24 to February 18, 1918, at Newport News, deductions from her hire were made amounting to 304,418 lire. That the Volturno is entitled to damages under this head is admitted. But the question is, At what date ought the rate of exchange to be fixed, in order that those damages, which were originally assessed in lire, should be converted into sterling? The registrar held that the date at which the damage was assessed was the right date, but Hill, J., decided that the time when the actual loss for each detention was incurred was the correct period, and this view has been confirmed by the Court of Appeal.

It is suggested that special considerations may apply in regard to the particular circumstances in which this matter arises for determination, but I cannot see that any of these circumstances take this case out of the general rule, and it is the nature of that general rule which your lordships are asked to consider and determine. There are only two possible dates put forward as the dates upon which the conversion can be made—the date when the loss was incurred and the date when the liability for the loss was determined. The suggestion that it might be the date of the writ was incapable of being supported, and has not been argued. For the purpose of determining which of these two periods is correct it is essential to examine what it is that the judgment effects.

It is argued on behalf of the appellants that it should be considered as divided into two parts, the one declaratory of liability determined in lire and fixed at the date when the damage was incurred, and the other as a matter of mere machinery converting the lire into sterling at the date of the judgment.

To my mind that is not the true function and purpose of the judgment. A judgment, whether for breach of contract or for tort, where, as in this case, the damage is not continuing, does not proceed by determining what is the sum which, without regarding other circumstances, would, at the time of the hearing, afford compensation for the loss, but what was the loss actually proved to have been incurred either at the time of the breach or in consequence of the wrong. With regard to an ordinary claim for breach of contract this is plain. Assuming that the breach complained of was the nondelivery of goods according to contract, the measure of damage is the loss sustained at the time of the breach, measured by the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at that date.

As was stated by Wright, J., in the case of Joyner v. Weeks [1891] 2 Q. B. 31, 33: "Many cases may be put in which it is plainly immaterial that at the commencement of an action for a breach of contract the plaintiff is in fact no worse off than he would have been if the contract had been performed."

And, as an instance of this proposition, he gives the alteration of market values. By the same process of reasoning a person who has committed a breach cannot have his liability increased by such a cause.

Similar considerations apply to an action for tort. In cases where, as in the present, the damage is fixed and definite, and due to conditions determined at a particular date, the amount of damage is assessed by reference to the then-existing circumstances, and subsequent changes would not affect the result. If these damages be assessed in a foreign currency, the judgment here, which must be expressed in sterling, must be based on the amount required to convert this currency into sterling at the date when the measure was properly made, and the subsequent fluctuation of exchange, one way or the other, ought not to be taken into account.

There is little authority upon the actual question until recent times—a circumstance due, no doubt, to the fact that fluctuations of currency did not formerly occur with the violent oscillations by which they have been marked in recent years. One of the earliest cases in Scott v. Bevan, 2 Barn. & Ad. 78, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1073, 9 L. J. K. B. 152. In that case judgment had been recovered in Jamaica for the sum of £1,554 16s. 8d., current money of the island of Jamaica, and proceedings were taken here upon the judgment, the only question being whether the judgment should be converted into English currency, £100 sterling being the equivalent of £140 currency of Jamaica, or whether it should be taken at par, and it was decided that it ought to be estimated at the rate of exchange at the time of the judgment in Jamaica. The real question raised here does not appear to have been considered by the court, a significant fact when it is remembered that Lord Tenterden was the presiding judge.

In the case of Bertram v. Duhamel, 2 Moore, P. C. C. 212, 12 Eng. Reprint, 984, the point was not elaborately argued, and the quotation in the judgment at p. 217 is from the opinion of Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. Jr. 314, 32 Eng. Reprint, 1109, but this is not sufficiently explicit to afford real assistance.

The next case is of greater importance. It is Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498. In that case an action was brought claiming an account of moneys due under a contract which provided for payment in Mexican dollars. Judgment in the action, declaring the plaintiff to be entitled to an account, was delivered on November 4, 1897, and the defendant in fact delivered an account on November 13 of the same year, showing that a balance was due to the plaintiff in Mexican dollars on October 31, 1896. The question that arose was the date at which conversion from Mexican dollars into English sterling should take place. The plaintiff at first suggested that each sum of money should be converted into sterling at the date when it was shown to be due in the account, but he appears to have been willing to accept August 31, 1896, the date when the balance of the amount was shown to be due, while the defendants contended that the proper date was November 13, 1897, when the account was delivered.

It is, at least, remarkable that the actual date of the judgment was not suggested as the critical moment. The court held, Vaughan Williams, L. J., dissenting, that the right date was November 13, 1897. The foundation of the judgment depends entirely upon the fact that the claim was a claim for an account, and it appears to proceed upon the principle that the account was the real cause of action.

Lindley, M. R., says ([1898] 1 Ch. 589): "To substitute English money for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter."

Rigby, L. J., says (id. 590) that the plaintiff's argument "proceeds upon an entire misapprehension of the nature of an action for account in equity, which is an action for the balance found due on the taking of the account, and not for the several items to be included in it;" and he then says that the account "was not delivered until November 13, 1897, and, even if accepted on that date, could not have formed the basis of an order at an earlier period." This judgment clearly does not depend upon the view that the date of the judgment is the correct date for conversion, but rather upon the ground that the judgment is a judgment for something which is found due on taking the account, and that it is at the date when the account has been taken or delivered that the true liability is disclosed. In other words, the balance of the account is treated as the foundation of the claim for judgment, and it is at that date that the conversion is to be made.

I am not prepared to accept this view, but it is not essential to determine that question in the present case. It is sufficient to say that the judgment certainly did not proceed upon the ground for which the appellants now contend. Vaughan Williams, L. J., on the other hand, states in clear language the principle which the respondents say is correct. [1898] 1 Ch. 592. He says: "It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling, and thus converting the one currency into the other, is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment." And he adds: "I see no reason why a different rule should be applied in a case where the form of action is, as it is in this case, an action for an account." He thought, therefore, that conversion should take place in respect of each item as it was shown to be due, but as the plaintiff was willing to accept October 31, 1896, he also accepted that date as correct.

With the principle as he enunciates it I am in entire agreement, and I do not think that there is any expression in the judgment of the other learned lords justices to show that they disagreed. Their judgment rested, as I have shown, on their view as to the proper application of this principle to the circumstances of the action. The final authorities upon this matter are, fortunately, far from ambiguous. Roche, J., in Kirsch & Co. v. Allen, H. & Co. [1919] W. N. 301, 36 Times L. R. 59, 148 L. T. Jo. 198, 122 L. T. N. S. 159, 25 Com. Cas. 63, decided that the rate of exchange should be taken as at the present time, meaning, no doubt, the date of judgment; but in a later decision of Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 2 K. B. 704, which was an action for breach of contract to carry goods from London to Italy, and for conversion, the learned judge held that the proper measure of damage was the value of the goods at the date when they should have arrived in Italy. He found the value in Italian lire and converted the sum into English currency at the rate of exchange on that date. This judgment was upheld by the Court of Appeal. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36. Bailhache, J., in Barry v. Van den Hurk [1920] 2 K. B. 709, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 899, 36 Times L. R. 663, 123 L. T. N. S. 719, 64 Sol. Jo. 602, also fixed the date for conversion as the date when the damages were properly measured, and McCardie, J., in Lebeaupin v. Crispin [1920] 2 K. B. 714, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1024, 36 Times L. R. 739, 64 Sol. Jo. 652, 25 Com. Cas. 335, 150 L. T. Jo. 24, decided the same thing.

([1921] 2 A. C. 544.)

There is, consequently, a very formidable body of opinion in recent decisions against the appellants' contention, and the only authority to which they can refer in their support is the American case of Marburg v. Marburg, 26 Md. 8, 90 Am. Dec. 84, decided in 1866. There does not appear to have been any consideration of the question in the Supreme Court of the United States, and their lordships are deprived of the assistance which would have been afforded had the matter been the subject of argument before that tribunal. The principle underlying the decision in the Maryland case appears largely to be due to the consideration of textbooks on international law. In one sense the case undoubtedly affects international matters, but it does not necessarily follow that it involves consideration of international law. The real question must depend upon the true effect of a judgment in one country relating to damages that are measured in terms of a foreign currency, and into this international relations do not necessarily enter. Disputes similar to that in the present case could easily arise between two British subjects out of a purely British contract, where the measure of damage was originally expressed in terms of a foreign currency; in such a case the English court could and ought to measure the damages at the proper date, and then, at that date, convert the foreign exchange into English currency. There can be no difference in the principle when one of the litigants is not a British subject.

For these reasons I think that this appeal should fail, and should be dismissed, with costs.

Lord Sumner:

My lords, a good deal of the effect of the appellants' plausible and ingenious argument is due to two fallacious suggestions, which have crept into and color the whole of it. The first is that this is, in substance, a claim by the owners of the Volturmo for a sum contractually due from the owners of the Celia in lire, and the other that, as they have elected to recover it here and not in Italy, the judgment recovered here is merely an attempt to put them in the same position as if a contract had been enforced in Italy.

The collision occurred on the high seas, and, subject to proof that the Celia was to blame, she became forthwith liable for the consequences. I may pass over the fact that the Volturmo was also to blame, as not, for this purpose, affecting the matter. The right to compensation was complete then and there, though it might take time to discover all the consequences and to establish the extent of the mischief. That compensation was not recoverable in any particular currency, and, although for convenience of proof it would be severable into divers heads and items, it would be one gross sum, recoverable once for all. If there had been prospective or continuing damage the matter would have been more complicated, but I do not think that the principle would have been affected. The currency in which judgment would be given would depend upon the place in which the plaintiffs might find the defendants' ship so as to arrest her in proceedings in rem, or might succeed in serving process on the defendants themselves as the commencement of proceedings in personam. The essential thing to remember, which the appellants somewhat ignored, is that the sum in question here is only an item in a general claim for damages for a wrong done at sea, which was the subject of compensation just as naturally in British as in Italian currency.

Damages—loss proved in foreign currency—rate of exchange—proper date for conversion into English currency.

The deduction of hire for the Volturmo, which the Italian Ministry of Marine made from the sums payable by it to her owners under the charter, is, therefore, for the purposes of this case, mere evidence of damage inflicted on them by the collision. Though proved in a different way from the physical damage to the ship, it is on the same footing, for it measures their loss, suffered by having the ship laid up, just as their repair bills measure their loss, suffered by having her side stove in. If the question of damage had not been simplified by an agreement between the parties, and if all the damages had gone to the registrar and merchants for assessment together, no one would have thought of raising any question of the rate of exchange as at the date of the judgment. The cost of the temporary repairs incurred at Gibraltar would, I suppose, have been proved in sterling; if they had been done at Marseilles or Cadiz, they would have been proved in francs or in pesetas, just as the repairs at Newport News would have been proved in dollars, and in each case these currencies would have been converted into sterling, as at the date when liability for the several outlays accrued, because, when the damage is proved by the actual cost of repairing it, conversion of that cost forthwith into the currency with which the high court deals is simply the process of completing that proof. When the owners of the Volturmo came to their next item—namely, the money value of the use of the ship, of which the damage suffered in collision deprived them—why should any different rule as to exchange be applied? The charter furnished very precise evidence of the then value of the ship in use day by day, but it was evidence only and was not conclusive. See The Argentino, per Bowen, L. J. (1888) L. R. 13 Prob. Div. 191, 202, 203. The owners of the Celia would have been at liberty to challenge it, if they could, and, if there had been no charter, the Italian owners might have shown what employment in Greece or in Norway could have been got, and so have measured their loss in drachmas or in kroner, instead of in lire. If the damages were such as need not be repaired at all, the whole loss might have been measured by the immediate depreciation of the ship in consequence of the collision, for the Volturmo's owners would not be bound to repair her merely for the benefit of the owners of the Celia. In that case there would either be no question of exchange, if the evidence of sound and damage values could be given in sterling, or, if there was any conversion into sterling, it would have been calculated at the rate current at the time of the collision.

My lords, I am quite unable to understand why the owners of the Volturmo should be subjected to any different rule merely because they have had the good sense to eliminate all questions that could be agreed, and to present in the most naked form the one question as to which the parties were in difference. All that was agreed was the number of lire actually deducted by the Italian Ministry of Marine during the periods when the Volturmo was off hire, with the dates of the commencement and ending of those periods. Whether any adjustment was made for the expenses of running the ship while earning hire, which would be saved while she was off hire, does not appear. I do not gather that anything in the agreement was meant to vary any of the rights of the parties.

The appellants, however, completed their argument by saying that the court, having ascertained how many lire the collision cost the owners of the Volturmo in respect of detention, terminated its judicial functions at that point, and thereafter, in bringing into the judgment a certain amount of sterling to correspond with that finding, was merely making its decision available to the judgment creditors, as the best way in which they could be assisted by an English court to get the lire to which they were really entitled. I think this, again, is a fallacy. For the purposes of a collision action it is the judgment that is the final judicial act, and it is the judgment that is the decision of the court. The agreed numbers of lire are only part of the foreign language in which the court is informed of the damage sustained, and, like the rest of the foreign evidence, must be translated into English. Being a part of the description and definition of the damage, this evidence as to lire must be understood with reference to the time when the damage accrues, which it is used to describe.

The matter may be tested in this way. Suppose that, as an incident of the collision, some seamen belonging to the Celia had taken possession on behalf of her owners of a parcel of Italian currency notes, the property of the owners of the Volturmo, and that the former had received and kept it. The owners of the Volturmo could have claimed damages for conversion of the notes, or their return with damages for their detention, as they chose. In the first case the value of the notes would be taken and exchanged into sterling as at the date of the conversion, and as the foundation of the damages in the second case the same date would have been taken. Why should damage to the ship and her owners by collision be measured otherwise?

No authority was forthcoming which really supported the appellants' propositions. There have been, during the past 100 years, several English cases, in which these propositions might, and indeed ought to, have been applied, if they are sound; yet very learned judges proved to be unconscious of their existence. The best example is Scott v. Bevan, 2 Barn & Ad. 78, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1073, 9 L. J. K. B. 152. The case in the Court of Appeal in 1898 (Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498) really negatives them.

On the other hand, considerable support for the view which I have ventured to express above is to be found in the judgment of the privy council in Pilkington v. Commissioners for Claims on France, 2 Knapp, P. C. C. 7, 19, 12 Eng. Reprint, 381, which was pronounced by Sir William Grant, M. R. Referring to acts of the French revolutionary government, whereby, between 1793 and 1796, debts due by French subjects to British subjects and payable in France had been sequestrated, and to subsequent arrangements by treaty between England and France, under which compensation was to be made by France in respect of these acts, as for unjustifiable confiscation, and funds were deposited with commissioners for that purpose, he is reported as having said: "We think this has no analogy to the case of creditor and debtor. There is a wrong act done by the French government; then they are to undo that wrong act, and to put the party into the same situation as if they never had done it. . . . The Republic themselves, in effect, confess that no such decree ought to have been made. . . . Therefore it is not merely the case of a debtor paying a debt at the day it falls due, but it is the case of a wrongdoer, who must undo, and completely undo, the wrongful act he has done; and if he has received the assignats at the value of 50d., he does not make compensation by returning an assignat which is only worth 20d.; he must make up the difference between the value of the assignat at different periods." It is true that these observations are stated to be not strictly necessary to the decision (2 Knapp, P. C. C. 21), and that Dr. Knapp prints his report from notes by another hand, but I think these circumstances detract but little from the authority of the passage quoted.

As to Marburg v. Marburg, 26 Md. 8, 90 Am. Dec. 84, it is a case of a breach of contract to pay abroad a sum of money, which was the price of goods sold and delivered. It purports to follow Scott v. Bevan, 2 Barn. & Ad. 78, 109 Eng. Reprint, 1073, 9 L. J. K. B. 152, and has no reference to damages for a wrong not arising out of a contract. Even so, there has been at different times much discussion in the United States as to the true rules governing such actions (Story Conf. L. 8th ed. §§ 308-315; Sedgw. Damages, 9th ed. § 274); but I think the question need not be pursued, as all such cases turn upon contractual obligations for payment of fixed or calculable sums in a foreign place and in the local currency, which have been put in suit in the courts of the United States. For the same reason, while not intending to intimate any criticism upon it, I have not troubled your lordships with any examination of the judgment in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36, in the Court of Appeal. The case of Delegal v. Naylor, 7 Bing. 460, 131 Eng. Reprint, 178, 5 Moore & P. 443, 9 L. J. C. P. 167, might seem at first sight to be in point for the appellants, for it began with a claim in trover for a parcel of local currency notes seized in Lima, but subsequently an agreement was made with the wrongdoers to give up the notes, or pay their value as found by the officer of the court, and, the notes having been lost at sea, the question came before the court in the form of an application for directions as to the course he was to take under this agreement. I think that in substance the direction given was to find what it would cost to get notes of an equal face value in Lima, where they must be presumed to be worth what they appeared to be worth, and in any case it appears not to advance the present appellants' argument.

Finally it was urged that exchanging lire with sterling at the date of the judgment was the best way of eliminating speculative elements, and had the advantage of insuring that in no case would a judgment creditor get more than the exact sum to which he was entitled. Fluctuations in foreign exchanges inevitably introduce a speculative element into all transactions and affairs, and, unless the parties themselves have provided for this by some contract, the law must apply the same principles as if they had remained stable. Waiting to convert the currency till the date of judgment only adds the uncertainty of exchange to the uncertainty of the law's delays. The result may favor one side or the other, and there is no answer to this except that already discussed—namely, that the claimant's right is exclusively a right to lire, and would result in a judgment for lire, if only an English court was, so to speak, competent to express itself in Italian. This is a mere assumption. After all, the court is an English court, and in theory decides the right as at the time when it arises, and does so in plain English. I therefore think that this argument also fails, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Parmoor:

My lords, the relevant facts may be shortly stated. On December 17, 1917, there was a collision in the Mediterranean between the steamship Celia and the steamship Volturno. Both vessels have been held equally to blame for the collision. The Volturno was temporarily repaired at Gibraltar, causing a detention of the ship from December 25 to December 30, 1915, and permanently repaired at Newport, causing a detention of the ship from January 24 to February 18, 1918. The Volturno was on charter to the Italian government, and the vessel was off hire during each period of repair. The loss to the respondents from loss of hire during temporary repairs was agreed at lire 47,372.32, and during permanent repairs at lire 257,046.40; but a difference arose as to the date at which the rate of exchange for Italian lire should be taken, in order to ascertain the amount to be paid in English currency. The question for decision is whether, in calculating the amount which the respondents are entitled to recover from the appellants in respect of damages for the loss of hire of their vessel, the rate of exchange should be taken as that ruling when the loss was incurred, or as that ruling when the assessment of damage was ascertained.

The answer to this question depends not on any technical rule of English procedure, but on the principle of insuring to the injured party, as far as possible, the full measure of compensation to which he is entitled. The argument on behalf of the appellants is that, in an action of tort, damages are not ascertained until they have been assessed, and that, if, in the interval between the tortious act which has occasioned the damage and the ascertainment of its amount, there has been an alteration in the rate of exchange, the party injured will, instead of receiving the amount due to him as compensation, receive a greater or less amount, dependent on whether the rate of exchange has fluctuated favorably or adversely to his interest. I think that there would be no answer to this argument if the probable fluctuations in the rate of exchange between the date at which the loss is suffered and that at which the amount of damage is ascertained can be regarded as a relevant factor in determining what the amount of damages should be. For reasons hereinafter stated, there appears to me to be a fallacy in this contention. The argument for the respondents is that the amount of loss consequent on a tortious act, such as a collision at sea, falls to be determined at the date when it is suffered, and that the probability of subsequent alterations in the rate of exchange is immaterial, and that the risk of alteration in the rate of exchange is one which affects generally the financial transactions between the two countries, and is in no way connected, either with the tortious act, or with the ascertainment of the amount payable to the injured party.

In my opinion, this contention is correct. The probability of the alteration in the rate of exchange is not an admissible factor in the ascertainment of the amount of damage, both on the ground of remoteness, and on the ground that it is a matter which affects generally all financial transactions, and is in no way connected with the tortious act for which the respondents are liable. To prevent misunderstanding, I desire to add that if the probability of alterations in the rate of exchange could be regarded as a relevant factor in ascertaining the amount of damage, it would be within the discretion of a registrar to fix that rate as at the date of the assessment, or at such other time as, in his opinion, might be reasonably adopted to obtain a fair figure.

The necessity for transferring into English money damages ascertained in a foreign currency arises in the fact that the courts of this country have no jurisdiction to order payment of money except in English currency. Considerations which are irrelevant in the ascertainment of the amount of damage are irrelevant in fixing a rate of transfer, and I agree in the judgment of Hill, J., as confirmed by the Court of Appeal. In truth the risk of a subsequent fluctuation in the rate of exchange is a risk which the parties themselves respectively incur. In its incidence it may, in any particular case, either mitigate or enhance the amount which, under a stable condition of exchange, would be payable to the injured party; but in itself it cannot affect the ascertainment of damages.

Of the many cases to which your lordships were referred, the judgment of the privy council in Pilking-ton v. Commissioners for Claims on France, 2 Knapp, P. C. C. 7, 12 Eng. Reprint, 381, is most analogous to the present case. The judgment of Sir William Grant is based on the finding that a wrong act had been done by the French government, and that restoration in a debased currency is not restoration for the wrong done, and that, if the wrongdoer received the assignats at the value of 50d. he does not make compensation by returning an assignat which is only worth 20d., but that he must make up the difference of the assignat at the different periods. If the assignat at the later date had been worth more than the value of 50d., I think it would logically follow, on the judgment of Sir William Grant, that the wrongdoer would have made full compensation by returning such a number of assignats as would have replaced the numbers received, assessed at the value of 50d.

The other cases cited refer to damages on breach of contract, and not on tort. In the case of contract, no doubt, the parties may agree to make an alteration of exchange subsequent to the breach of contract an element in the assessment of damages, but in the absence of any such agreement, the same considerations would be applicable whether the action is based on tort or on contract. In the case of Di Ferdinando v. Si- mon, S. & Co. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36, in the Court of Appeal, it was pointed out that fluctuations in value subsequent to the date of the breach were irrelevant considerations on the ground of remoteness, and that, where there is a market, the damages are the market value of goods at the time and place where they should have been delivered. I agree with the judgment of Scrutton, L. J., and for the reasons given by him. The same view is expressed by Vaughan Williams, L. J., in Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 592, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498: "It seems plain that this mode of computing the value of foreign currency in English sterling, and thus converting the one currency into the other, is based upon damages for the breach of contract to deliver the commodity bargained for at the appointed time and place, and, if this is so, it follows that the date as of which that value must be ascertained is the date of the breach, and not the date of the judgment." In the same case Lindley, M. R., says that no claim by the plaintiff to damages can be supported, and that the judgment and trial of the action limited the right of the plaintiff to an account of what is due to him from the defendants. He held that the plaintiff was not entitled to have the dollars turned into English money until the amount due on taking the whole account was ascertained. It is not necessary in this appeal to consider the principles applicable to the taking of an account where no damages are claimed, but I do not think that this case supports an argument in favor of the contention of the appellants. In his judgment Lindley, M. R., adopts the principle expressed by Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. Jr. 314, 316, 32 Eng. Reprint, 1109: "I cannot bring myself to doubt that, where a man agrees to pay £100 in London upon the 1st of January, he ought to have that sum there upon that day. If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed." I will not detain your lordships by reference to cases which have already been fully dealt with.

My lords, in my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Wrenbury:

My lords, in my opinion this appeal fails. The action is for damages for tort. It is not a continuing tort. On December 30, 1917, and February 18, 1918, the defendants, the owners of the Volturmo, were, by the plaintiffs' wrong, damaged to the amount of 47,372.32 lire in the one case, and 257,046.40 in the other case, making together 304,418.72 lire. On June 8, 1920, the defendants' claim was agreed, subject to the question of the rate of exchange to be taken in assessing the loss. On December 30, 1917, the rate of exchange was 39.90. On February 18, 1918, it was 41.30. On June 20, 1920, it was 66.25. The order under appeal has taken 39.90 and 41.30 as the proper rates of exchange to be taken in measuring in English currency the agreed loss of 304,418.72 lire. The appellants say that this is wrong.

Your lordships who have preceded me have already reviewed the authorities; it is unnecessary for me to do so again; more usefully can I state in my own words what I think is the true principle. Assume that a judge is sitting in July to try an action for damages for a tort committed on the preceding January 1. Let me express the judgment in the form of a declaration, followed by an adjudication upon it. The judgment should, I think, be as follows: Declare that on January 1 the plaintiff suffered by reason of the defendant's tort a loss of 300,000 lire. Declare that on January 1 the equivalent sum in British currency was (say) £7,500. Adjudge that the plaintiff recover against the defendant £7,500. There is no difference of principle arising from the fact that the loss is of lire as distinguished from (say) cows. If the plaintiff had been damaged by the defendant tortiously depriving him of three cows, the judgment would be: Declare that on January 1 the plaintiff suffered by the defendant's tort a loss of three cows. Declare that on January 1 the plaintiff would have been entitled to go into the market and buy three similar cows, and charge the defendant with the price. Declare that the cost would have been £150. Adjudge that the plaintiff recover from the defendant £150. It would be nihil ad rem to say that in July similar cows would have cost in the market £300. The defendant is not bound to supply the plaintiff with cows. He is liable to pay him damages for having, on January 1, deprived him of cows. The plaintiff may be going out of farming and may not want cows, or, when judgment is given, he may have enough already. The plaintiff is not bound to take cows, and the defendant is not bound to supply them. The defendant is liable to pay the plaintiff damages—that is to say, money to some amount for the loss of the cows; the only question is, how much? The answer is, such sum as represents the market value at the date of the tort of the goods of which the plaintiff was tortiously deprived.

The argument to the contrary is that the defendant is bound by a pecuniary payment to put the plaintiff in a position as good as that in which he stood before the tort was committed. That is true, but it is necessary to add the consideration of which we have recently heard so much, in the form of a fourth dimension—namely, that of time. The defendant is bound to make such pecuniary payment as would put the plaintiff at the date of the tort in as good a position as he would have been in, had there been no tort. If the date taken be that, not of the tort, but of the judgment, it is giving the plaintiff, not damages for the tort, but damages also for the postponement of the payment of those damages until the date of the judgment. If such later damages can be recovered, as under circumstances they may be if the defendant improperly postpones payment, they would be recovered in the form of interest. They would be damages, not for the original tort, but for another and a subsequent wrongful act.

All the authorities are in favor of this view except the decision of Roche, J., in Kirsch & Co. v. Allen, H. & Co. [1919] W. N. 301, 122 L. T. N. S. 159, 36 Times L. R. 59, 148 L. T. Jo. 198, 25 Com. Cas. 63, and the American decision in Marburg v. Marburg, 26 Md. 8, 90 Am. Dec. 84. In Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 2 K. B. 704, Roche, J., himself, decided in favor of this view, preferring it (unless the cases could be distinguished) to his decision in Kirsch & Co. v. Allen, H. & Co. supra. His decision in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. was affirmed on appeal. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36. The present case is, in substance, an appeal from Di Ferdinando v. Simon S. & Co. In my opinion that case was well decided. No difference arises by reason of the fact that this is an action of tort, while that was an action for breach of contract. There is here no continuing tort.

I think this appeal should be dismissed.

Lord Carson:

My lords, a collision occurred on December 17, 1917, between the Celia and the Volturno. At the trial of the action on July 22, 1919, Hill, J., held both vessels equally to blame for the collision, and referred the question of damages to the Admiralty registrar. The damages, however, were agreed on June 8, 1920, and the reference was, therefore, not held. The damages were agreed in lire, and the question this House has to decide is as to the proper date upon which to calculate the rate of exchange in order to fix in English currency, for the purpose of entering an English judgment, the damages payable by the wrongdoer to a foreign claimant.

The registrar decided that the date of payment—by which I understand him to mean the date at which the judgment is entered—is the time at which the rate of exchange should be taken. He did so on the authority of a decision of Roche, J., in Kirsch & Co. v. Allen, H. & Co. ([1919] W. N. 301, 36 Times L. R. 59, 148 L. T. Jo. 198, 122 L. T. N. S. 159, 1 Lloyd's List R. 223; 25 Com. Cas. 63), and he did so treating a decision of Bailhache, J., as distinguishable on the ground that such decision arose in a case of breach of contract.

Hill, J., reversed the decision of the registrar, holding, on the authority of Di Ferdinando v. Simon S. & Co. [1920] 2 K. B. 704, [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36, and other cases, that where the damages are assessed in a foreign currency they must, in entering an English judgment, be converted into English money at the rate of exchange ruling at the date with reference to which the damages in the foreign currency have in law to be assessed. The Court of Appeal simply affirmed this judgment, feeling itself bound by the decision in the case of Di Ferdinando v. Simon S. & Co. [1920] 2 K. B. 704, [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36.

The Volturno was an Italian ship, and was under requisition to the Italian government under a charter party. By the terms of this charter party hire was payable in Italian lire. By reason of the collision temporary repairs to the Volturno were made at Gibraltar, causing a detention of the ship from December 25 to December 30, 1917. Permanent repairs were made at Newport News, causing a detention of the ship from January 24 to February 18, 1918. The loss of the owners of the Volturno by reason of such detention was, in respect of the first period, 47,372.32 lire; and, in respect of the second period, 257,046.40 lire; and these two sums, amounting to 304,418.72 lire, were claimed as damages, and were apparently included in the damages agreed.

It was contended by the owners of the Volturno that the rate of exchange should be taken, either at the date of the writ, or at the respective dates when the loss by detention was suffered, and Hill, J., adopted this latter view.

It is to be observed, as I will try and show later, that there is very little authority, until we come to recent decisions, which can be held to lay down any rule on this subject, and the fact that the respondents put forward alternative dates shows how uncertain the law is upon this subject. I would also add that all the cases, so far as I know, relied upon in the judgment of Hill, J., were cases of breaches of contract, and no different rule for damages in contract or tort was suggested in the argument before this House. If I am right in the view I have taken of the matter, the reasons which impel me to that view will apply, a fortiori, to breaches of contract. The argument for the appellants, in support of their contention that the date of the entry of the judgment is the proper date to fix the rate of exchange, is shortly as follows: The foreign litigant has suffered, as is agreed, damages to the extent of 300,000 lire. On the principle of restitutio ad integrum, he is paid 300,000 lire; he gets all the damage he has suffered, and it is all he would get if the claim was in Italy instead of in England, and although those damages have referred to and are answered on the basis of a loss at antecedent date, that affords no reason for awarding him either more or less, owing to the fluctuations of the exchange one way or the other between Italy and England, which only means that the lira will buy more or less English money. The learned counsel for the appellants say, further, that the object, and the sole object, of translating the lire agreed upon into English currency is to comply with the requirements of English law—that an English judgment for damages must be for a sum of English money in order to make the damages accessible by execution to the foreign litigant. This principle, they say, would satisfy the dictum of Lord Eldon in Cash v. Kennion, 11 Ves. Jr. 314, 316, 32 Eng. Reprint, 1109, where he lays down: "If he fails in that contract, wherever the creditor sues him, the law of that country ought to give him just as much as he would have had if the contract had been performed."

20 A.L.R.—57.

I will deal shortly with the authorities later. On what principle are we asked to enter judgment for the owners of the Volturno for a sum of English money which will to-day produce a much larger sum of lire than that which they themselves have agreed upon, or, if the exchange had gone the other way and the value of the lire had appreciated, a sum of English money which would produce less than the agreed amount? It is said that the damages must be assessed with reference to the actual periods of detention. It is at that time that the owner suffers damages by loss of use. With that I entirely agree. But when it is added that it follows that that is also the date at which the exchange must be taken for the purpose of conversion with a view to entering judgment, I do not follow the reasoning. I assume that, in assessing the damages, all the necessary adjustments would be made and elements of damage considered. It may be that, for instance, in the present case, the temporary repairs at Gibraltar had to be paid in sterling, and it would, of course, follow that the amount of lire which the sterling represented at the rate of exchange at that date should form an item in the damages. Similarly, if goods had to be bought in the market in England to replace English goods not delivered under a contract with a foreigner, the date of such purchase would necessarily fix the rate of exchange in assessing the damages. But I do not think there is any connection between the fixing of the damages and the rate of exchange to be taken in relation to certain items thereof at certain dates, and the rate of exchange to be fixed for the purpose of entering judgment.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the contention of the appellants is well founded, and that the true rule ought to be that the foreigner should, when the damages as assessed or agreed upon are in foreign currency, receive under the judgment neither more nor less than that sum, and that the proper date to ascertain this is when the entry of judgment is being made for the purpose of making the judgment available.

It may be said that, where the rate of exchange has gone against the lira, the delay has prejudiced the applicant. I do not think that can be considered, as the rule which has been applied must plainly apply, whether the exchange is adverse or otherwise. But in any event, to assign this as a reason for the rule would be, in reality, to give damages for nonpayment, which, except under special circumstances, are never awarded in our courts. (For instance, see the judgment of Bailhache, J., in Barry v. Van den Hurk [1920] 2 K. B. 709, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 899, 36 Times L. R. 663, 123 L. T. N. S. 719, 64 Sol. Jo. 602.)

In Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 589, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498, Lindley, M. R., says: "To substitute English money for Mexican dollars every time a payment ought to have been made is not to take an account of what is due under the contract, but to give damages for every breach of it which the plaintiff can prove that the defendants committed, which is a totally different matter."

I have examined the judgments delivered by the court of appeal in Di Ferdinando v. Simon, S. & Co. [1920] 3 K. B. 409, 11 A.L.R. 358, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1039, 36 Times L. R. 797, 26 Com. Cas. 37, 150 L. T. Jo. 36, and also the judgments in Lebeaupin v. Crispin [1920] 2 K. B. 714, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 1024, 36 Times L. R. 739, 64 Sol. Jo. 652, 25 Com. Cas. 335, 150 L. T. Jo. 24, and in Barry v. Van den Hurk [1920] 2 K. B. 709, 89 L. J. K. B. N. S. 899, 36 Times L. R. 663, 123 L. T. N. S. 719, 64 Sol. Jo. 602, all decided in 1920; but, although they all seem to me to lay down and assert the same rule as that upon which Hill, J., following some of these judgments, acted, and which I have already considered, I do not think the learned judges who decided them rest their judgments on any authorities, but rather assume that such a rule existed, or ought, as a matter of principle, to exist. The only case, apart from the recent authorities to which I have referred, which seems to me to give us any assistance, is the case of Manners v. Pearson [1898] 1 Ch. 581, 589, 67 L. J. Ch. N. S. 304, 78 L. T. N. S. 432, 14 Times L. R. 312, 46 Week. Rep. 498, from which I have already quoted.

Vaughan Williams, L. J., no doubt, in that case, laid down the principle which is contended for by the respondents in the present case, but he was a dissenting judge, and his judgment cannot be reconciled with the judgments delivered by the majority of the court—Lindley, M. R., and Rigby, L. J.

Although that action may have, to some extent, turned on the form of the action, it is to be noted that judgment was given for an account on November 4, 1897; the account was delivered on November 13, 1897, showing an amount due to August, 1896, yet, upon an application by the plaintiff claiming that the rate of exchange should be fixed at the date when the account showed the amount due,—namely, August, 1896,—the court decided that the rate of exchange should be taken, not as of that date, but as of the date of the account under the judgment—namely, November 13, 1897.

We have not been referred to any rule laid down in any English text-writers, but under American law the rule, as I stated it, seems to prevail. Sedgw., Damages, 9th ed. § 274, states the rule that, generally speaking, the exchange is to be estimated at time of payment, and in support quotes a number of American authorities, including the case of Marburg v. Marburg, 26 Md. 8, 90 Am. Dec. 84, to which we were referred, and which Sir John Simon admitted was, for what it was worth, an authority in favor of the appellants. Of course, such authorities are not binding in any way upon us, but they seem to me to be sound in principle, and I think the discussion of the question in Story, Conf. L. 8th ed. §§ 308–315, leans to the same conclusion.

I would refer, also, to Westlake's Private International Law, 5th ed. § 226, p. 315, where the learned author supports the view I have already indicated.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the arguments of the counsel for the appellants should prevail, and that the appeal should be allowed.

Order of the Court of Appeal affirmed and appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants:
Thomas Cooper & Co.

Solicitors for the respondents:
William A. Crump & Son.

ANNOTATION.

Recent variations in rate of foreign exchange as affecting damages for tort.

The question as to the rate of foreign exchange to be taken into account in assessing damages for breach of contract is treated in the annotation following Di Ferdinando v. Simon Smits & Co. 11 A.L.R. 363. It is there stated that the English courts appear definitely to have taken the position that, in an action for damages for breach of contract in a foreign country, the damages, which must be adjudged in English money, should be computed by taking the rate of exchange prevailing at the time of the breach of contract. This doctrine is extended in the reported case (THE CELIA v. THE VOLTURNO, ante, 884) to an action for damages for a tort, it being held that, in calculating the amount of damages for loss of use of a vessel arising from a collision, the rate of exchange should be taken at the time the loss was incurred, and not at the time of the assessment of damages, or of payment; in other words, that the rate of exchange with respect to the claim for detention should be fixed as at the period of detention. The same considerations were regarded as applicable, whether the action was based on tort or on contract, and the conclusion reached in the Di Ferdinando Case was adhered to.

These decisions are based upon the apparently sound doctrine that, the damages, whether from breach of contract or from tort, being sustained immediately at the time of the breach of the contract or the commission of the tort, subsequent events in no way connected with the tortious act or the contract, but arising out of the financial relations of the countries involved, should not be allowed to affect the matter. In other words, the rights of the parties become fixed as soon as a right of action arises. Certain damages have been sustained as of that time which can be definitely fixed in the currency of the forum and of the place where the injury occurred. And the incidental advantage which one or the other of the parties may subsequently derive from a variation in the rate of exchange is not a matter which the court should consider.

In accord with the above decision, in the result reached, is The Verdi (1920) 268 Fed. 908, an action for damages for a collision in New York in 1915, between British-owned vessels, part of the repairs and expenses being incurred in New York and a part in England, and January 1, 1916, being assumed as the date upon which all the damages were ascertainable. It was held that the damages were properly determined by taking the rate of exchange existing on that date. The court said: "It is contended that the damages cannot be determined until final decree, because the action sounds in tort, and that the rate of exchange then prevailing should therefore be adopted. This somewhat archaic argument, if pushed to an extreme, would bar interest prior to the date of the decree. The parties, however, have selected January 1, 1916, as the date to fix the amount of their damages in pounds sterling. The case is not one of transmitting these pounds sterling to New York, but of finding their equivalent in dollars on January 1, 1916. This can only be done by employing the rate of exchange prevalent at that date. The matter is quite different from one of a continuing obligation to pay pounds sterling in England, the failure to perform which would be compensated for by interest. Here the obligation was to pay dollars in New York. Failure to pay them is similarly compensated for by interest, but, as the initial damages were calculated in pounds, they must be converted into dollars at the value the pounds had at the time and place of payment. That is measured by the rate of exchange then prevailing."

R. E. H.

LANCE M. COONS, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF INDIANA.

Indiana Supreme Court — February 21, 1922.

(— Ind. —, 134 N. E. 194.)

Contempt — charging judge with bias.

1. Grand jurors who file a report charging the presiding judge with bias and favoring criminals, and calling for his resignation, are guilty of contempt.

[See note on this question beginning on page 908.]

Venue — change — contempt.

2. One charged with contempt of court is not entitled to a change of venue.

Arrest — warrant — ground for quashing.

3. That a statement charging the contempt was not filed before the issuance of a warrant for arrest of a person in contempt is not ground for quashing the writ.

Contempt — charge against judge — effect of truth.

4. Grand jurors cannot purge themselves of contempt in charging the presiding judge with bias and favoring criminals, by attempting to show the truth of the charge.

Grand jury — right to charge judge with bias.

5. Grand jurors are not privileged to file a report charging the presiding judge with bias and favoring criminals, and calling for his resignation, where the duties of such jurors are prescribed by statute, which do not include the making of such a report.

Courts — power to punish for contempt.

6. Courts of record of general jurisdiction have power to punish as for contempt their officers for offending the dignity of the court.

[See 6 R. C. L. 495; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 134.]

Contempt — effect of intent.

7. The act, and not the intent, governs in determining whether or not one has been guilty of contempt of court.

[See 6 R. C. L. 489.]

— duty to proceed for libel.

8. A judge cannot be required to proceed for libel, rather than punish for contempt one who files in the court a libelous charge against the judge.

Indictment — of judge.

9. A grand jury may indict a judge for the commission of a crime which evidence before them tends to support.

[See 22 R. C. L. 488.]

Contempt — direct — filing scandalous paper in court.

10. Presenting in open court a libelous charge on the judge is a direct contempt although the responsible parties are absent from the court when the contents of the paper become known.

— necessity of arraignment.

11. One charged with direct contempt of court is not entitled to arraignment.

— what constitutes.

12. Criminal contempts of court embrace all acts committed against the majesty of the law or the dignity of the court, and the primary purpose of the punishment of such offenders is the vindication of public authority of which the court is the embodiment.

[See 6 R. C. L. 488, 490; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 132.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Delaware County (Thompson, J.) convicting him of contempt. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Cromer & Long, Wilbur Ryman, and Leffler, Ball, & Leffler for appellant.

Mr. U. S. Lesh, Attorney General, for the State.

Travis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is one of alleged contempt of court by appellant, acting at the time of such contempt as a grand juror. He, with the other five grand jurors, appeared in open court, and filed with the court what the grand jury termed to be its final report. The judge of the court did not know the contents of the reports so filed until after the grand jury had separated and gone to their several homes; and on the day following the filing of such report the judge prepared a written statement of such parts of such report which were alleged to constitute contempt of court, which written statement was set forth in the order of the court, and which directed the arrest of appellant. The written statement made by the court, in which was set forth the contemptuous language used by appellant and his co-grand jurors in their said report, is as follows:

"Be it remembered that heretofore, to wit, December 19, 1920, the following named parties, to wit: Lance M. Coons et al. and the other five grand jurors who were then and there members of and constituted the grand jury of Delaware circuit court for the September term, 1920, — came into open court, and as such jurors and in open court presented to the court for filing and to be filed what was by them denominated the grand jury's final report, which said report so presented was signed by each and all of said parties and by each and all presented to the court as aforesaid; that said report so presented and when presented in open court contained the following scandalous, false, libelous, and contemptuous language and paragraphs, to wit:

"The grand jury also laments the fact that the presiding judge is known by the members of the bar to be biased and prejudiced to such an extent that a large number of attorneys at the bar believe him to be so unfair in the trial of cases in his court, that they cannot get fair rulings and decisions from the judge, to such an extent that the judge is known to take one side or the other in all cases tried before him, and is known to favor certain lawyers and disfavor certain other lawyers that practise law before him.'

"Also the following: 'The grand jury returned into the court, after a further investigation, an indictment against Court Asher for burglary, who is generally known to be a law violator. Humble, law-abiding citizens wanting homes and citizens protected from thieves and burglars, and innocent women and children perhaps from death at the hands of burglars, we think this man, Asher, who was charged with burglary, should have been punished and sent to prison. There was no doubt, from the evidence, as to the guilt of Court Asher. It was not denied. The presiding judge blocked the efforts of the prosecuting attorney and would not let the case go to the jury for a decision, but deliberately selected one of the petit jurors and requested him to sign a verdict of not guilty, and thereafter refused the prosecuting attorney permission to poll the jury.'

"Also the following: 'We are of the unanimous opinion that, through a connivance and conspiracy on the part of the presiding judge, Court Asher, Tom Miller, and others, the burglary case against Court Asher was fixed and understood between the parties that Court Asher would be assisted in his defense by the presiding judge, and his acquittal had. And in support of this opinion we have the sworn testimony that Court Asher, a short time before the trial of his case, offered to bet and wager money that if he were tried in this court he would be acquitted.'

"Also the following: 'And we, the grand jury, do not believe that the presiding judge of our court should hand out such high-handed decisions. We believe that Court Asher was guilty of the crime charged against him in the indictment, and that, had the presiding judge been fair and impartial in his rulings and dealings, and permitted the jury to have decided the case, a conviction would have been found.'

"Also the following: 'Members of this grand jury saw the presiding judge talk privately with Tom Miller after he, Tom Miller, had been indicted for burglary by this grand jury, and we are apprised of the fact that the presiding judge, after learning that Tom Miller and Court Asher and Gene Williams had been indicted for burglary in an adjoining county, communicated with an officer of an adjoining county, and requested that officer to be very easy on Court Asher, Tom Miller, and Gene Williams.'

"Also the following: 'For us to say that the good citizens of Delaware county have been outraged by such misconduct on the part of our presiding judge is putting it mild, and in behalf of the decent and respectable citizens of Delaware county who pay their taxes to maintain a courthouse and a court where justice should be meted out to lawless people, we, the grand jury, make this request that the presiding judge, William A. Thompson, forthwith transmit his resignation as the judge of the Delaware circuit court to the Honorable James P. Goodrich, governor of the state of Indiana, and that the same be effective at once. The presiding judge, being declared the protector of criminals, has no right to sit upon the bench and further usurp the office of judge.'

"That all of the above and foregoing paragraphs were contained and set out in said report when the same was so presented to said court for filing in said court.

"That said report was passed to the court at about dusk on Saturday, December 19, 1920, and that the court did not see and know the contents of said report until after the said grand jurors had separated and gone to their several homes, many of them far distant in the country, and now, on this the 20th day of December, 1920, and at the first opportunity, the court now makes and enters the above and foregoing concerning the conduct of the said parties above named in and about the matters hereinbefore set out, and the court now orders and directs that a warrant issue for the arrest and production in open court in the said Delaware circuit court of the parties above named at 2 o'clock P. M. on the 21st day of December, 1920, to make answer to and be held responsible by said court for and on account of said contemptuous conduct as hereinbefore set out and charged as having been done and performed by said parties. And this matter is now postponed and continued until said date in order to permit the sheriff to produce in court the above-named parties."

At the time fixed in the warrant the sheriff produced the said members of said grand jury in court. Thereupon appellant presented to the court for filing, and offered to file, his verified application and affidavit for change of venue from the judge, and the court refused to note the filing of such verified application and affidavit, and refused to file the same or permit the same to be filed as one of the papers in said cause. Thereupon appellant and his co-grand jurors presented to the court for filing, and offered to file, their separate and several motion to quash and set aside the writ, and the court refused to note on its minutes the filing of such motion, and refused to file such motion, or to permit it to be filed, and thereupon appellant, together with his co-grand jurors, offered to file their separate and several answer to the statement of the court theretofore entered of record, and the court refused to note the filing of said answer, and refused to file it, or permit it to be filed,—to all of which rulings by the court appellant, at the time of such rulings, duly excepted. The court thereupon announced its finding, opinion, and judgment in writing, that each of said grand jury men was guilty of contempt and punishment by a fine for such contempt, to which finding and judgment appellant duly excepted, and thereupon appellant, with his co-grand jurors, filed their separate and several motion, asking the court to reconsider its opinion and judgment, which motion was by the court overruled, and thereupon sixty days were granted said grand jurors to file any and all bills of exception, and each of said grand jurors prayed an appeal to this court, which appeal was perfected by but one of them, viz., this appellant.

The case comes to this court on appeal based on ten assignments of error, to wit: (1) Refusing to note the filing or to file application for change of venue from the judge; (2) refusing to note the filing of, to file, or allow to be filed a motion to quash and set aside the writ; (3) refusing to note the filing of and to file the verified answer; (4) refusing to have noted upon the docket of the court the filing of the verified answer; (5) in rendering judgment; (6) in the opinion and judgment of the court; (7) overruling the motion to reconsider opinion and judgment; (8) overruling motion for a new trial; (9) for rendering judgment without arraignment, and without requesting appellant, or allowing him to make a statement in explanation, extenuation, or denial of the charge; (10) for refusing to allow appellant to make a statement in writing, which he offered in explanation, extenuation, and denial of the charge.

One charged with contempt of court is not entitled to a change of venue from the judge.

Venue—change
—contempt.

State v. Newton (1878) 62 Ind. 517; Merchants' Stock & Grain Co. v. Board of Trade (1912) 20 C. C. A. 582, 201 Fed. 20; Clyma v. Kennedy (1894) 64 Conn. 310, 42 Am. St. Rep. 194, 29 Atl. 539; 13 C. J. p. 60, § 83; Lamberson v. Superior Ct.

151 Cal. 458, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 619, 91 Pac. 100.

The writ sought to be quashed and set aside was not dependent on a statement which charged the contempt; hence it mattered not whether Arrest—warrant—ground for quashing. such statement was made or filed prior to the issuing of the writ; not being dependent upon a charge or statement, it was not subject to the attack sought to have been made.

Appellant offered to file with the court his written statement, which he terms to be his answer in explanation, extenuation, and denial of the written charge of contempt. This statement, instead of being an apology, or an expression of regret, or an explanation, extenuation, or denial of the written accusations of the judge of the court made by appellant and his co-grand jurors in their final report, is an argumentative discussion in favor of alleged conclusions of law as to what are the rights of grand jurors in the premises, in which is set forth the whole of said final report, together with the statement that such charges were based by the grand jury upon evidence before the grand jury which they (the grand jury) believed to be true when they presented their said report, and that they still believe the charges made against the judge and the court to be true, and that they had a right to make such charges, and that they were to be considered free from malice and wilful purpose to injure or interfere in any manner with the court in so doing.

The answer sought to have been filed by appellant, having included in it the whole of the report, which contained the contemptuous language, the truth of which was by such answer reiterated, confirmed, and enlarged upon, together with the assertion that the grand jurors had the legal right to thus attack the judge, was in no sense such a statement that could in any wise purge the jurors of the contempt charged, but, if anything, it was a statement which made the action of the grand jurors more contemptuous than it otherwise would have been; and therefore the offer to file the same and the filing thereof were properly denied.

Contempt—charge against judge—effect of truth.

Under the fifth and sixth assignments of error, it is maintained that the actions and doings of the grand jury are privileged. The statutes of Indiana which define the duties of a grand jury are: The statute of the oath of grand jurors, in which is the following language: "You will diligently inquire, and true presentment make of all felonies and misdemeanors, committed or triable within this county, of which you shall have or can obtain legal evidence" (Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 1961); the statute which sets forth the order of business of the grand jury (Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 1978); and the statute which requires the grand jury to examine the county jail, workhouses, and other public buildings in the county.

In no place in any of these statutes which define the duties of the grand jury is it contemplated that the grand jury shall charge any public officer with the commission of a felony by a so-called report. The statute requires the grand jurors to take an oath to make true presentment of all felonies and misdemeanors. Section 2041 prescribes the form of such a presentment, and names it an indictment; and it will be noted that the language of the form of an indictment is that the grand jury "upon their oath do present." A presentment, as used, in common law, as a written charge of the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, is unknown in the jurisprudence of the United States. The words "presentment" and "indictment" have been held to be used interchangeably (People v. Flaherty (1894) 79 Hun, 48, 29 N. Y. Supp. 641, 642); and such seems to have been the interpretation of the United States Constitution, Amendment 5, according to Mr. Justice Gray

(Ex parte Wilson (1884) 114 U. S. 417, 29 L. ed. 89, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 935, 4 Am. Crim. Rep. 283). Appellant claims that, while the grand jury acts in aid of the court, it is separable therefrom and is not answerable to it, and that all its doings are privileged. The duties of the grand jury in this state are governed by statute, and it has no rights or privileges based upon the common law. The statutes do not provide that the grand jury make reports, to the court, of crimes and misdemeanors of public officials or of other citizens. It is, according to the oaths of its members, required to examine into all felonies and misdemeanors, and to make a true presentment in each of such cases, if, in the opinion of the grand jury as defined by statute, such felony or misdemeanor has been committed; and this applies as well to a judge of a court as to any other public officer or private individual. That part of the final report of the grand jury as set forth in the written statement made by the judge was not contemplated in law. If the grand jury, in making investigation of crimes and misdemeanors as set forth in the statute governing their order of business, conclude, from the evidence taken, that a presentment in the form of an indictment should not be made against the person or persons under investigation for the commission of a felony or misdemeanor, it is not their duty or privilege to make accusations in the form of a report, based on such evidence. There is no privilege, absolute or qualified, to commit contempt of court. United States v. Craig (1920; D. C.) 266 Fed. 230, 233.

Grand jury—
right to charge
judge with bias.

Appellant also maintains under his fifth and sixth assignments of error that it is neither direct nor indirect contempt to criticize the court, either in writing or oral comment, by the use of libelous or false statements which have reference to a matter that is no longer before the court. The truth of this contention applies only where the contempt charged is constructive. There are many cases of contempt reported in the opinions of the higher courts wherein libelous language was held not to be contemptuous when it had reference solely to a matter that had been fairly determined by the court, and was no longer before it for any purpose. State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hildreth (1909) 82 Vt. 382, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 551, 137 Am. St. Rep. 1022, 74 Atl. 71, 18 Ann. Cas. 661. But the case is different where an officer of the court, be he attorney, sheriff, clerk, or jurymen, either in writing or orally, files or uses libelous, undignified, and scurrilous language, — anything which brings the court into disrepute and lowers its dignity, whereby the due administration of justice is hindered and prevented. Ex parte McLeod (1903; D. C.) 120 Fed. 130, 133. An open insult to the person of the judge while presiding is a direct contempt of court, in support of which statement it may well be said that courts of record of general jurisdiction always have power to punish as for contempt their officers for offending the dignity of the court. State ex rel. Caldwell v. Cockrell (1919) 280 Mo. 269, 217 S. W. 524. Appellant, to confess and avoid the alleged contempt by his written answer, which he offered to file, and which offer was refused by the court, did not by such answer purge himself of contempt. As stated in an opinion by this court: "For a direct contempt the offender may be punished instantly by arrest and fine or imprisonment, upon no farther proof or examination than what is known to the judges by their senses of seeing, hearing, etc." Ex parte Wright (1879) 65 Ind. 504, 508; Ex parte Terry, 128 U. S. 289, 32 L. ed. 405, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 77; Ex parte Robinson, 19 Wall. 513, 22 L. ed. 208; Lindsey v. People (1919) 66 Colo. 343, 16 A.L.R. 1250, 181 Pac. 531.

Contempt—
charging judge with bias.

Courts—power to punish for contempt.

The answer sought to justify appellant in the charges made by the report of the grand jury, by saying that, by such report and the statements therein, no offense was intended to bring the court into disrepute. The statement as an extenuation might have had some standing according to the holding in the case of Fishback v. State (1892) 131 Ind. 304, 30 N. E. 1088, wherein it was held that in order to constitute a contempt of court, there must be some act coupled with an intended disrespect or defiance of the court; but it has since been held by this court that, as to whether or not a contempt of court has been committed, it does effect of intent. not depend upon the alleged intention of the offending party, but on the act which he did. Dodge v. State (1895) 140 Ind. 284, 39 N. E. 745; Re Chartz (1905) 29 Nev. 110, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 916, 124 Am. St. Rep. 915, 85 Pac. 352; State ex rel. Crow v. Shepherd (1903) 177 Mo. 205, 99 Am. St. Rep. 624, 76 S. W. 79; Levinstein v. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co. (1919; D. C.) 258 Fed. 662.

Contempt—

Appellant seeks further to purge himself of his contempt by asserting that if any action will lie against him it is libel, and that the judge against whom the report was made ought to descend from the plane of his judicial office to the level of the appellant and attack him by a civil action. In the opinion of this court it would be a still greater humiliation of a court for the judge thereof to pass over the matter of contempt and come under the civil law to justify himself in damages for a libel. Such conduct would be personal. The court is impersonal. Ex parte McLeod (1903; D. C.) 120 Fed. 130. To such a point is the judicial status fixed in our jurisprudence that our courts and the judges thereof should be protected from the improper consequences of the discharge of duties, that such judicial officers have always been shielded, on the highest consideration of the public good, from being called in question in civil actions for things done in the judicial capacity, even though the judge thereof performs such act corruptly. Hamilton v. Williams (1855) 26 Ala. 529; Busteed v. Parson (1875) 54 Ala. 393, 25 Am. Rep. 688; Ex parte McLeod, supra. This judicial status is better stated by Chief Justice Kent in the memorable case of Yates v. Lansing (1810) 5 Johns. 282, as follows: "Whenever we subject the established courts of the land to the degradation of private prosecution, we subdue their independence and destroy their authority. Instead of being venerable before the public, they become contemptible; and we thereby embolden the licentious to trample upon everything sacred in society, and to overturn those institutions which have hitherto been deemed the best guardians of civil liberty."

—duty to proceed
for libel.

This grand jury had the authority (five of them concurring), if the evidence taken by them was in their judgment sufficient to support a charge of a commission of a crime, to "present" by "indictment" the judge of the court in question for his alleged conspiracy to thwart the ends of justice; and from the mere fact that they failed to "present" such an "indictment" it is an acknowledgment by them, in the face of their so-called report, that, upon any investigation made by the grand jury, the evidence was insufficient upon which to base a charge for a felony or a misdemeanor against the judge. But instead, through whatever motive it matters not, this appellant, with the other members of the grand jury, filed the report in defamation of the judge, and as well of the court, which was composed of language that scandalized the court. It is therefore a high contempt of court for the appellant to have sought to call to account the judge for his judicial acts elsewhere than before a constituted of judge.

Indictment—

tribunal for impeachment. It is quite natural that litigants take umbrage at the doings of the courts, for the very reason that one side or the other is always a losing party, not only against their hopes and desires, but even probably against their honest beliefs. Nevertheless such disappointed litigants ought not, and must not, be permitted to lower the dignity of our courts, either by personal violence, or by the use of open, violent, or scandalizing language to the judge in open court. In the early English practice, indignities put upon the persons of judges when off the bench were punished summarily as contempts, for the reason that, as stated by Blackstone, it "demonstrates a gross want of that regard and respect which, when once courts of justice are deprived of their authority (so necessary for the good order of the Kingdom) is entirely lost among the people." Bl. bk. 4, p. 286.

This document having been filed in open court, if contemptuous at all, was a direct contempt, notwithstanding the persons who presented it had gone to their homes and were absent from the court at the time its contents became known.

Appellant claims error for overruling of his motion for a new trial. The record fails to show that any motion for a new trial was offered; neither does appellant make any point in his brief under this alleged error.

Under the ninth error appellant complains that he was not arraigned by the court, and that he did not waive arraignment. It is no part of the procedure in a direct contempt of court that the one who is charged shall have the privilege of an arraignment. Mahoney v. State (1904) 33 Ind. App. 655, 104 Am. St. Rep. 276, 72 N. E. 151; Nebraska Children's Home Soc. v. State (1899) 57 Neb. 765, 78 N. W. 267.

Criminal contempts of court embrace all acts committed against the majesty of the law or the dignity of the court, and the primary purpose of the punishment of such offenders is the vindication of public authority, of which the court is the embodiment. As was well said by the supreme court of Colorado in the case of People ex rel. Elliott v. Green (1883) 7 Colo. 237, 3 Pac. 65, 49 Am. Rep. 351: "A proper regard for the integrity of our honored profession" of the law and of the courts, and their "judicial authority, requires that indignities . . . to judges, on account of rulings made in court, be summarily dealt with."

Courts have criticized themselves and admonished each other in the careful use of this great power which they have had from time immemorial in the use of this summary proceeding, which admonishment has called to the attention of the courts the discretion of power under actions of this kind, and that such discretion ought to be carefully weighed, to the end that any judge may not, in wrath, pervert the courts' inherent power to preserve their chaste character in the eyes of the people, for whose sole benefit the courts were organized. The exercise of this discretion is most aptly stated by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in Ex parte Burr (1824) 9 Wheat. 529, 6 L. ed. 152, in these words: "This discretion ought to be exercised with great moderation and judgment; but it must be exercised."

According to the published reports, it seems, that there have been fewer cases in the United States of this character wherein corruption and perversion of justice have been imputed to the judge directly and in open court, than for physical blows or chastisement by angered parties and witnesses; and it seems to be the greater weight of authority that to impute corruption and perversion of justice to a judge is attended by

Contempt—direct
—filing scandalous paper in court.

—necessity of arraignment.

—what constitutes.

more mischievous consequences than a blow. Rex v. Almon, Wilmot's Notes, 253, 97 Eng. Reprint, 94; Reg. v. Gray [1900] 2 Q. B. 36, 69 J. Q. B. N. S. 502, 64 J. P. 484, 48 Week. Rep. 474, 82 L. T. N. S. 534, 16 Times L. R. 305; Re Wallace, L. R. 1 P. C. 283, 4 Moore, P. C. C. N. S. 140, 16 Eng. Reprint, 269, 36 L. J. P. C. N. S. 9, 15 Week. Rep. 533; Com. v. Dandridge, 2 Va. Cas. 408; Burdett v. Com. 103 Va. 838, 68 L.R.A. 251, 106 Am. St. Rep. 916, 48 S. E. 878; State v. Morrill, 16 Ark. 384; State ex rel. Crow v. Shepherd, 177 Mo. 205, 99 Am. St. Rep. 624, 76 S. W. 79; United States ex rel. Guaranty Trust Co. v. Gehr (C. C.) 116 Fed. 520; Re Chadwick, 109 Mich. 588, 67 N. W. 1071.

There was no error in overruling the motion to reconsider the opinion and judgment of the court.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Reflection on judge by grand or petit juror as contempt.

The reported case (COONS v. STATE, ante, 900), appears to be the only decision involving the liability of a juror, either grand or petit, for contempt because of a reflection, by him, on the judge. It appeared in that case that the final report of the grand jury was delivered in open court, whereupon the jury were dismissed, and returned to their homes. The following day the judge examined the report and found it to contain scandalous and contemptuous language charging the judge with what amounted to a conspiracy on his part to thwart the ends of justice. The action of the grand jury is held to be a direct contempt of court. In so holding the court determines that (1) no privilege attaches to a mere report by a grand jury, the official power of that body being confined to the return of indictments; (2) criticism of the action of a judge as to past and completed proceedings may constitute contempt if it is uttered or filed in the presence of the court; (3) for such a reflection the judge may proceed as for contempt, and is not relegated to an action for libel.

A. S. M.

EUGENE SCOTT

v.

VICKSBURG, SHREVEPORT, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY,
Appt.

Louisiana Supreme Court — January 30, 1922.

(— La. —, 90 So. 840.)

Carriers — duty with respect to step box.

Where a carrier of passengers furnishes a step box to facilitate them in boarding or alighting from its trains, it is bound to see that such appliance is safe as to strength, is so constructed as not to be readily overturned, is kept in proper condition, and, when set out for the use of the passengers, is placed upon a level and stable surface; but the carrier is not the insurer of the passenger against the consequences of his own negligence, and where the passenger is injured in attempting to use such appliance without looking at it, and stumbles over or against it when he should have stepped on it, his injuries are attributable to his misuse of the appliance and not to its inadequacy, and the carrier is not liable for the injuries.

Headnote by BAKER, J.

[See note on this question beginning on page 914.]

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Judicial District Court for the Parish of Ouachita (Dawkins, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Judgment set aside.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Stubbs, Theus, Grisham, & Thompson, for appellant:

In order to recover for injury while attempting to board a railroad train, it is not sufficient for plaintiff to merely establish his status as a passenger and the fact of his injury. He must also show affirmatively that the injury was caused by some defect in the appliances, premises, or equipment provided for his use in boarding the train, or by some negligent act of commission or omission on the part of some servant of defendant.

McGinn v. New Orleans R. & Light Co. 118 La. 811, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 601, 43 So. 450; Aiken v. Southern P. Co. 104 La. 157, 29 So. 1; Howell v. Union Traction Co. 202 Pa. 338, 51 Atl. 885.

The fact that a passenger may fall and injure himself while attempting to board a train at a station is entirely consistent with the supposition that the carrier may have discharged its full duty in maintaining its premises in such reasonable and suitable condition that passengers and others authorized to use them may, in the exercise of the ordinary care, use them in safety, and that the carrier, through its agents and employees, uses the proper care for the safety and protection of such passenger.

Aiken v. Southern P. Co. 104 La. 157, 29 So. 1; 10 C. J. art. 1348; Poland v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 112 Me. 286, 92 Atl. 38.

The safety of construction and operation is shown by successful use.

Anshen v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 205 Mass. 32, 91 N. E. 157; Laffin v. Bufalo & S. W. R. Co. 106 N. Y. 136, 60 Am. Rep. 433, 12 N. E. 599, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 268; Ryan v. Manhattan R. Co. 121 N. Y. 126, 23 N. E. 1131, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 329; Fox v. New York, 70 Hun. 181, 24 N. Y. Supp. 43, 5 Am. Neg. Cas. 683; Gabriel v. Long Island R. Co. 54 App. Div. 41, 66 N. Y. Supp. 301, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 506; MacGilvray v. Boston Elev. R. Co. 4 A.L.R. 296, note.

Negligence of a carrier is not shown by the testimony of a passenger that, as he went to get on the car, the projecting edge of his shoe caught under the lid of the step box and caused him to fall.

Howell v. Union Traction Co. 202 Pa. 338, 51 Atl. 885.

Mr. John M. Munholland for appellee.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

An opinion prepared in this case by the late chief justice was not finally passed on, owing to the change in the composition of the court; and the case was reset for argument, and has been reargued and resubmitted. As the said opinion covers the case completely, and appears to be correct, we now adopt it as that of the court. It is as follows: Plaintiff claims $5,000 as damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained through the negligence of defendant and its agents, and, having obtained judgment for $1,500, defendant has appealed, and he (plaintiff) has answered, praying that the amount of the award be increased to that claimed. The circumstances under which the injuries are said to have been sustained and the particular negligence to which they are attributed are set forth in the petition, as follows: "And that on the 17th day of November, 1914, your petitioner bought one first-class ticket from Delhi . . . to Monroe, . . . and proceeded to the passenger depot . . . in Delhi . . . for the purpose of entering the west-bound train, due about 5 or 6 o'clock P. M.; . . . that it was dark and the depot grounds were insufficiently lighted; that a lot of empty box cars were standing between the depot and the place where the forward end of the day coach stopped for the purpose of putting off and taking on passengers; that . . . petitioner was present at the time the passenger train . . . came into said station, and took a position within a few feet of the front platform of the day coach, . . . awaiting his time and the invitation . . . to enter; . . . that, after the passenger had gotten off the train the flagman . . . called, 'All aboard,' and . . . petitioner, standing close to said platform, proceeded to step upon the step box and . . . thence to the step of the platform of the said . . . coach, and in so doing put his left foot upon the train box, caught the left hand-hold on the corner of the platform, and, as he threw his weight on his left foot on the aforesaid box, he felt it slip and give way under his foot, and while bringing his right foot up it hung under the cover of the box, at which juncture and while in this predicament he was unlawfully and negligently interfered with by the flagman, and as he reached for the hand-rail on the corner of the coach with his right hand, but before he could grasp it, the flagman forcibly shoved him on his right elbow, at which juncture, and by reason of the insecurity of the step box and the interference of the flagman, your petitioner was forcibly thrown to the ground, by which fall he was rendered unconscious, and did not regain consciousness until carried home."

He then described his sufferings and the results of his injuries, and proceeds as follows: "That all of this is due to the wanton and wilful negligence of the defendant in not providing a safe and suitable means of ingress and egress into (and out of) said passenger coach, and to the wanton, wilful, and negligent interference by the servants and employees of the defendant, particularly the flagman of the train, at the time in question, in interfering with and preventing him from getting into said train."

Bearing in mind that plaintiff was attempting to enter upon said front platform of the day coach from the south side, and that the rear platform of the "smoker" was coupled thereto on the left, or west, side, the three persons who were in better positions to see how the accident complained of occurred were: (1) The flagman, who stood immediately upon plaintiff's right side, facing him, as he attempted to board the car, and holding a lighted lantern in his hand; (2) M. Kaliski, a passenger on the train, who had come out of the smoker with the expectation of meeting, or seeing, someone with whom he had an appointment, and who (Kaliski) was standing on the bottom step of the rear platform of the smoker, also facing plaintiff; (3) and W. C. Carpenter, a disinterested person, who had never been in the employ of a railroad company, and who, intending to board the train, was immediately behind the plaintiff waiting to move forward as he moved.

At the date of the trial, which was some sixteen months after the accident, the flagman testified that he had been discharged by the railroad company about five months prior to that time (because of a difficulty with a passenger); that he was then engaged in farming; that he was done with railroading; and that he had no interest in the suit.

He further testified, in part, as follows: "When the train stopped at Delhi—after I had discharged all my passengers—got off at Delhi—after all had gotten on that I thought were going to get on, . . . I hollered, 'All aboard,' and Mr. Scott started towards the train, and as he attempted to step up on the train stool he fell backwards in Mr. Carpenter's arms, I would say—and they laid him on the ground and sent for a doctor and I remember hearing the doctor say" (objection).

The witness went on to say that the plaintiff cried out "O Lord," while lying on the ground, and that he did not know what was the matter with him; that he thought perhaps he had heart failure or was drunk; that plaintiff raised his foot to step on the "step stool," and was attempting to catch the hand hold, but that his foot did not touch the stool and his hand did not touch the hand hold; he simply fell backwards to the ground, against or into the arms of Carpenter, who was behind him; that he (witness), "just like anybody would," caught at him as he fell, but did not reach him.

Carpenter's testimony reads, in part: "We were going on the train, and I was going to get on right behind him. . . . Well, he started to get on it, and the flagman says, 'All aboard,' and started to get on,—and the first thing I knew, Mr. Scott fell back against me, and, of course, I grabbed—both hands—just like anybody else would do, and eased him, behind, the best I could—he got a pretty good fall and I don't remember hurting anything—like that—but his head struck me right there—in the chest—and, of course, I grabbed with both hands—that was to steady him and ease him down. . . . He (the flagman) was on the east side . . . facing the steps. . . . I don't know whether he touched Scott or not."

He testified further that he does not know whether Scott's foot touched the step box or not; it was all so unexpected to him; and he did not know what Scott was doing with his foot. The allegations of the petition that we have quoted were then read to the witness, and he was asked what he knew of the flagman having done what he is there charged with doing, and his reply was, "I never seen any of it;" he never saw Scott take hold of anything; the first thing that he knew was Scott's falling back against him.

Kaliski testified that he was standing on the lower step of the adjoining platform (being the rear platform of the smoker); that he saw Scott come up, and that he made two attempts to get up on the box, and fell back and someone seemed to catch him; that he never got his foot on the step box; that he (witness) is inspector of watches for the railroad company. Another witness called by defendant (its agent at a near-by station) was about taking the train, and professes to have witnessed the accident. We understand him to say that plaintiff stepped on the box and seemed to give way in the knees, and when he did "he just fell right back."

Plaintiff called in rebuttal the proprietor of the livery stable, who "meets all the trains;" and he testified that he was standing perhaps 10 feet back from the scene of the accident, and that plaintiff walked by him hurriedly and started to get on the train, and that he "fell off backwards;" that, as near as he could tell, plaintiff had one foot on the stool and one foot on the car step, and had hold of the two rods, and that he came off backwards. Witness was looking right at him and did not see the flagman touch him; that the way it struck him was, "There is a man with heart failure," though he had never seen a man inflicted with that complaint.

Plaintiff also called in rebuttal two negroes who profess to have witnessed the accident from a distance of 15 feet. One of them (Perkins) testified that plaintiff "put his foot on the box—left foot; . . . he aimed to stand up;" and the next thing witness saw him fall. The other witness (Johnson) said: "When he aimed to get on the train—stepped on the box there—and as he aimed to make the next step, he fell. . . . He fell from the box."

Witness had no difficulty in seeing the box and also plaintiff's feet, and eventually testified that he saw the box "turned over."

Thus we find the following:

A. It was light enough for me to see the box—it was after dark then, but I saw the box and his foot.

Q. The box never turned over?

A. Yes, sir; I think it must have turned over.

Q. Did you see it turn over?

A. No; but from the cause there—the way it fell, it must have turned over.

Q. Did you see that box turn over?

A. When he made the step there—put his foot on the box—you see, and aimed to catch up there—the box queried over and he fell—why they come around the box, and I couldn't just see whether the box was all turned over there, after he fell.

Q. Say Yes or No, whether the step box turned over.

A. Yes; it turned over.

Q. Did you see it?

A. Yes, sir; I saw it turned over.

Other testimony we find conclusive to the effect that the box was neither turned over nor "querled over." The box that was offered in evidence, and which is shown to be the same type as that to which the testimony relates, measures 12 by 16 inches at the bottom, 10½ by 14½ at the top, and is 10 inches high. Everyone who has ever had occasion to travel on a railroad train knows the type and knows that the boxes are not readily turned over. It is shown, too, that the cinder surface upon which the box in question rested was smooth and hard, that the same arrangement had existed for years, and that no accident had ever happened because of it. The testimony is also conclusive to the effect that the light was quite sufficient for all purposes for which light was there needed. Dr. Barrier, who was the first physician to see plaintiff after the accident, and who was called to the stand by plaintiff, so testifies, saying, however, that a careful examination of plaintiff, which was made within an hour or two, required more light. He also testifies, as do other physicians who participated in that examination, that plaintiff's person showed no visible sign of injury and that no bones were broken, though he complained of great pain in his back, hip, and head, was in a semiconscious condition when carried to his home, and was there confined for ten or twelve days after the accident. Dr. Barrier also testified that he weighs 340 pounds; that he had been getting on and off the train at Delhi, with the aid of step boxes such as that here in question, for twenty-four years, and has met with no accident; that he came into Delhi on the train upon which plaintiff was attempting to go in; that he found no change in any of the conditions on the day of the accident; and that, in effect, was the testimony of the plaintiff himself with respect to a period of twenty years or more.

Plaintiff's version of the accident, as it appears in his testimony, is as follows (we quote the testimony as we find it in the record, and have no means of knowing whether its rather jerky appearance is attributable to the witness or the stenographer):

A. After the train came in, I was walking around, ahead of my son—along with him—and I remember—he was a little bit ahead of me—I was telling him what to do (about some of his business) and he followed me to the step box, and I stepped up with my left foot on the box, and it gave, and I caught the rail with my left hand—the rail on the train on the west side of the steps, and when the box kind of gave—as I was going on up—with the weight—why—and jerked, the front foot kind of caught in the floor of the box—extension of the top of the box—and I had on a heavy pair of solid shoes—the sole extended out a little bit—and as I went to reach for it—the other hand bar of the coach was—why—this flagman struck my elbow there and knocked it off, and if it hadn't been for that I would have caught my hold. I can't say that he did this—shoved me, or knocked me, or anything of that kind—but, at the same time, I thought he was doing it to assist me on the train.

Q. At the time the flagman's hand touched, as you say, your elbow, you had already lost your balance and upon your ability to catch the right handhold depended your escape from the fall, didn't it?

A. My foot hung under the box at the time when I was reaching for the handhold, when he struck my arm.

A little further on in his testimony he says:

I had lost by balance before my right foot had struck the box—had caused me to—with the left foot in trying to catch myself—then my right foot struck under the extension of the top and then it threw me right over.

Q. You had, as I understand, then, already lost your balance before you caught your foot under this extension of the box?

A. I had not lost my balance before the box had given. And in order to get my foot—I caught hold—then my right foot caught under the step.

Q. Is it not a fact, Mr. Scott, that, as a result of the condition which you describe as being due to the fact that the step box gave way under you, you had already lost your balance?

A. To some extent; yes, sir. . . . Not enough, I don't think, but what I could have saved myself by catching with the hand rail.

Further along still plaintiff was questioned about the light around the depot, and seems to have found no fault with it, and then we have the following:

Q. Could you see the step box?

A. I never noticed—when—it I just slipped my foot on it.

Q. How did you know where it was, if you could not see it?

A. I knew about where it was; I knew where it ought to be.

Q. Did you look to see where it was?

A. I really don't know, Mr. Stubbs, whether I looked down at the box; I suppose I did.

Q. You don't remember whether you looked at the box or not?

20 A.L.R.—58.

A. I was bound to have looked at it, or I would not have found it.

Q. If you looked at it, did you see it?

A. I guess so; I felt it though, I know.

Q. Could you see the steps there?

A. Yes, sir.

It will be observed that the petition alleges that plaintiff "was present at the time the passenger train . . . came into said station, and took a position within a few feet of the front platform of the day coach," etc., but that he says in his testimony: "After the train came in, I was walking around, ahead of my son; . . . I remember that he was a little bit behind me,—I was telling him what to do,—and he followed me up to the step box, and I stepped up," etc. His witness Patterson testifies that plaintiff passed him "hurriedly." Plaintiff himself further testifies, in effect, that he attempted to put his foot on the box without looking to see where it was, that he knew about where it was, and that he knew that he felt it.

The evidence leaves no question as to the sufficiency of the light or as to the irrelevancy of the allegations as to the box cars, nor as to the condition of the step box or of the cinder surface upon which it rested. Plaintiff testifies that the flagman touched or knocked his elbow, but admits that impression made upon him at that moment when he had lost, and was trying to recover, his balance. The testimony to the effect that he did get on the step box finds corroboration in the manner in which he fell, to the extent that it seems unlikely that a person merely moving forward upon a level surface will suddenly fall backwards, and, in this instance, not unlikely that plaintiff may have so put his foot upon the box, with his eyes and thoughts directed to his son, who was behind him, as to bring his weight to bear upon it at some angle less than 45 degrees, with the result that the box was pushed forward, with his foot following faster than his body. destroying his equilibrium and throwing him backwards; but, even if that were proved satisfactorily, it would merely establish a misuse by plaintiff of the appliance furnished by defendant, and would not affect the question of the adequacy of the appliance.

As to the law of the case, we are of the opinion that, where a carrier of passengers furnishes a step box or footstool, to facilitate them in boarding or alighting from its train, it is bound to see that such appliance is safe as to strength, is so constructed as not to be readily overturned, is kept in proper condition, and when set out for use of passengers is placed upon a level and stable surface; but that the carrier is not the insurer of the passenger against the consequences of his own negligence, and where, as here, the passenger is injured in attempting to use such an appliance, without looking at it, and stumbles over or against it when he should have stepped on it, his injuries are attributable to the misuse of the appliances, and not to any defects or inadequacy in the box or in its surroundings, and the carrier is not liable for his injuries.

Carriers—duty with respect to step box.

The judgment appealed from is set aside, and plaintiff's demands are rejected, and this suit is dismissed, at his cost.

Dawkins, J., recused.

ANNOTATION.

Duty and liability of carrier as to "step box" or other device to facilitate entering and leaving car.

- I. Scope of note, 914.
- II. Duty in general, 914.
- III. Particular instances, 916.

I. Scope of note.

As is indicated by the title, this note is devoted to a discussion of those cases determining the duty and liability of a carrier with respect to "step boxes" or other devices to facilitate entering and leaving its cars. It does not include cases dealing with the duty to furnish, and properly to care for, the permanent means or appliances usually provided in aid of entering or leaving cars, such as platforms, permanent hand rails, and the steps of the cars themselves.

II. Duty in general.

The rule which exacts of or imposes on common carriers of passengers the duty of providing suitable and safe means by which passengers may leave and enter the cars is so well settled as to be beyond the field of argument. 4 R. C. L. 1225. That this duty may include the furnishing of a box or footstool or other device to aid passengers in boarding or alighting from cars is equally well settled, but the necessity of furnishing such device is necessarily governed by the facts and circumstances of the particular case as will be seen by reference to the cases set out infra, III.

The courts are not in entire accord as to the exact degree of care required of the carrier with respect to the duty to furnish a foot box or other device, the definitions of this duty varying from ordinary care to that of furnishing the safest means and devices that are known. In many instances where the duty of the carrier to furnish such a device has been at issue, the court has contented itself with declaring generally that a carrier must provide a safe means of entry and exit to its cars. See Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Farmer (1918) 201 Ala. 603, 79 So. 35; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cheek (1899) 152 Ind. 663, 53 N. E. 641; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Bell (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 10, 74 S. W. 700; Chalker v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1919) 207 Mich. 138, 173 N. W. 532; Nelson v. United R. Co. (1917) 85 Or. 427, 166 Pac. 763.

In Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Hill (1919) 141 Ark. 378, 216 S. W. 1054, the rule was stated as follows: "It is the duty of a railroad company to use ordinary care to provide passengers with a safe and convenient method of ingress and egress from its cars, and the company is liable for damages by reason of the neglect of such duty to its passengers in descending from a car at a station."

On the other hand it has been said that a carrier owes the duty to a passenger of providing not only a reasonably safe appliance for enabling him to alight, but the safest appliance that has been known and tested. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Wortham (1889) 73 Tex. 25, 3 L.R.A. 368, 10 S. W. 741, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 576; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dunbar (1908) 49 Tex. Civ. App. 12, 108 S. W. 500, on subsequent appeal in (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 411, 122 S. W. 574.

In St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Tittle (1908) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 115 S. W. 640, the court stated the rule as to the care required of a carrier with respect to furnishing devices to aid passengers in boarding or alighting from its cars as follows: "The carrier is not absolutely liable, and in all events, for failure to provide safe means or conveniences for exit or alighting from the cars. The carrier's duty towards its passenger obviously extends to providing the passenger with reasonably safe means or conveniences for exit or alighting from the cars as against means that are not reasonably safe. This does not mean that the carrier is an insurer, but is liable for reasonable care only. Thomp. Neg. § 2679. A duty is but a performance of some act. The rule applicable in the performance of the duty in this particular is that the carrier is charged with the obligation of exercising the same high degree of care which the law imposes upon it in other relations towards its passengers." The court in that case distinguished Missouri P. R. Co. v. Wortham (Tex.) supra, as follows: "We think [such case] recognizes the rule that a carrier would not be liable for failure to provide reasonably safe means or conveniences to alight from the train if it 'exercised that high degree of care which their duty to the appellee required;' but that it would be liable if it 'had not exercised the degree of care required of them.' "

So, in Texas Pacific R. Co. v. Beezley (1909) 56 Tex. Civ. App. 245, 120 S. W. 1136, wherein it was sought to recover damages for an injury alleged to be due to the failure of a railroad company to furnish a footstool to aid in alighting from its cars, the court held to be erroneous an instruction which charges that it was the railroad's duty to provide "the safest means practicable, the safest means known and used by the railroad companies, to assist passengers in alighting from trains." The court said: "It imposed upon appellant the absolute duty of providing for its passengers the safest practicable means known and used by railroad companies to assist passengers in alighting from its trains, whereas the law only imposes the duty of exercising that high degree of care to furnish such means as a very cautious and prudent person would have exercised under the same circumstances."

However, in the absence of peculiar circumstances calling for such assistance, the failure of a railroad company to furnish a portable step or stool to shorten the distance between the car step and the platform is not of itself such negligence as will render the company liable for an injury resulting from a fall which might not have happened if the step had been shorter, as it is not the duty of a carrier to assist its passengers in getting on and off its cars by providing extra appliances or devices, if ingress or egress is otherwise easy, and no knowledge of the peculiar need of a passenger for such assistance is brought home to the carrier. Such a duty is not enjoined by law. Young v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1902) 93 Mo. App. 267; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Bell (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 10, 74 S. W. 700; Texas Midland R. Co. v. Frey (1901) 25 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 61 S. W. 442. See also Traphagen v. Erie R. Co. (1906) 73 N. J. L. 759, 64 Atl. 1072, 67 Atl. 753, 9 Ann. Cas. 964.

Thus it has been said that an instruction which made it the duty of the carrier to furnish a box, stool, or some other means of assisting the descent of passengers only when it was necessary to do so in order to secure the safety of the passengers, properly stated the law. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Sherrill (1903) 32 Tex. Civ. App. 116, 72 S. W. 429.

The mere fact that other passengers may board or alight safely from trains stopped at the same place does not lessen the duty of the carrier to provide a step or stool, if the platform is so much below the level of the lower steps as to make it unsafe for passengers to alight without such aid. Merryman v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1907) 135 Iowa, 591, 113 N. W. 357.

III. Particular instances.

Where the lowest step of a car is not higher above the ground than is usual in the case of other vehicles from which people safely alight without such assistance, it has been said that a portable box or footstool need not be provided. See Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Farmer (1918) 201 Ala. 603, 79 So. 35. So, in Young v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1902) 93 Mo. App. 267, wherein it appeared that the lowest car step was from 18 to 20 inches above the station platform, it was held that the carrier was not guilty of negligence in failing to furnish a portable step, in the absence of any circumstances showing such assistance to be necessary. The court said: "It is not claimed the construction of the step of the car was faulty in not dropping to a nearer level with that of the platform of the station, or that it was of unusual construction in any way, but it is claimed that since the height of the last step was some 18 or 20 inches above the platform, it was the duty of the defendant to have furnished a portable step for the use of the plaintiff and its other passengers while leaving its car. It appears that the defendant had been in the habit of furnishing a portable step to its other cars, but that none had been used in connection with the 'smoker' for at least a year past. It further appears that the height of the last step of the 'smoker' above the platform was not greater than that between the ground and the last step of the carriages, spring wagons, and buggies in general use. And it still further appeared that thousands of persons had made their exit from said smoker during the preceding year, unassisted and without the happening of a single accident to them. We know of no law, nor has our attention been called to any, which required the defendant to furnish portable steps for the use of its passengers in entering or leaving any of its cars. If it did furnish such steps, it was but a self-imposed duty for the violation of which there could, of course, be no liability. . . . It is well settled that negligence cannot be presumed when nothing has been done out of the usual course of business, unless the course is improper; and that there must be some special circumstance calling for more particular care and caution to make liability. And where something unusual occurs which injures plaintiff, but such unusual occurrence is not even inferentially the result of an unusual act of the defendant, and the defendant has, as far as he is concerned, been pursuing his usual course, which has heretofore been done in safety, then the unusual occurrence is what is called an accident. . . . By the application of this rule to the facts of this case, as we have just stated them to be, it becomes at once apparent that the occurrence which resulted in plaintiff's injury was no more than an accident for which there was no liability."

Similarly, in a case wherein it appeared that the lower step of a car was not more than 18 inches from the platform, and that the injured passenger was assisted by the employees of the carrier in alighting, it was held that the carrier could not be charged with negligence for failing to furnish a box or stool to aid passengers in reaching the ground, the court saying that where none of the attending circumstances tended to establish negligence, it could not be presumed from the mere happening of the event. Texas Midland R. Co. v. Frey (1901) 25 Tex. Civ. App. 386, 61 S. W. 442.

In Truesdell v. Erie R. Co. (1906) 114 App. Div. 34, 99 N. Y. Supp. 694, wherein it appeared that the step of the car was only 14 inches above the rail, it was held that the carrier was not negligent in failing to provide a stool or box to aid passengers in alighting. The court, however, admitted that the rule would be different where the steps were inconveniently high, saying on this point: "If the railroad company furnished a car with a step so high that a passenger could not conveniently alight by stepping down, the jury would have been warranted in finding that it was guilty of negligence in not furnishing a platform or stepping box, or assisting passengers in alighting or warning them of the danger and assuring them that they would be afforded ample time to alight."

In Nelson v. United R. Co. (1917) 85 Or. 427, 166 Pac. 763, which was an action for damages alleged to have been caused by the failure of the carrier to furnish a stool or box to aid passengers in alighting from its cars, the evidence was in conflict as to the height of the car steps from the ground, there being testimony that it was between 2 and 3 feet, and on the part of the company that it was 22 inches. The court held that whether the carrier was guilty of negligence in failing to furnish a stool under the circumstances was a question for the jury, and sustained a verdict denying liability on the part of the carrier. It was said: "It may be stated as a general rule that it is the duty of a common carrier to provide safe and convenient means of entering and leaving its vehicle. This includes the exercise of due care in the construction and keeping, in at least a reasonably safe condition, the steps of cars and other appliances for enabling passengers to board and alight from its cars. It is not, however, bound to exercise an infallible judgment in such matters, and is generally considered to be guilty of no breach of duty if the method of construction adopted is in common use and approved by experience; but it has been held that it cannot excuse itself unless the appliances used by it were reasonably safe, though they were such as had been adopted and used by others. It may be the carrier's duty, under certain circumstances, to provide a stool or box for the use of a passenger entering or leaving its car; for instance, where the steps of such car are inconveniently high, or where the car has been stopped at a point where there is no platform. Whether or not the carrier has been negligent in the construction of its steps or in furnishing other appliances for enabling the passenger to board and alight from its vehicle is usually a question for the jury under the facts of the particular case."

But in Merryman v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. (1907) 135 Iowa, 591, 113 N. W. 357, it was said generally that, "when the station platform is so much below the level of the lower steps of the car as to make it unsafe for passengers to alight without an intermediate stool or step, it is the duty of the carrier to provide such step."

Where it appeared that a passenger fell while alighting in the dark at a station where she had been accustomed to find a stool placed so as to shorten the distance from the steps to the ground, which distance was 23 inches, it was held that the failure of the carrier to have the stool in place rendered it liable for the injury caused to the passenger by the fall. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Bell (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 10, 74 S. W. 700.

Likewise in a case where the distance from the step to the ground was 3 feet or thereabouts, it was held that the carrier was negligent in failing to provide a step or stool to aid a passenger in entering its car. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Cheek (1899) 152 Ind. 663, 53 N. E. 641. It appeared, from the evidence in that case, that, on the occasion of the accident, the train was stopped at a point where there was no platform, and where the distance from the ground to the lowest step of the car was 3 feet; and that it had been the custom, previously, of the carrier at this station, before inviting passengers to enter its cars, to furnish a stool to facilitate their reaching the steps leading to the platform of the car, but on the occasion of the accident it failed to make this provision, although the injured passenger requested that a stool should be furnished, and demurred at attempting to enter the car until assured by the servants of the carrier that she would be properly assisted. It was held that a verdict against the carrier was properly rendered, and that the passenger was not guilty of contributory negligence in attempting to board the train without the aid of a stool under the circumstances. See to similar effect Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Farmer (1918) 201 Ala. 603, 79 So. 35.

Similarly, where a train was stopped at a place where there was no station platform and the distance from the last step of the car to the ground was 20 inches, it was held that it was the duty of the railroad company to furnish a stool to aid passengers in alighting; and that if the stool customarily used was thrown aside because the ground was so slippery that it could not be kept in place, the company should have warned the passengers and given them assistance in alighting. Chalker v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1919) 207 Mich. 138, 173 N. W. 532.

Where the car in which a passenger was riding was stopped some distance from the platform, and on attempting to re-enter the car, after going to procure a meal at one of the company's eating rooms, the passenger fell and was injured, it was held that the company was guilty of negligence in that it failed to provide a box or footstool to aid passengers in boarding and alighting from the train, the court saying that it was quite probable, if not almost certain, that the passenger would not have fallen if there had been a platform or stool next the car. Sellers v. Southern P. Co. (1917) 33 Cal. App. 701, 166 Pac. 599. The distance from the lower step to the ground, however, did not appear from the opinion.

In Missouri K. & T. R. Co. v. Corse (1907) 46 Tex. Civ. App. 60, 101 S. W. 522, it was held that a railroad company was negligent in failing to provide a stool or box for the use of passengers in alighting. It does not appear from the opinion, however, how far from the ground or platform the steps of the car were.

So, where a train was stopped just before reaching a station, at a place where the distance from the lowest car step to the ground was so great as to make it unsafe to alight without the aid of a stool or other appliance, it was held that the jury were warranted in finding the railroad company negligent in failing to provide such stool or appliance. Lancaster v. Southern R. Co. (1912) 92 S. C. 177, 75 S. E. 398, wherein the court said: "In view of the positive and undisputed evidence on the part of the plaintiff as to the call, 'All out for the junction,' and the positive and direct evidence on the part of the defendant, as well as the plaintiff, that the train was stopped before it reached the station, that the step was very high, and that the landing was very narrow and on the verge of a steep incline, opposed only by the recollection of the flagman, who could not swear positively, it seems to the court that the jury could not have reached, with reason, any other conclusion than that due care required that the defendant should furnish a light and stool for women alighting from the train. While it is not true that due care always requires the carrier to furnish stools or other appliances for passengers to alight, conditions shown here by the evidence, beyond reasonable doubt, did require such precautions."

In Appel v. Alton, G. & St. L. Traction Co. (1917) 207 Ill. App. 562, it appeared that a street car passenger was injured by being struck by the rear end of the car, on falling after alighting from the left or wrong side of the front vestibule, owing to the fact that no step was lowered or other appliance provided by the motorman. A verdict for the plaintiff was sustained, the court saying in an official syllabus: "Where a street car motorman states to a passenger in the front vestibule desiring to alight on the left side, instead of on the proper side, of the car, that he will open the wire gate for him, it becomes the duty of the company to provide a step or other appliance by which the passenger can alight in safety."

Where a carrier provides a stool or other device to aid passengers in boarding or alighting from its cars, it must be adequate for the purpose, and the fact that other carriers used similar devices will not relieve it from liability if it is not. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Wortham (1889) 73 Tex. 25, 3 L.R.A. 368, 10 S. W. 741, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 576, wherein it was held that a stool in the shape of a box about 11 inches square on the top, and somewhat larger at the bottom, which overturned when stepped on, was not such an appliance as would relieve the carrier of its duty, the court saying: Notwithstanding the testimony on the part of appellants that boxes of this character were in general use upon railroads to assist passengers in alighting, and that several passengers used the same box upon this occasion, and that none of them were injured, we do not think that the jury were bound to conclude that the appellants, in using it, exercised that high degree of care which their duty to the appellant required. She was a passenger alighting from the car which she had been traveling, to take another, and to complete her trip under her contract with appellants. They owed her the duty of providing not only a reasonably safe appliance for enabling her to alight in order to make the transfer, but the safest that has been known and tested. It would be unreasonable to say that a small box or stool which presented the surface of about 1 square foot and rested upon a base but a little more extensive, and which was shown to be capable of being overturned at least by an incautious step, could be safe as a platform, such as in ordinary use among railroads. If it were not, the jury were authorized to find that the companies had not exercised the degree of care required of them. It is apparent from the testimony in the case that if a platform had been provided, or even a safe substitute, such as could not have been overturned by a step upon the edge, the injury in this case would not have resulted, and it follows that no amount of testimony as to the length of time it had been used, and the number of persons who had passed over it securely, or of expert opinion as to its safety, ought to be permitted to overcome the undoubted physical facts in evidence."

Likewise, it has been held that a carrier is guilty of negligence in providing a small box or footstool which is badly worn and which, when placed on the uneven platform provided at the station, will tilt or turn over when stepped on by a passenger in alighting. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Dunbar (1909) 57 Tex. Civ. App. 411, 122 S. W. 574.

Similarly, where it appeared that a train was stopped at a place where there was no platform, and the carrier furnished a stool to aid passengers in alighting, but placed it on a rough and uneven ground in such a manner as to be insecure and unsteady when stepped on, it was held that the carrier was liable for injuries to a passenger resulting from the overturning of the stool when she stepped on it, the court saying that so placing the stool would not be the exercise of an adequate degree of care in furnishing passengers a reasonably safe means of alighting. Migge v. Northern P. R. Co. (1913) 75 Wash. 197, 134 Pac. 815.

Likewise it has been held that there was no platform at the place where a train stopped to discharge passengers, and that, although a stool was placed by the servants of the carrier to aid passengers in alighting, it was a long distance from the lowest step of the car platform to the stool, and the stool was placed on soft and uneven ground, the carrier was liable for an injury sustained by a passenger by the overturning of the stool when she stepped on it. Southern R. Co. v. Reeves (1902) 116 Ga. 743, 42 S. E. 1015.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. White (1900) 22 Tex. Civ. App. 424, 55 S. W. 593, it was held that a verdict against a railroad company was warranted by evidence that the stool furnished by the company to aid passengers in alighting was improperly placed, being partly under the step, and that the servants of the company took hold of the injured passenger in such a way as not to be able to help her properly.

In Davis v. Kelly (1922) — Ark. —, 237 S. W. 698, where the train had overrun the station platform and a woman passenger was injured as she attempted to alight on a footstool which had been placed on ground that was not level, the submission of the question of negligence to the jury was upheld apparently because of the failure of the carrier to afford the passenger an opportunity to alight on the platform, and not because of the failure to properly place the footstool, or prevent it from tilting as the passenger stepped upon it.

In Plummer v. Boston Elev. R. Co. (1908) 198 Mass. 499, 84 N. E. 849, it appeared that, owing to the nature of the construction of a subway, there were places where the permanent platform could be brought no nearer to the cars than 21 inches. In order to bridge this gap the company had provided a movable extension platform, which was pulled out by a servant of the company when the car stopped with the door opposite such a gap. On the occasion of the accident the car had stopped in such a position that the movable platform covered only a part of the door space, and, in attempting to enter the car, a passenger fell through the uncovered space and was injured. It was held that the company was liable, and the fact that the movable platform was the best device known for the purpose, and that no contrivance to serve the same purpose was in use elsewhere, did not lessen the liability of the company for its negligent use of the device.

In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Southwick (1895) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 592, wherein it appeared that a passenger, in alighting from a car, either missed the footstool provided by the carrier, or if she put her foot on it, the stool tilted or capsized, it was said that, if the use of the stool was negligence, without contributory negligence on the part of the injured passenger, and injury was the proximate result of that negligence, the carrier would be liable. The court, however, did not decide the question whether the use of the stool in question was negligence, the decision turning on other points.

In the reported case (SCOTT v. VICKSBURG, S. & P. R. Co. ante, 908), it is held that while it is the duty of a carrier who furnishes a step box or footstool for the use of passengers in boarding and leaving its cars, to see that the box is adequate for the purpose, and properly and safely placed, it is not liable for injuries to a passenger resulting from his careless and negligent use of the box furnished.

So, where a passenger suffering from a weak ankle failed to notify the carrier of her infirmity, and stepped from a car step to the platform without looking to see if a portable step had been placed there, it was held that, even assuming that the carrier was negligent in failing to furnish the step, it could not be held liable for the resultant injury, as the contributory negligence of the passenger, in failing to look to see if a step was there, was the direct and proximate cause of her injury. Young v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1902) 93 Mo. App. 267.

Likewise, a carrier is not responsible for injuries to a passenger from the use, in alighting, of a stool plainly not intended by the carrier to be used for such a purpose. Thus it has been held that a carrier was not required to furnish means and appliances for alighting from the baggage compartment of a car, where adequate means were provided at the passenger exit of the car, and a passenger who attempted to alight from the door of the baggage compartment, using the motorman's stool as an aid, could not recover for injuries sustained, where it did not appear that the stool was placed in that position by the carrier, or that its use was so authorized. Nor, in such a case, was it the duty of the carrier to warn the passenger of the unusually long step from the top of the stool to the ground. Davidson v. Washington & O. D. R. (1921) 129 Va. 99, 105 S. E. 669. M. B.

STATE OF KANSAS

v.

EARL A. NOSSAMAN, Appt.

Kansas Supreme Court — November 6, 1920.

(107 Kan. 715, 193 Pac. 347.)

Constitutional law — prohibiting sale of cigarettes.

1. The act (Laws 1917, chap. 166) prohibiting and prescribing penalties for bartering, selling, or the giving away of cigarettes or cigarette papers and the keeping of them for barter, sale, or free distribution, is within the police power of the state, and does not violate any of the principles of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

[See note on this question beginning on page 926.]

Evidence — prima facie — possession of cigarettes.

2. The provision making the possession of cigarettes and cigarette papers prima facie evidence of the selling and keeping for sale of the prohibited articles is not a denial of due process of law.

[See 6 R. C. L. 465; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 125.]

Appeal — election — denial — error.

3. Held, further, that under the evidence there was no error in refusing to require the county attorney to elect upon which sales made by the defendant he would rely for a conviction.

[See 14 R. C. L. 199.]

Evidence — sufficiency.

4. The evidence is held to be sufficient to support the verdict of the jury.

Headnotes by JOHNSTON, Ch. J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Harper County (Hay, J.) convicting him of violating a statute prohibiting the barter, sale, or giving away of cigarettes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. E. C. Wilcox for appellant.

Messrs. Richard J. Hopkins, Attorney General, and Vernon Day, for the State:

The Kansas Anti-cigarette Law is not unconstitutional.

State v. Olson, L.R.A.1918B, 975, and note, 26 N. D. 304, 144 N. W. 661; Austin v. State, 101 Tenn. 563, 50 L.R.A. 478, 70 Am. St. Rep. 703, 48 S. W. 305; Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132; Gundling v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44, affirmed in 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633; 12 C. J. 925.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appeals from a decision adjudging him to be guilty of violating certain provisions of chapter 166 of the Laws of 1917, prohibiting the barter, sale, or giving away of cigarettes or cigarette papers, and also of keeping and having them for barter, sale, and free distribution.

The information charged the making of twelve separate sales to a number of persons, and in the thirteenth count he was charged with keeping cigarettes and cigarette papers for barter, sale, and free distribution. The jury found him guilty of separate sales under seven of the counts, and also guilty under the thirteenth count for the keeping of the prohibited articles, but found him not guilty under three of the counts charging sales.

The defendant contends that the act under which he was convicted denies to him the equal protection of the laws, and deprived him of liberty and property without due process of law in violation of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

In substance the first section of the act makes it unlawful to barter, sell, or give away cigarettes or cigarette papers, and also to keep them in a store or other place for barter, sale, or free distribution. It provides that, upon proper complaint, there may be a search for and a seizure and confiscation of such articles if found. It contains the added provision that the possession of the prohibited article shall be considered prima facie evidence of a violation of the act.

The second section declares it to be unlawful to advertise cigarettes or cigarette papers offered for sale in any newspaper, periodical, or circular, or upon any street, sign, placard, billboard, or in any package, store, window, show case, or any other public place.

The third section makes it unlawful to sell or give away cigarettes or cigarette papers or tobacco to any one under twenty-one years of age, and likewise makes it unlawful for the proprietor of any place of business to permit minors to frequent such place while in the act of using tobacco in any form.

The fourth section provides that a violation of the preceding section shall be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not less than $25 nor more than $100 for each offense.

The defendant bases his claim of invalidity upon the ground that the act prohibited the sale of tobacco in one form and permits its sale in other forms, and that the classification so made is arbitrary and unreasonable. For a number of years there has been a well-settled opinion that the use of cigarettes, especially by persons of immature years, was harmful, and the courts have recognized that they were deleterious in their effects. Their sale and use have been regulated and prohibited by legislative bodies, and these measures have been upheld as a proper exercise of the police power.

Constitutional law—prohibiting sale of cigarettes.

An ordinance of the city of Chicago provided that only licensed persons of good character and reputation could sell cigarettes, and that none could be sold within a prescribed distance of a schoolhouse. A license fee of considerable amount was required to be paid, and besides the licensee was required to give a bond that he would obey the laws. A person convicted of violating the ordinance challenged the validity of the regulation, insisting that the ordinance and judgment operated to deprive him of liberty and property, thereby violating the Federal Constitution. Among other claims it was urged that the singling out of one form of manufactured tobacco for regulation, without applying the same regulation to other forms in which tobacco may be used, was an invalid exercise of power. The court overruled the objection, and held that the measure did not violate any principle of the Federal Constitution. In deciding the case it was said: "It being well known that young persons of weak and immature minds are more liable to use tobacco in the form of cigarettes than in any other form, a legislative body may properly provide for the regulation and sale of that article in the form in which it is likely to be most deleterious and injurious, and may restrict the sale of that particular form of tobacco. Paragraph 66, before quoted, expressly authorizes the adoption of ordinances necessary to police power; and ¶ 78 is an express authorization of the city council, to make all regulations necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease. Under these two provisions, express authority is granted the municipality to pass all ordinances or requirements tending to promote the public health, morals, security, comfort, and welfare of the community. Such legislation is included within the provision authorizing the enactment of police regulations. The most important of police powers is that of caring for the health of the community, and that is inherent in a municipality, and may be exercised whether expressly granted or not, because the preservation of the health of the public is indispensable to the existence of the municipal corporations." Gundling v. Chicago, 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44.

The case was taken on appeal to the United States Supreme Court, where the judgment was affirmed, that court holding that the regulation of the sale of cigarettes was a question for the state to determine for itself, and was not a violation of any provision of the United States Constitution. Gundling v. Chicago, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633.

A statute of Tennessee provided that the sale of cigarettes, cigarette papers, or substitutes for the same, or the bringing of these articles into the state for the purpose of selling or giving them away, was a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of $50. W. B. Austin, who purchased packages of cigarettes from a dealer in another state and sold a package to a customer in his place of business in Tennessee, was convicted. He contended that the act was beyond the power of the state legislature and violated the Federal Constitution. In treating the question whether cigarettes as shipped in packages were articles of commerce, subject to state control and prohibition, the supreme court of Tennessee said: "Are cigarettes legitimate articles of commerce? We think they are not, because wholly noxious and deleterious to health. Their use is always harmful, never beneficial. They possess no virtue, but are inherently bad, and bad only. They find no true commendation for merit or usefulness in any sphere. On the contrary, they are widely condemned as pernicious altogether. Beyond question, their every tendency is towards the impairment of physical health and mental vigor. There is no proof in the record as to the character of cigarettes; yet their character is so well and so generally known to be that stated above that the courts are authorized to take judicial cognizance of the fact. No particular proof is required in regard to those facts which, by human observation and experience, have become well and generally known to be true (Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S. 1, 43 L. ed. 49, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 757; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 6; 1 Whart. Ev. § 282; 1 Jones, Ev. §§ 129, 134; Lanfear v. Mestier, 18 La. Ann. 497, 89 Am. Dec. 658, and note 693; State v. Goyette, 11 R. I. 592, 3 Am. Crim. Rep. 282; Watson v. State, 55 Ala. 158); nor is it essential that they shall have been formally recorded in written history or science to entitle courts to take judicial notice of them (Boullemet v. State, 28 Ala. 83; 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 199). It is a part of the history of the organization of the volunteer army in the United States during the present year that large numbers of men, otherwise capable, had rendered themselves unfit for service by the use of cigarettes, and that, among the applicants who were addicted to the use of cigarettes, more were rejected by examining physicians on account of disabilities thus caused than for any other, and perhaps every other, reason. It is also a part of the unwritten history of the legislation in question that it was based upon and brought to passage by the firm conviction in the minds of legislators and of the public that cigarettes are wholly noxious and deleterious. The enactment was made upon this idea, and alone for the protection of the people of the state from an unmitigated evil." Austin v. State, 101 Tenn. 563, 50 L.R.A. 478, 70 Am. St. Rep. 703, 48 S. W. 305.

This case, too, was appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, and, while it declined to take judicial notice that special injury resulted from the use of cigarettes, or to approve the opinion of the Tennessee court that they are "inherently bad, and bad only," it did hold that a restriction or prohibition of the sale of cigarettes enacted by a state for the protection of the public health and welfare is within the police power. In upholding this statute and affirming the judgment, that court said: "Cigarettes do not seem, until recently, to have attracted the attention of the public as more injurious than other forms of tobacco; nor are we now prepared to take judicial notice of any special injury resulting from their use, or to indorse the opinion of the supreme court of Tennessee that 'they are inherently bad, and bad only.' At the same time we should be shutting our eyes to what is constantly passing before them were we to affect an ignorance of the fact that a belief in their deleterious effects, particularly upon young people, has become very general, and that communications are constantly finding their way into the public press denouncing their use as fraught with great danger to the youth of both sexes. Without undertaking to affirm or deny their evil effects, we think it within the province of the legislature to say how far they may be sold, or to prohibit their sale entirely, after they have been taken from the original packages or have left the hands of the importer, provided no discrimination be used as against such as are imported from other states, and there be no reason to doubt that the act in question is designed for the protection of the public health." Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132.

While the decision dealt mainly with the question of whether the prohibition of the sale of cigarettes shipped in packages from another state was an infringement of the power of Congress over commerce, it did hold that it was within the province of the legislature of the state to declare how far cigarettes may be sold, or to prohibit their sale entirely after they have been taken from original packages and from a part of the mass of property within the state. It was held that it was not unreasonable for the state to declare under penalties that cigarettes are injurious to public health and welfare, and that such an act did not trench upon the liberty of a citizen by preventing him from carrying on a lawful business, nor infringe any principle in the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution. These decisions practically determine adversely the contention of the defendant.

The claim that the classification or distinction made between cigarettes and other forms in which tobacco is prepared and wrapped is without substantial merit. It is competent for the state to determine for itself the extent to which it will go in the restriction or prohibition of the sale or use of that which is deleterious to public health or morals. It determined that the sale of cigarettes was a greater menace to the health and welfare of the people than would be the sale or use of tobacco in other forms, and further that the sale of tobacco to minors endangered the public health and safety more than would a sale to adults. It was within the province of the legislature to determine what kinds of tobacco lead to the most hurtful results, and further that the use of tobacco was more hurtful to minors than to adults. We think there was sufficient ground for the classification that was made. The legislature is not required to cover all evils of a like character in a single act. The fact that it has placed one of them under the ban of the law without condemning others does not impair the validity of the act. In Cotting v. Kansas City Stockyards Co. (Cotting v. Godard) 183 U. S. 111, 46 L. ed. 109, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 43, the Supreme Court, in speaking of the classifications, said: "It may often happen that some classes are subjected to regulations, and some individuals are burdened with obligations, which do not rest upon other classes or other individuals not similarly situated. License taxes are imposed upon certain classes of business, while others are exempt. It would practically defeat legislation if it was laid down as a rule that a statute was necessarily adjudged invalid if it did not bring all within its scope or subject all to the same burdens. It would strip the legislature of its inherent power to determine generally what is for the general interests, which interests may often be promoted by certain regulations affecting one class which do not affect another,—certain burdens imposed on one which do not rest upon another."

In the exercise of the police power the legislature may proceed step by step, condemning that which it deems to be the greatest menace to the health and welfare of the people, leaving further regulation and prohibition for future consideration. One who has violated such a prohibition has no ground for objecting that others escape punishment who have done acts which might have been prohibited and punished. The legislature has drawn the line in good faith between the different forms of tobacco and the classes to whom sales may be made, and this, we think, has been done without violating the constitutional rights of the defendant. State v. Olson, 26 N. D. 304, L.R.A. 1918B, 975, 144 N. W. 661. While the statute prohibits the sale or keeping for sale of tobacco to minors, or of tobacco and materials connected with the smoking of tobacco, that part of the act is not within the charges made against the defendant, and is therefore not involved in the case.

There is a further contention that the provision making the possession of cigarette materials prima facie evidence of a violation of the act is a denial of due process of law. It is competent for the legislature to make proof of one fact prima facie evidence of another fact essential to the guilt of the accused, where the fact presumed has a fair relation to, or some natural connection with, the fact to be proven. State v. Sheppard, 64 Kan. 451, 67 Pac. 870; 12 C. J. 1205. The term "prima facie evidence" carries the inference that such evidence may be rebutted and overcome, and, notwithstanding the rule, an accused has the opportunity to submit his evidence and make a full defense. The verdict must rest upon all the evidence which must establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. There is a natural connection between the possession of the prohibited articles and the sale of them, and also of the keeping of them for sale or free distribution. The direct evidence abundantly sustained the charges upon which the defendant was convicted, and the instructions calling the attention of the jury to the statutory rule of evidence did not trench upon his constitutional rights.

There is nothing substantial in the objection that the court refused to require the county attorney to elect upon which sales he would rely for a conviction. The information charged specific sales to particular persons, and there was nothing in the evidence to hamper or mislead the defendant, or to make an election necessary.

Neither is there any ground for Evidence—prima facie—possession of cigarettes.

—sufficiency.

Appeal—election
—denial—error.

the contention that the evidence does not sustain the conviction under the thirteenth count.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

Writ of error dismissed by the Supreme Court of the United States, March 20, 1922 (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1921-22, p. 366) — U. S. —, 66 L. ed. —, 42 Sup. Ct. Rep. 314.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of anti-cigarette legislation.

- I. In general; commerce clause; original package, 926.
- II. Cigarette advertisements, 930.
- III. Cigarette smoking, 931.

I. In general; commerce clause; original package.

As to anti-cigarette legislation constituting interference with interstate commerce, see also II. infra; and State v. Sbragia (Wis.) under IV. infra.

That the police power of a state or municipality extends to the regulation or prohibition of the manufacture or sale and, under some circumstances, the use of cigarettes, is well settled, and statutes or ordinances designed for these purposes have generally been held valid. Austin v. Tennessee (1900) 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132, affirming (1898) 101 Tenn. 563, 50 L.R.A. 478, 70 Am. St. Rep. 703, 48 S. W. 305; Gundling v. Chicago (1900) 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, affirming (1898) 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44; Cook v. Marshall County (1905) 196 U. S. 261, 49 L. ed. 471, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233, affirming (1903) 119 Iowa, 384, 104 Am. St. Rep. 283, 93 N. W. 372; Hodge v. Muscatine County (1905) 196 U. S. 276, 49 L. ed. 477, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, affirming (1903) 121 Iowa, 482, 67 L.R.A. 624, 104 Am. St. Rep. 304, 96 N. W. 968; Re May (1897) 82 Fed. 422; People ex rel. Berlzheimer v. Busse (1907) 231 Ill. 251, 83 N. E. 175; Kappes v. Chicago (1905) 119 Ill. App. 436; McGregor v. Cone (1898) 104 Iowa, 465, 39 L.R.A. 484, 65 Am. St. Rep. 522, 73 N. W. 1041; STATE v. NOSSAMAN (reported herewith) ante, 921; Alperson v. Whalen (1905) 74 Neb. 680, 105 N. W. 474.

See also, among other cases, appar-

- IV. Coupons or other extraneous articles in cigarette packages, 932.

- V. Place or method of manufacture, 933.
- VI. Miscellaneous; title of statute, 935.

ently assuming the validity of anti-cigarette legislation: People v. Duke (1897) 19 Misc. 292, 44 N. Y. Supp. 336; Allen v. State (1913) 10 Okla. Crim. Rep. 75, 133 Pac. 1138; State v. Sbragia (1909) 138 Wis. 579, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 697, 119 N. W. 290.

A leading case on the present question is Austin v. Tennessee (U. S.) supra, from which the court quotes in the reported case (STATE v. NOSSAMAN, ante, 921). The United States Supreme Court, in this case, sustained the constitutionality of the Tennessee statute making it a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not less than $50, for any person, firm, or corporation, to sell, offer to sell, or to bring into the state for the purpose of selling, giving away, or otherwise disposing of, any cigarettes, cigarette paper, or substitute for the same. In the state court the decision was based on the grounds that cigarettes were not legitimate articles of commerce, and that the sale in question was not the sale of an original package, so as to bring the statute in conflict with the power of Congress over interstate commerce. The United States Supreme Court decision is based on the second of these grounds, the view being taken that tobacco, even in the form of cigarettes, is a legitimate article of commerce, although the power of the state to regulate or prohibit the sale of cigarettes, as inimical to the health and welfare of its citizens, is recognized. In this case it appears that the cigarettes were transported by an express company in an open basket, in ordinary cigarette packages of the size of 3 by 1½ inches, each package containing ten cigarettes; and in the majority opinion it was held that, under these circumstances, the doctrine protecting original packages from interference by the police power of the state was inapplicable. Mr. Justice Brewer, with whom three of the justices concurred, dissented, on the ground that the size of the package was immaterial, that the matter of importation was one for regulation exclusively by Congress, and that the effect of sustaining the statute would be to uphold the power of the state to prohibit the importation of such articles as cigarettes into the state for purposes of sale.

The Tennessee court in Austin v. Tennessee, supra, held that it would take judicial notice of the harmful character of cigarettes. The view on this point, of the Federal Supreme Court as stated in the majority opinion, is set out in the quotation from the case in the NOSSAMAN CASE.

The following cases, in so far as they hold or assume that the ordinary package containing ten cigarettes is an "original package," for purposes of interstate commerce, may be regarded as in conflict with Austin v. Tennessee (U. S.) supra, and to that extent overruled: Re Minor (1895) 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 329, 69 Fed. 233; Iowa v. McGregor (1896) 76 Fed. 956; Sawrie v. Tennessee (1897) 82 Fed. 615; Re May (1897) 82 Fed. 422; State v. Goetze (1897) 43 W. Va. 495, 64 Am. St. Rep. 871, 27 S. E. 225. In Re Minor (Fed.) supra, it was assumed apparently that the ordinary cigarette package, containing ten cigarettes, was an original package; and the court held, therefore, that a state statute requiring payment of a license fee of $500 for selling at retail cigarettes, as applied to a sale of such packages imported from another state, was a burden upon interstate commerce in violation of the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

The holding in Blaufield v. State (1899) 103 Tenn. 593, 53 S. W. 1090, that cigarettes are not legitimate articles of commerce, so that a sale even of an original package of cigarettes would not be protected by the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, seems clearly overruled by the decision of the Federal Supreme Court in Austin v. Tennessee (1900) 179 U. S. 343, 45 L. ed. 224, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 132, supra. Although the question of construction and effect of the statute, rather than its validity, was involved, attention is called also to the holding in the Blaufield Case to the effect that the fact that a dealer procured a license to sell cigarettes under a revenue statute did not give him a right to sell in violation of a statute making a sale of cigarettes a misdemeanor; that the revenue act did not repeal the statute making the sale of cigarettes a misdemeanor; that the two fields of legislation were entirely separate and distinct, the latter being a police regulation, passed in the exercise of the state's power to protect the health of its citizens, and the former act being purely a revenue statute, passed only to raise money for the support of the state government.

The Montana statute requiring payment of a license fee of $10 per month, in addition to any other license, from every person engaged in the business of selling cigarettes, which was applicable to a sale of cigarettes whether manufactured within the state or in another state, was held in Re May (1897) 82 Fed. 422, supra, not unconstitutionally to interfere with interstate commerce, the court taking the view that a box holding ten cigarettes, sealed with an internal revenue stamp, was an original package; that after such packages had reached their destination and were exposed for sale in the state they became a part of the mass of the property of the state, and that the business of selling the same was, therefore, subject to the regulations of the state as to licenses the same as other property within the state.

Austin v. Tennessee (U. S.) supra, was adhered to in Cook v. Marshall County (1905) 196 U. S. 261, 49 L. ed. 471, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 233, affirming (1903) 119 Iowa, 384, 104 Am. St.

Rep. 283, 93 N. W. 372, which was a somewhat similar case arising under the Iowa statute imposing an annual tax of $300 on the business of selling cigarettes, and on the premises and the owner thereof on which they were sold. The only difference between the two cases, as respects the question whether the statute unconstitutionally interfered with interstate commerce, was that in the Cook Case, it did not even appear that the packages of cigarettes, each of which contained ten cigarettes, were placed in any receptacle for transportation by the express company, the Federal Supreme Court saying that nothing appeared in the record to indicate the means used in transporting the cigarettes from the factory of the manufacturer to the place of business of the retail dealer, and that it was left to infer that they were shoveled into and out of the car and delivered to the retailer in that condition. The baskets which were used in the Austin Case, it was argued, might have been regarded as the original packages. This difference was held immaterial, it being held that the box of ten cigarettes could not, in any event, be justly considered an original package. The court said that while it might be impossible to define the size or shape of an original package, the principle upon which the doctrine was founded would not justify it in holding that any package which could not be commercially transported from one state to another as a separate importation could be considered as an original package.

It was held, also, by the Federal Court in Cook v. Marshall County (U. S.) supra, that the equal protection of the laws was not denied a retail dealer, by the tax imposed on cigarette selling by the Iowa statute, because sales by jobbers and wholesalers, in doing an interstate business with customers outside of the state, were excepted from its provisions.

In McGregor v. Cone (1898) 104 Iowa, 465, 39 L.R.A. 484, 65 Am. St. Rep. 522, 73 N. W. 1041, it was held that the original package of commerce when cigarettes were shipped in a wooden box containing packages of cigarettes, each of which was sealed with an internal revenue stamp and contained ten cigarettes, was the wooden box, and not the stamped package. So that, where one who purchased such packages of cigarettes outside the state and had them so shipped into the state, and on arrival opened the box and removed one of the packages, which he sold, with the result that he was convicted and committed for violation of the statute, he could not obtain his release on the ground that the sale was in the original package in which the cigarettes were imported, and that the law under which he was convicted was unconstitutional in so far as it applied to such sales. It was held that the determination of the Internal Revenue Department, that the package of ten cigarettes was a proper and original package for purposes of taxation, did not show that it was an original package of commerce for other purposes.

The court took the view in State v. Lowry (1906) 166 Ind. 372, 4 L.R.A. (N.S.) 528, 77 N. E. 728, 9 Ann. Cas. 350, that a state cannot deny to a proper person the right to hold in the original packages cigarettes which he has imported from another state. The case involved the construction of the Indiana statute entitled "An Act to Regulate and in Certain Cases to Prohibit the Manufacture, Sale, Keeping, Keeping for Sale, Owning, Giving Away, of Cigarettes, Cigarette Papers," etc., and provided that it should be unlawful for any person, by himself, clerk, servant, or agent, directly or indirectly, to "manufacture, sell, exchange . . . or keep for sale any cigarettes, cigarette papers, . . . or keep or own, or be in any way concerned, engaged, or employed in owning or keeping," any such cigarettes, cigarette papers, etc. It was held that the statute did not apply to the act of smoking cigarettes or of having them in possession for the sole purpose of smoking them; and thus the court avoided the necessity of deciding the question as to the right of a state, under its police power, to regulate or prohibit the use of articles imported from another state for personal use only, after the original package was broken.

The validity of an ordinance prohibiting the sale of cigarettes without a license, for which a fee of $100 was required, providing that no license should be granted to sell cigarettes within 200 feet of a schoolhouse, and giving to the mayor a certain discretion as to the issuance of a license, was sustained in Gundling v. Chicago (1898) 176 Ill. 340, 48 L.R.A. 230, 52 N. E. 44, it being held that the ordinance did not violate constitutional provisions as to due process of law, and that it was within the authority given by statutes providing for the enforcement of "all necessary police ordinances," and authorizing all acts and regulations "which may be necessary or expedient for the promotion of health or the suppression of disease." The decision is affirmed in (1899) 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633, where it was held that arbitrary power to grant or refuse a license, in violation of the provisions of the Federal Constitution as to due process of law or equal protection of the laws, was not vested in the mayor by the fact that the ordinance gave him power to determine whether a person applying for a license to sell cigarettes was of good character and reputation, and a suitable person to be intrusted with their sale, where he was required to grant a license to every person fulfilling these conditions. It was held also that the fact that the license fee was high enough to make it partake of the character of an excise or privileged tax, as well as to provide a means for the regulation of the business, did not for that reason render it a violation of any provision of the Federal Constitution as an improper and illegal interference with the rights of the citizens. See quotation from this case in the reported case (STATE v. NOSSAMAN, ante, 921).

The ordinance, the validity of which was sustained in Gundling v. Chicago (Ill.) supra, was subsequently amended, so that whereas the 20 A.L.R.—59.

original ordinance prohibited the sale, without a license, of cigarettes, the ordinance as amended prohibited the sale or giving away of cigarettes or cigarette papers or cigarette wrappers of any kind, without a license; and the validity of the ordinance as amended was sustained in Kappes v. Chicago (1905) 119 Ill. App. 436. It was said: "The purpose of the original ordinance was to regulate and restrict and partially prohibit the use of tobacco in the form of cigarettes. It was upheld as a police regulation on the ground that weak and immature persons injured their health by such use. It would be a halting jurisprudence which could find that such an ordinance was legal and valid, but that the body enacting it had no power to prevent retail dealers of tobacco who had and needed no license for their business, from selling freely to minors as well as to all others the tobacco prepared for cigarettes, and giving away to the purchasers the prepared cigarette papers in which to envelop it. But if the council has power to prevent this, it had necessarily the power to pass the amendment to § 9 complained of, the purpose and effect of which is simply to subject to the same regulations and license fee those who sell the finished cigarette and those who sell the two materials which a twirl of the fingers can combine and make a finished cigarette. It would certainly be strange to hold that a restrictive regulation for the sale of tobacco pipes was valid, but that an amendment to it forbidding, except on the same conditions, the sale of pipe bowls with the gift of amber pipe stems, was beyond the power of the legislative body enacting the original restriction. But it would be no more strange than to sustain the contention of appellants in the present case."

That a statute imposing a specific tax upon the business of selling cigarettes did not provide for notice of the assessment or levy to the one engaged in the business was held in Hodge v. Muscatine County (1903) 121 Iowa, 482, 67 L.R.A. 624, 104 Am. St. Rep. 304, 96 N. W. 968, not to render it unconstitutional, as depriving him of property without due process of law. The decision is affirmed in (1905) 196 U. S. 276, 49 L. ed. 477, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 237, where the Federal Supreme Court held that due process of law does not require notice of the assessment or levy to a person carrying on the business of selling cigarettes, there being no discretion as to the amount of the tax. The statute provided for an annual tax of $300 assessed "against every person . . . and upon the real property, and the owner thereof," whereon cigarettes were sold or kept for sale, in addition to all other taxes and penalties, and that the payment of the tax should not bar criminal prosecution for the sale. And the Federal Supreme Court held, also, that the construction of the statute by the Iowa supreme court, that the annual charge imposed was a tax on the traffic, and not a penalty, was not so clearly erroneous as to justify it in adopting a different construction on a writ of error to the state court, in which it was asserted that the statute denied due process of law. It was held, also, that the owner was not denied due process of law by the fact that the statute made the tax imposed on the business of cigarette selling a lien upon the property where the business was carried on.

It was held, also, by the Federal Supreme Court in Hodge v. Muscatine County (U. S.) supra, that sufficient provision for notice and hearing to constitute due process of law was afforded the owner of real property who was made personally liable, and his property impressed with a lien, under the Iowa statute above referred to, for the tax imposed thereby on cigarette selling on the premises, by those provisions of the statute which permitted him to make application to the board of supervisors to remit the tax, and, in case of a denial of the petition, to appeal to the district court for a judicial determination of his liability.

And whether the Iowa Constitution was violated by a statute of that state imposing a tax on cigarette selling, because the statute did not distinctly state the tax and the object to which it was applied, was held by the United States Supreme Court in Hodge v. Muscatine County (U. S.) supra, to be a purely local question, which it could not consider on writ of error to the state court.

It was said in People ex rel. Berlizheimer v. Busse (1907) 231 Ill. 251, 83 N. E. 175, that the legislature has the right, in the exercise of its police power, to pass an act prohibiting the sale of cigarettes. For holding in the case, see VI. infra.

The validity of a statute prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to children under sixteen years of age is assumed apparently in People v. Duke (1897) 19 Misc. 292, 44 N. Y. Supp. 336, in considering the effect of the statute on the question of conspiracy to monopolize the business of making and selling cigarettes.

And the validity of anti-cigarette legislation seems to be assumed in such cases as Allen v. State (1913) 10 Okla. Crim. Rep. 75, 133 Pac. 1138, where the court said it was a violation of the law to sell or give away cigarette papers in that state, and that, so long as such a law was in the statutes, it should be observed, and violation thereof punished.

II. Cigarette advertisements.

The power of a state to prohibit the circulation therein of a newspaper published in another state, containing advertisements of cigarettes, is denied in Post Printing & Pub. Co. v. Brewster (1917) 246 Fed. 321. This case involved the same Kansas statute as that considered in the reported case (STATE v. NOSSAMAN, ante, 921), the provision of the statute involved being that which made it unlawful for any person, company, or corporation to advertise cigarettes or cigarette papers in any circular, newspaper, or other periodicals, published, offered for sale, or free distribution within the state. The court took the view that the business of printing and publishing a newspaper in another state, and causing the copies thereof to be carried into the state, and there delivered to subscribers and customers, to agents and representatives, constituted the pursuing of interstate business within the protection of the Federal Constitution. It was said: "The sale of cigarettes in the state of Missouri, where the newspapers of plaintiff are published, is a lawful business; and the transmission by plaintiff of the intelligence where and on what terms cigarettes may be purchased by its subscribers, by way of advertisements inserted in such newspaper, is perfectly legitimate and proper. Further, it must be regarded as settled the sale of cigarettes in a foreign state to a citizen of this state, and their carriage from said foreign state into this state and here delivered in original packages in consummation of such sale made in a foreign state, is legitimate interstate commerce, which is beyond the power of the legislature of this state to prohibit or unduly restrict or burden. . . . In other words, while the business of bartering, selling, or in any other manner disposing of cigarettes in this state, or the business of advertising in any manner by anyone within this state, of the business of selling or disposing of cigarettes, is by the act in question properly prohibited, yet by reason of the exclusive control of Congress over interstate commerce it must, I think, be held, as the conduct of interstate commerce in cigarettes may not by a state be prohibited or unreasonably burdened, it follows, of necessity, the business of advertising such interstate commerce business, which advertising itself not only is a form of interstate commerce, but further adheres in the very conduct of the interstate cigarette business itself, is also beyond the power of the state to prohibit or make criminal and punish, and this for the reason it cannot be thought possible to make the advertisement of a lawful business unlawful and punishable as a crime."

On the point involved in the preceding case, attention is called to several cases among possibly others of a similar nature, not on facts within the scope of the note, because not involving cigarettes, but of value in this connection because the same principle is involved. Thus, in State ex rel. Black v. Delaye (1915) 193 Ala. 500, L.R.A.1915E, 640, 68 So. 993, the court sustained the validity of the statute forbidding the circulation within the state of newspapers and magazines containing advertisements of intoxicating liquors, holding that the same did not, even with respect to papers and magazines published in other states and shipped into the state, infringe the commerce clause of the Federal Constitution so far as it applies to sales from broken packages, on the news stands. But this decision was in view of the Wilson Act enlarging the powers of the states over interstate commerce in intoxicating liquor, and on this ground was distinguished in the Brewster Case (Fed.) supra, where a publication of cigarette advertisements was involved. The power of the state to forbid the publication within its limits, of advertisements of the keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors at places in other states, is sustained in State v. J. P. Bass Pub. Co. (1908) 104 Me. 288, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 495, 71 Atl. 894, and State ex rel. West v. State Capital Co. (1909) 24 Okla. 252, 103 Pac. 1021.

III. Cigarette smoking.

An ordinance prohibiting the smoking of cigarettes anywhere within the corporate limits of a municipality was held void for unreasonableness, in Hershberg v. Barbourville (1911) 142 Ky. 60, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 141, 133 S. W. 985, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 189. The court said: "We concur in the conclusion that it is not a reasonable ordinance, and that the circuit court properly so held. . . . The ordinance is so broad as to prohibit one from smoking a cigarette in his own home or on any private premises in the city. To prohibit the smoking of cigarettes in the citizen's own home or on other private premises is an invasion of his right to control his own personal indulgences. The city council is authorized by statute to enact and enforce all such local police, sanitary, and other regulations as do not conflict with general laws.

. . . But under this power it may not reasonably interfere with the right of the citizen to determine for himself such personal matters. If the council may prohibit cigarette smoking in the city, it may prohibit pipe smoking or cigar smoking, or any other use of tobacco. The legislature did not contemplate conferring such power upon the council. If the ordinance had provided a penalty for smoking cigarettes on the streets of the city, a different question would be presented; but whether such an ordinance would be valid is a question not now presented or decided."

The question of the power of a municipality or state to prohibit cigarette smoking has been involved in some instances in cases presenting the broader question of the power to prohibit or restrict the use of tobacco, the statute or ordinance in question applying to the use of other kinds of tobacco as well as cigarettes. Thus, in Zion v. Behrens (1914) 262 Ill. 510, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 562, 104 N.E. 836, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1057, the statute made it unlawful to smoke tobacco in any form, whether in a pipe, or by the use of a cigarette, cigar, or otherwise, in public places, specifically designating streets, parks, etc., and made it unlawful for a person to have in his possession in such public places a lighted cigarette, lighted cigar, etc. The court held that the police power of a city does not extend to the prohibition of smoking or carrying lighted tobacco in its streets and parks, which are spacious enough so that the use of tobacco in such places cannot be harmful to others or tend to cause danger to property from fire.

Among possibly other cases involving statutes or ordinances prohibiting smoking, attention is called to the following: State v. Heidenhain (1890) 42 La. Ann. 483, 21 Am. St. Rep. 388, 7 So. 621, holding that a charter provision granting a city power to provide for public health is sufficient authority for an ordinance prohibiting smoking in street cars;

Com. v. Thompson (1847) 12 Met. (Mass.) 231, holding that a statute prohibiting smoking "in any street, lane, or passageway" applied to all open ways, whether legally established public ways or not, the court apparently assuming the validity of the statute.

In Dempsey v. Stout (1906) 76 Neb. 152, 107 N. W. 235, the court avoided the decision of the question whether the legislature could forbid the using of cigarettes by an adult, by ruling in effect that the act of "rolling cigarettes" of one's own materials and for one's own use was not the "manufacture" of cigarettes within the meaning of the anti-cigarette law.

See also State v. Lowry (Ind.) supra, I. where the statute was held not to apply to the act of smoking cigarettes.

IV. Coupons or other extraneous articles in cigarette packages.

The Federal statute of 1897 prohibiting the packing in, attaching to, or connecting with, packages, of tobacco and cigarettes, of "any article or thing whatsoever," other than certain specified labels and stamps, was held in United States v. 288 Packages of Merry World Tobacco (1900) 103 Fed. 453, to be within the taxing powers of Congress, and constitutional. In this case the statute was violated by placing in packages of tobacco coupons entitling the holder, on return of a certain number to the manufacturer, to a premium. The court took the view that the means employed by Congress in this instance were reasonably adapted to the end of collecting revenues, in obtaining a tax based on the weight of the package, and in protecting purchasers from fraud. Apparently the same case was before the Federal Supreme Court under the title Felsenheld v. United States (1902) 186 U. S. 126, 46 L. ed. 1085, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 740, where the same conclusion was reached, it being held that no unconstitutional regulation was made by the statute, although it was construed to prohibit the insertion in packages of tobacco of a coupon printed on thin paper of inappreciable weight and without extrinsic value, which did not affect in any way the ascertaining of the proper tax payable upon the package, or interfere in any way with the collection of such tax. The Federal Supreme Court said: "It seems to us that, in the rules and regulations for the manufacture and handling of goods which are subjected to an internal revenue tax, Congress may prescribe any rule or regulation which is not in itself unreasonable; that it is a perfectly reasonable requirement that every package of such goods should contain nothing but the article which is taxed; that in order to make such a regulation constitutional it is not necessary that there be, either expressly or by implication, an exception of those articles or things which, by virtue of their minute size or weight, do not apparently affect the collection of the tax. Congress may rightfully make the prohibition absolute, and the courts may not draw a line between the foreign substance, which is trifling in size or weight, and that which is of appreciable size and weight, and hold in reference to a particular package the act valid if the size or weight is appreciable, and invalid if it is not. Among the regulations prescribed by Congress in its internal revenue legislation are many which are purely arbitrary, or at least the necessity of which for the collection of taxes is not apparent. . . . We are of opinion that it is within the power of Congress to prescribe that a package of any article which it subjects to tax, and upon which it requires the affixing of a stamp, shall contain only the article which is subject to the tax."

In State v. Sbragia (1909) 138 Wis. 579, 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 697, 119 N. W. 290, in which the validity of a statute prohibiting the selling or giving away of cigarettes or cigarette paper is apparently assumed, it was held that the sale by a retailer of a sealed package of tobacco put up by the manufacturer, which contains a coupon entitling the purchaser to cigarette papers when presented by him to the manufacturer, will support a conviction of the retailer under a statute forbidding the sale or giving away, directly or indirectly, of such paper; that the sale of a package of tobacco which contains a coupon entitling the purchaser to cigarette papers if sent to the manufacturer in another state does not, by reason of the fact that it must be so sent, become interstate commerce, so as not to be subject to the operation of a state statute forbidding the sale of such paper directly or indirectly, or upon any pretense or by any device.

And although not dealing with a statute aimed especially at cigarettes, but at tobacco generally, attention is called to United Cigar Stores Co. v. Stewart (1916) 144 Ga. 724, 87 S. E. 1034, holding void, because in violation of a constitutional provision requiring uniformity of taxes upon the same class of subjects, a statute which imposed a tax of $200 "upon every manufacturer of tobacco, and upon every wholesale and retail dealer in tobacco, who redeems, or offers to redeem, any tags or labels sold or distributed or given with tobacco sales," for each place of business in the state where such tags or labels were redeemed.

V. Place or method of manufacture.

Although not limited to cigarettes, attention is called to Re Jacobs (1885) 98 N. Y. 98, 50 Am. Rep. 636, where the New York statute forbidding the manufacture of cigars or preparation of tobacco in any form in tenement houses under certain conditions was held unconstitutional, as arbitrarily interfering with personal liberty and private property without due process of law. The statute applied to cities having a population of over 500,000; it prohibited the manufacture of cigars or preparation of tobacco in any form on any floor, or in any part of any floor, in any tenement house, if such floor, or any part of such floor, was by any person occupied as a home or residence for the purpose of living, sleeping, cooking, or doing any household work therein; any house, building, or portion thereof occupied as a home or residence of more than three families living independently of one another, and doing their cooking, upon the premises, was a tenement house within the meaning of the statute, which, however, did not apply if, on the first floor of the tenement house, there was a store for the sale of cigars and tobacco. The court said: "What does this act attempt to do? In form, it makes it a crime for a cigar maker in New York and Brooklyn, the only cities in the state having a population exceeding 500,000, to carry on a perfectly lawful trade in his own home. Whether he owns the tenement house, or has hired a room therein for the purpose of prosecuting his trade, he cannot manufacture therein his own tobacco into cigars for his own use or for sale, and he will become a criminal for doing that which is perfectly lawful outside of the two cities named,—everywhere else, so far as we are able to learn, in the whole world. He must either abandon the trade by which he earns a livelihood for himself and family, or, if able, procure a room elsewhere, or hire himself out to one who has a room, upon such terms, as under the fierce competition of trade and the inexorable laws of supply and demand, he may be able to obtain from his employer. He may choose to do his work where he can have the supervision of his family and their help, and such choice is denied him. He may choose to work for himself rather than for a taskmaster, and he is left without freedom of choice. He may desire the advantage of cheap production in consequence of his cheap rent and family help, and of this he is deprived. In the unceasing struggle for success and existence which pervades all societies of men, he may be deprived of that which will enable him to maintain his hold, and to survive. He may go to a tenement house, and finding no one living, sleeping, cooking, or doing any household work upon one of the floors, hire a room upon such floor to carry on his trade, and afterward someone may commence to sleep or to do some household work upon such floor, even without his knowledge, and he at once becomes a criminal in consequence of another's act. He may go to a tenement house, and, finding but two families living therein independently, hire a room, and afterward by subdivision of the families, or a change in their mode of life, or in some other way, a fourth family begins to live therein independently, and thus he may become a criminal without the knowledge, or possibly the means of knowledge, that he was violating any law. It is therefore plain that this law interferes with the profitable and free use of his property by the owner or lessee of a tenement house who is a cigar maker, and trammels him in the application of his industry and the disposition of his labor, and thus in a strictly legitimate sense it arbitrarily deprives him of his property and of some portion of his personal liberty." It was said further: "We are not aware, and are not able to learn, that tobacco is even injurious to the health of those who deal in it, or are engaged in its production or manufacture. We certainly know enough about it to be sure that its manipulation in one room can produce no harm to the health of the occupants of other rooms in the same house. It was proved in this case that the odor of the tobacco did not extend to any of the other rooms of the tenement house. . . . This law was not intended to protect the health of those engaged in cigar making, as they are allowed to manufacture cigars everywhere except in the forbidden tenement houses. . . . What possible relation to the health of the occupants of a large tenement house could cigar making in one of its remote rooms have? If the legislature had in mind the protection of the occupants of tenement houses, why was the act confined in its operation to the two cities only? It is plain that this is not a health law, and that it has no relation whatever to the public health. . . . When a health law is challenged in the courts as unconstitutional on the ground that it arbitrarily interferes with personal liberty and private property without due process of law, the courts must be able to see that it has, at least in fact, some relation to the public health, that the public health is the end actually aimed at, and that it is appropriate and adapted to that end. This we have not been able to see in this law, and we must therefore pronounce it unconstitutional and void."

As holding an earlier statute intended to prohibit the manufacture of cigars, or preparation of tobacco in any form, in rooms or apartments, unconstitutional because of a defective title, see Re Paul (1884) 94 N. Y. 497.

VI. Miscellaneous; title of statute.

The title of the Iowa statute imposing an annual tax of $300 on the business of selling cigarettes, and on the premises and the owner thereof on which they were sold, "An act to Revise, Amend, and Codify the Statute in Relation to Crimes and Their Punishment," was held in Cook v. Marshall County (1903) 119 Iowa, 384, 104 Am. St. Rep. 283, 93 N. W. 372, sufficiently to comply with the constitutional provision that every act should embrace but one subject and matters properly connected therewith, which subject should be expressed in the title. It appeared that a statute prohibiting the sale of cigarettes, under penalty, was amended by the additional section providing for the assessment of the tax above referred to, which tax was to be assessed and collected after the manner of the mulct liquor tax, and was not to be a bar to a prosecution for the penalty for the sale of cigarettes.

Under a constitutional provision that no bill shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title, it was held in Alperson v. Whalen (1905) 74 Neb. 680, 105 N. W. 474, that the legislature might properly prohibit the giving away of cigarettes under a statute entitled "An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture and Sale of Cigarettes." It was said: "The nature and use of these articles is well understood. If the legislature was justifiable in assuming that the character of these articles is such as to justify the prohibition of their manufacture and sale, the court will also take notice of the nature and use of the prohibited articles. With this in mind, can it be said that the subject of this legislation as derived from the act itself is so disguised in the title that the legislators would not be sufficiently notified by the language used in the title, that it was intended to discourage the use of the articles referred to, and to that end, to prevent all traffic therein? We think that it is manifest from the title to this act, and therefore sufficiently expressed therein, that it was the purpose of the proposed legislation to protect the people of the state against results arising from furnishing these articles to the public. . . . If the barter and gift of cigarettes and cigarette paper are not prohibited by the act, it is manifest that the purpose and intent of the legislature is thwarted, and we think that purpose and intent is plainly to be derived from the title of the act itself."

But under a similar constitutional provision, a statutory provision subjecting to a fine any person who sold, gave to, or in any way furnished cigarettes to any person under twenty-one years of age, was held unconstitutional, in People v. Blumerich (1914) 183 Mich. 133, 149 N. W. 1040, because broader than the title of the act, and not sufficiently expressed therein, the title being "An Act to Prohibit the Manufacture, Sale, or Use of Adulterated Cigarettes, and Prohibiting the Use of Cigarettes by Minors." The statute prohibited the use of cigarettes by minors only in public places, and provided that it should not be construed to interfere with the rights of parents and guardians in the management of their heirs or wards on their own private premises. The court said the only prohibition of sale expressly indicated in the title related to adulterated cigarettes; that it was clear it was not within the legislative intent to provide anything more than a modified prohibition of the use of cigarettes by minors; so that, fairly stated, it was the legislative intent to prohibit absolutely the manufacture, sale, or use of adulterated cigarettes, and to prohibit, to a certain extent, the use of all cigarettes by minors. Under these circumstances the court took the view that the words in the title, "prohibiting the use of cigarettes by minors," could not be construed as broad enough to include a provision of the act prohibiting the sale of cigarettes to them.

And the position was taken in People ex rel. Berlzheimer v. Busse (1907) 281 Ill. 251, 83 N. E. 175, that a state legislature does not have power to prohibit the sale of cigarettes under the title of an act which only provides for the "regulation" of the sale of cigarettes. It was said that if the act in question was intended absolutely to prohibit the sale of cigarettes, the court would have no hesitation in holding that it was broader than its title, "An Act to Regulate the Manufacture, Use, and Sale of Cigarettes," and therefore unconstitutional and void. The statute was held valid in this instance, however, on the ground that in providing a punishment by fine and imprisonment for "every person who shall manufacture, sell, or give away any cigarettes containing any substance deleterious to health, including tobacco," the legislature intended not to prohibit, absolutely, the sale of cigarettes, but only the sale of cigarettes which contained substances deleterious to health, including cigarettes made of tobacco injurious to health by reason of being impregnated with drugs or otherwise, and did not intend to prohibit the sale of cigarettes which contained only pure tobacco.

Although not on facts within the scope of the note, attention is called to State v. Olson (1913) 26 N. D. 304, L.R.A.1918B, 975, 144 N. W. 661, which, in sustaining the constitutionality of the North Dakota "Anti-Snuff Act," considered matters related to the present subject. The court held that it would take judicial notice of the use of tobacco in any form as uncleanly, and that its excessive use is injurious; also that the use of tobacco in any form by the young is injurious, and that the use of snuff is especially so. It was held, also, that the statute, which made it unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, to import, manufacture, distribute, or give away any snuff or substitute therefor, and which defined "snuff" as "any tobacco that has been fermented or dried, or flavored or pulverized or cut or scented or otherwise treated," intended to be taken by the mouth or nose, with exceptions as to certain kinds of chewing tobacco, was constitutional, and could not be assailed on the ground that it deprived any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied to any person the equal protection of the laws. The fact that the statute made the exception above referred to was held also not to render it invalid and subject to a charge of class legislation. Petition for a writ of error was dismissed by the United States Supreme Court in (1917) 245 U. S. 676, 62 L. ed. 542, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 13.
R. E. H.

ERNEST R. POLLARD, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM N. WARD, Respt.

Missouri Supreme Court (Division No. 2) — June 23, 1921.

(— Mo. —, 233 S. W. 14.)

Judgment — divorce — bar to action for criminal conversation.

1. A decree of divorce does not bar an action for previous alienation of affections or criminal conversation or seduction, and it is immaterial that the fact might have been, but was not, set up as a defense to the divorce action.

[See note on this question beginning on page 943.]

— effect upon strangers.

2. A judgment of divorce is conclusive upon strangers as determining the status of the parties to it, but not as to the facts litigated.

[See 9 R. C. L. 461.]

Estoppel — failure to set up defense to action.

3. Failure of a man to set up in a proceeding against him by his wife for divorce, known facts of her misconduct with another man, does not estop him from maintaining an action against such man for criminal conversation with her.

[See 9 R. C. L. 462, 496.]

— what constitutes.

4. Three things must occur to constitute estoppel in pais to the maintenance of an action, an admission, statement, or act inconsistent with the claim afterwards asserted and sued on; action by the other party on the faith of such admission, statement, or act; and injury to such other party, resulting from allowing the first party to contradict or repudiate such admission, statement, or act.

[See 10 R. C. L. 689; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 1039.]

Election — right to profit by.

5. A defendant in an action for criminal conversation with a woman who subsequently secured a divorce from her husband cannot set up in defense an alleged election by the husband in settling property rights with his wife in which he obtained an advantage.

Appeal — erroneous admission of evidence — failure to object.

6. Advantage cannot be taken on appeal of the erroneous admission of evidence to which no objection was made when it was offered.

[See 2 R. C. L. 77; 1 R. C. L. Supp. 385.]

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the Circuit Court for Linn County (Lamb, J.) granting a new trial after judgment in his favor in an action brought to recover damages for alleged criminal conversation of defendant with plaintiff's wife. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. Pross T. Cross, H. J. West, and Scott J. Miller, for appellant:

The husband in this state has a right and a cause of action against a defendant who has had criminal conversation with his wife and who has debauched his wife, and this cause of action still exists, notwithstanding plaintiff's wife has secured a divorce by default in a divorce suit against him.

Wales v. Miner, 89 Ind. 118; Wood v. Mathews, 47 Iowa, 411; Dickerman v. Graves, 6 Cush. 308, 53 Am. Dec. 41; Ratcliff v. Wales, 1 Hill, 63; Berney v. Adriance, 157 App. Div. 628, 142 N. Y. Supp. 748; Purdy v. Robinson, 133 App. Div. 155, 117 N. Y. Supp. 295.

The debauching of plaintiff's wife in the suit for criminal conversation, while she was his wife, has no connection with, and is no bar to, plaintiff's suit for damages against the debaucher of his wife.

De Ford v. Johnson, 251 Mo. 253, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1083, 158 S. W. 29, Ann.

Cas. 1915A, 344; Prettyman v. Williamson, 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731.

A judgment for divorce, even at the husband's fault, is not a bar to an action of this kind.

Michael v. Dunkle, 84 Ind. 545, 43 Am. Rep. 100; Bennett v. Bennett, 116 N. Y. 584, 6 L.R.A. 553, 23 N. E. 17; Nolin v. Pearson, 191 Mass. 283, 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 643, 114 Am. St. Rep. 605, 77 N. E. 890, 6 Ann. Cas. 658; Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. 636; Clow v. Chapman, 125 Mo. 105, 26 L.R.A. 412, 46 Am. St. Rep. 468, 28 S. W. 328; De Ford v. Johnson, 251 Mo. 253, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1083, 158 S. W. 29, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 344; Hamilton v. McNeill, 150 Iowa, 470, 129 N. W. 480, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 604; Kroessin v. Keller, 60 Minn. 372, 27 L.R.A. 685, 51 Am. St. Rep. 533, 62 N. W. 438; Houghton v. Rice, 174 Mass. 366, 47 L.R.A. 310, 75 Am. St. Rep. 351, 54 N. E. 843; Crocker v. Crocker, 98 Fed. 702.

Defendant is not in a position to invoke the equitable principle of estoppel.

Pom. Eq. Jur. 4th ed. § 802; Ewart, Estoppel, pp. 6 & 7.

Messrs. Bailey & Hart, James L. Farris' Sons, and Lavelock & Kirkpatrick, for respondent:

The doctrine of estoppel applies, and defendant is permitted to avail himself of the divorce judgment, to which he was neither a party nor privy.

Hill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75, 2 Am. St. Rep. 873, 23 Atl. 44; Atkinson v. White, 60 Me. 396.

An election is in the nature of an estoppel, and, when made to appear from a final judgment, it concludes the party against whom it is invoked.

Trimble v. Wollman, 71 Mo. App. 467.

When plaintiff's wife sued him for divorce, and charged in her petition that he had wrongfully accused her of improper relations with defendant, she thereby put plaintiff to an election between one of two inconsistent courses of action, namely, he must answer the divorce suit, prove her guilt, and thereby establish the right to maintain suit, or he might refuse to answer, withhold his evidence, if any, allow her to judicially establish her innocence, obtain a decree for divorce, and defeat suit by estoppel.

Fox v. Windes, 127 Mo. 502, 48 Am. St. Rep. 648, 30 S. W. 325; Kansas Moline Plow Co. v. Wayland, 81 Mo. App. 305.

Plaintiff received, at least, a part of the fruits of the judgment for divorce, namely, a deed from his former wife for her interest in all of his real estate, and where a party has taken the fruits of a judicial proceeding, he should not afterwards be heard to question it.

Cape Girardeau & T. Bridge Terminal R. Co. v. Southern Illinois & M. Bridge Co. 215 Mo. 286, 114 S. W. 1084; Hector v. Mann, 225 Mo. 228, 124 S. W. 1109.

If plaintiff had information to the effect that he had wrongfully accused his wife of having improper relations with defendant at the date of the institution of the divorce suit, and failed to set it up by way of answer, he is now estopped from averring that she was guilty of criminal conversation with defendant.

2 Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. § 1589; Gleason v. Knapp, 56 Mich. 291, 56 Am. Rep. 388, 22 N. W. 865.

The rule that, to be binding, estoppels must be mutual, is not absolute or without rational exceptions.

Portland Gold Min. Co. v. Stratton's Independence, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 677, 85 C. C. A. 393, 158 Fed. 63; Hill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75, 2 Am. St. Rep. 873, 23 Atl. 44; Atkinson v. White, 60 Me. 396.

Plaintiff having assented, at least, to that part of the judgment settling property rights, received the benefits therefrom, and, in so doing, elected to adopt the theory that his wife was innocent, and that he was guilty of the allegations contained in her petition.

Stone v. Cook, 179 Mo. 534, 64 L.R.A. 287, 78 S. W. 801; Bensieck v. Cook, 110 Mo. 173, 33 Am. St. Rep. 422, 19 S. W. 642; Austin's Estate, 73 Mo. App. 61; Welch v. Dameron, 47 Mo. App. 221; Boyd v. Redd, 118 N. C. 680, 24 S. E. 429; Countryman's Estate, 151 Pa. 577, 25 Atl. 146; Bigelow, Estoppel, 2d ed. 503.

Plaintiff having made his election and received certain benefits from said election, he is bound thereby.

Nanson v. Jacob, 93 Mo. 331, 3 Am. St. Rep. 531, 6 S. W. 246.

White, C., filed the following opinion:

The plaintiff recovered judgment in the circuit court of Linn county, Missouri. A motion for new trial filed by defendant was sustained by the trial court, and from that order the plaintiff has appealed.

The petition charges that the plaintiff has been damaged because of criminal conversation of the defendant with the plaintiff's wife, and alienation of her affections. The answer of defendant, after a general denial, pleads estoppel. It alleges that the wife of the plaintiff, Hope Pollard, on February 24, 1917, instituted a divorce proceeding in Ray county, Missouri, against the plaintiff herein; that in June, 1917, a decree of divorce was granted to said Hope Pollard, the finding of the judgment being that the defendant therein, Ernest Pollard, was the guilty party and the said Hope Pollard was the innocent party; that the alleged facts recited in plaintiff's petition, as to the unfaithful acts and conduct of Hope Pollard toward her husband, were reported to plaintiff, and within his knowledge, long before the 24th day of February, 1917, and by reason of plaintiff's acts and conduct his failure to answer the petition of the said Hope Pollard, and by the judgment in the divorce proceeding, plaintiff is estopped from maintaining his action herein. The suit was brought in Caldwell county; change of venue was granted to Linn county, where the trial was had, beginning on the 3d day of June, 1919."

At the time of the occurrences complained of, the plaintiff, Pollard, thirty-eight years old, lived on his farm in Caldwell county with his wife and four children. He separated from his wife January 29, 1917. Another child was born to his wife two or three months afterward. The defendant, William Ward, then a single man, lived with his parents about a quarter of a mile from the Pollard home.

A volume of evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to prove improper intimacy between the defendant and the plaintiff's wife, which ran over a period of two or three years before the separation January 29, 1917. A number of witnesses, including neighbors and others, testified that they saw the defendant visit plaintiff's home during plaintiff's absence and apparent secret meetings between Hope Pollard and the defendant. Some of the witnesses swore to seeing acts of a criminal nature between them.

On January 28, 1917, plaintiff became convinced that a clandestine meeting had taken place between his wife and Ward, and procured bloodhounds, which traced the tracks of someone to Ward's house. Plaintiff separated from his wife the next day. It is unnecessary to state the evidence any further than to say it is sufficiently clear and substantial to support the allegations of the petition.

The defendant denied all charges, and introduced evidence to show his good character. He introduced the pleadings and judgment in the divorce proceeding begun by Hope Pollard a short time after the separation from her husband. Other facts necessary in consideration of the points to be determined will be noted later in the opinion.

The jury in their verdict assessed the plaintiff's actual damages at $5,000, and his punitive damages at $7,000. The motion for new trial was sustained on the ground that the matters charged and put in issue by the petition in the divorce proceeding "were largely, if not entirely, matters involved in the present trial." The trial judge clearly stated his reason for sustaining the motion thus: "Under these facts the court is of the opinion that, having failed to deny the allegations of the said divorce petition, and having made a money settlement upon the charges confessed in it, and having confessed the truth by having failed to answer, plaintiff in this case is estopped from further asserting the infidelity of said wife, and ought not, in good conscience, be permitted to maintain this action."

The petition in the divorce proceeding alleged that the defendant in that suit, Ernest R. Pollard, had offered his wife, Hope Pollard, such indignities as to make her condition intolerable. The indignities enumerated consisted of several specifications of cruel and barbarous treatment, abuse, and villification. The petition then alleged that on the evening of January 28th, the plaintiff, Hope Pollard, left the house for a few minutes, and when the defendant saw his wife coming back he charged her with meeting a man "out there," and ". . . repeatedly said and accused plaintiff of having met the son of Mr. Ward that night, . . . and plaintiff says that the defendant has repeatedly since then accused the plaintiff of improper relations with other men, and has ordered her to leave him."

The judgment in the divorce proceeding recites a finding that during all the time plaintiff faithfully demeaned herself, and discharged all of her duties to the defendant as his wife, "but that the defendant cursed and abused her at divers times, and did such other and improper conduct towards her as his wife as to render her condition intolerable, as set forth in plaintiff's petition." Alimony to the plaintiff was allowed in the sum of $4,000, and she was required to execute a quitclaim deed to defendant for all the land of defendant. The acknowledgment of the receipt of such deed is recited in the decree.

I. The general rule is, that a decree of divorce does not bar an action for previous alienation of affections, or criminal conversation or seduction. 21 Cyc. p.

1626. De Ford v. Johnson, 251 Mo. 244, loc. cit. 253 to 256, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1083, 158 S. W. 29, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 344, and cases there cited. This court, in the opinion by Judge Graves in that case, said, 251 Mo. loc. cit. 255, speaking of cases cited: "They declare the general doctrine that although the jury may believe that plaintiff's wife obtained a divorce from him, and that she made plaintiff's misconduct ground for obtaining said divorce, yet if the jury believe that, notwithstanding such misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, his wife would not have separated or remained apart from him, or sued him for a divorce if it had not been for the acts, conduct, and influence of defendant toward her; and that defendant purposely and intentionally, by such acts, conduct, and influence, induced her to so separate or remain apart from plaintiff, or sue him for a divorce,—then the fact that plaintiff's wife obtained such a divorce on account of plaintiff's misconduct does not, of itself, constitute any defense to this suit."

This is quoted from Modisett v. McPike, 74 Mo. loc. cit. 646. The De Ford Case is reported in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) at page 1083, with copious notes, citing numerous cases where the subject is illustrated. There is no direct allegation in the petition for divorce which puts in issue the criminal conversation of Ward with the plaintiff's wife alleged in this case so that it could be said to have been adjudicated in that case.

The point made by the defendant, and the point in the mind of the court in sustaining the motion for new trial, is that the plaintiff could have defeated his wife's suit for divorce by proving the facts as to her relations with the defendant; that the very issues presented for determination in this case must have been determined there, because plaintiff failed to present a defense to that divorce proceeding which was complete if true. The judgment, therefore, is conclusive that his wife was not guilty of misconduct.

In taking that position the respondent assumes that a judgment in a divorce proceeding is different from other judgments, in that it is binding upon others than parties to it. There was such a holding in the case of Gleason v. Knapp, 56 Mich. 291, 56 Am. Rep. 388, 22 N. W. 865, a case followed in some jurisdictions. That case, however, has been modified and deprived of much of its force by subsequent adjudications by the supreme court of Michigan. Knickerbocker v. Worthing, 138 Mich. 224, loc. cit. 228, 101 N. W. 540; Philpott v. Kirkpatrick, 171 Mich. 495, 137 N. W. 232.

The precise point has never been determined in this state, but it was approached in the De Ford Case, supra. A number of decisions in other jurisdictions take a position contrary to that assumed by the trial court. In Luke v. Hill, 137 Ga. 159-161, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 563, 73 S. E. 346; it is held that a decree of divorce is a judgment quasi in rem.

"So far as the adjudications fixes the status of the parties, the judgment concludes both parties and strangers; but, beyond the adjudication of the status, the decree does not conclude strangers."

"A divorce decree will not estop a party thereto from contesting with a stranger the truth of the grounds as affecting his liability in another suit upon a cause of action arising pending the divorce suit, but before the decree."

Leading cases are cited in support of the proposition. The case of Coney v. Harney, 53 N. J. L. 53, 20 Atl. 736, was a suit brought by the plaintiff's wife, and it was held that a decree of divorce in favor of plaintiff's wife was not a bar to his suit for damages for criminal conversation, although he had filed in the divorce proceeding a cross bill, afterwards dismissed, in which he charged his wife with the very criminal acts alleged as a cause of action in the suit on trial. The court said (53 N. J. L. loc. cit. 54, 55): "An estoppel, even by the judgment of a court, must be mutual to be admissible in bar, and such a judgment will bind only those who are party or privy thereto. Here defendant was neither party nor privy. There was no mutuality, for had it been adjudicated that defendant had committed the adultery charged in the cross petition, such adjudication manifestly could not have been set up against him,"—a statement of the law particularly applicable to this case.

The case of Michael v. Dunkle, 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100, was an action for criminal conversation brought by the husband against the seducer of his wife. The defendant set up a decree of divorce granted to her on account of her husband's cruelty. The husband knew of the criminal conduct before the divorce decree was granted. The court held that, because the acts complained of occurred while she was still his wife, he had a cause of action, and then used this language (84 Ind. loc. cit. 545): "After this discovery, it is not strange that the appellee permitted his wife, without resistance, to obtain a divorce; but he did not thereby waive or lose his right to redress for the injury done. It would not be in the interests of good order and the public morals to permit the seducer of a wife to set up a disagreement, or even a separation, between her and the husband, as a complete defense to an action by the latter for the wrong."

From these authorities and the others reviewed in the notes in 46 L.R.A. (N.S.), to the De Ford Case and the Luke Case, supra, the general rule appears that a judgment of divorce is conclusive upon strangers as determining the status of the parties ^{—effect upon strangers.} to it, but not conclusive upon strangers as to the facts litigated. The position taken in the Gleason Case, cited from the 56th Michigan, is not supported by reason nor by the weight of authority. There was no mutuality, as said in the New Jersey case, supra. Had the court in the divorce proceeding found the wife guilty of adultery with Ward, Ward would not be bound by it in this suit.

The pleadings and judgment in the divorce proceeding were probably admissible in evidence in this case as showing an admission on the part of the plaintiff. If Pollard, in his wife's divorce proceeding, had filed a pleading which admitted any fact, or if, by his silence, he had failed to controvert the facts alleged there, it would be proper to show it as an admission against him. Such admission would not be conclusive against him here, but, like any other admission, it could go to the jury for what it was worth. See Sickler v. Mannix, 68 Neb. 21, loc. cit. 23, 93 N. W. 1018. Logically it must follow that the plaintiff is not concluded by the judgment in the divorce proceeding.

II. Next, the question arises as to whether the plaintiff is estopped by his conduct. It is true that he permitted a decree of divorce to be rendered against him upon the allegations of his wife's petition. While that petition did not, in direct terms, allege that he had falsely charged her with illicit relations with Ward, it may be conceded that he was put upon his notice that such charge was intended. As said in the Indiana case cited above, after he discovered the nature of her conduct, he might very well desire a divorce, and make it as easy as possible for his wife to obtain one. But the proceeding lacks every element of estoppel by conduct, or estoppel in pais.

To constitute estoppel in pais three things must occur: First, an admission, statement, or act inconsistent with the claim afterwards asserted and sued on; second, action by the other party on the faith of such admission, statement, or act; and third, injury to such other party, resulting from allowing the first party to contradict or repudiate such admission, statement, or act. First Nat. Bank v. Ragsdale, 171 Mo. loc. cit. 185, 71 S. W. 178; Wyatt v. Wilhite, 192 Mo. App. loc. cit. 560, 183 S. W. 1107; De Lashmutt v. Teetor, 261 Mo. loc. cit. 441, 169 S. W. 34; Thompson v. Lindsay, 242 Mo. loc. cit. 76, 145 S. W. 472.

It may be conceded that in the divorce proceeding Pollard's conduct was inconsistent with the claim he puts forth here, but it cannot be said that the defendant in this case acted upon the faith of any such conduct. His criminality with the plaintiff's wife occurred before the divorce suit was brought, and before the separation. Likewise, the third requisite does not appear here. The defendant is not injured in any manner by the failure of the plaintiff to contradict or controvert the allegations of his wife's petition. If the plaintiff had asserted and maintained in the divorce proceeding the facts which he alleges in this suit, the defendant here would have been in no better position than he is. Thompson v. Lindsay, supra; De Lashmutt v. Teetor, 261 Mo. loc. cit. 441, 169 S. W. 34. Ward did not in any manner nor to any degree rely upon anything plaintiff did in his wife's divorce suit, and is not injuriously affected in any manner by the plaintiff's position maintained here because it happens to be different from what he assumed there. The defendant is in no position to invoke the principle of estoppel in pais.

III. It is further claimed by the respondent that the plaintiff herein has obtained the benefit of a transaction, and seeks to repudiate it in this case, in that he obtained the divorce from his wife, a deed from her, and paid her $4,000 alimony, and, having obtained that advantage and assumed that position, he has elected so that he cannot assume a different position here. This is another way of attempting to state an estoppel. It is impossible to see how that transaction affects the defendant. The business settlement which the plaintiff made with his wife at the time of the decree consisted simply of the purchase by him of her interest in property, which she had acquired from her father. It may have been worth more than he paid her, but he is not retaining the fruits of another transaction which affects the defendant or bears any relation whatever to the issues to be determined in this case.

IV. Another ground is urged by the respondent in support of the propriety of the ruling. It is claimed that improper evidence was offered, on behalf of the appellant, showing the incident in relation to the bloodhounds. We cannot find that the evidence, in the way it arose, was incompetent, and, if it was, the point was not raised in time. When the plaintiff, in his direct examination, related the facts about calling the bloodhounds, no objection was made to his evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to set aside the order granting a new trial, and to render Estoppel—failure to set up defense to action.

—what constitutes.

Election—right to profit by.

Appeal—erroneous admission of evidence—failure to object.

judgment for the plaintiff upon the verdict as returned by the jury. C., is adopted as the opinion of the court.

Railey and Mozley, CC., concur.

All concur.

Per Curiam:

Petition for rehearing denied

The foregoing opinion by White, July 19, 1921.

ANNOTATION.

Decree of divorce or separation as res judicata or basis of estoppel or evidence in action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation.

I. General rules, 943.

II. Application of rules:

a. Generally:

1. Action for alienation of affections, 946.
2. Action for criminal conversation, 950.

b. Admissibility of decree in evidence:

II. b—continued.

1. Divorce obtained by plaintiff, 951.

2. Divorce obtained against plaintiff, 951.

c. Extraterritorial effect of decree, 953.

III. Rule in Iowa, 954.

I. General rules.

It is generally held that a spouse against whom a divorce has been granted may maintain an action for alienation of affections or for criminal conversation occurring prior to the divorce, the decree not being res judicata with respect to the plaintiff's cause of action, and not operating as an estoppel by judgment.

Delaware. — Prettyman v. Williamson (1898) 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731 (alienation of affections and criminal conversation).

Georgia.—See Luke v. Hill (1911) 137 Ga. 159, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, 73 S. E. 345 (alienation of affections).

Illinois. — See Sackheim v. Miller (1907) 136 Ill. App. 132 (alienation of affections).

Indiana.—Michael v. Dunkle (1882) 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100 (criminal conversation).

Kentucky. — Hostetter v. Green (1914) 159 Ky. 611, L.R.A.1915C, 870, 167 S. W. 919 (alienation of affections). See also Bergman v. Solomon (1911) 143 Ky. 581, 136 S. W. 1010 (alienation of affections).

Michigan. — Knickerbocker v. Worthing (1904) 138 Mich. 224, 101 N. W. 540 (alienation of affections and criminal conversation). See also Derham v. Derham (1900) 125 Mich. 109, 83 N. W. 1005 (alienation of affections). Compare Gleason v. Knapp (1885) 56 Mich. 291, 56 Am. Rep. 388, 22 N. W. 865.

Missouri. — De Ford v. Johnson (1913) 251 Mo. 244, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1083, 158 S. W. 29, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 344, s. c. subsequent appeal in (1915) — Mo. —, 177 S. W. 577 (alienation of affections). And see the reported case (POLLARD v. WARD, ante, 936). See also Modisett v. McPike (1881) 74 Mo. 636 (alienation of affections).

New Jersey. — Coney v. Harney (1890) 53 N. J. L. 53, 20 Atl. 736 (criminal conversation).

New York. — Purdy v. Robinson (1909) 133 App. Div. 155, 117 N. Y. Supp. 295 (alienation of affections and criminal conversation).

Likewise, the fact that a spouse secures a divorce or judicial separation does not preclude him from suing on a cause of action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation previously accruing.

United States.—Waldron v. Waldron (1895) 156 U. S. 361, 39 L. ed. 453, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, reversing on other grounds (1890) 45 Fed. 315 (alienation of affections); Woldson v. Larson (1908) 90 C. C. A. 422, 164 Fed. 548 (alienation of affections).

Indiana. — Wales v. Miner (1883) 89 Ind. 118 (criminal conversation).

Michigan.—Philpott v. Kirkpatrick (1912) 171 Mich. 495, 137 N. W. 232 (alienation of affections). See also Mead v. Randall (1896) 111 Mich. 268, 69 N. W. 506 (alienation of affections).

Nebraska. — Sickler v. Mannix (1903) 68 Neb. 21, 93 N. W. 1018 (alienation of affections).

New York. — Wilson v. Coulter (1898) 29 App. Div. 85, 51 N. Y. Supp. 804 (alienation of affections); Hendrick v. Biggar (1910) 66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. Supp. 162 (alienation of affections) affirmed on condition of remission of damages in (1912) 151 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. Supp. 306, and reversed on other grounds in (1913) 209 N. Y. 440, 103 N. E. 763.

North Dakota. — Luick v. Arends (1911) 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353 (alienation of affections).

Oregon.—Keen v. Keen (1907) 49 Or. 362, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 504, 90 Pac. 147, 14 Ann. Cas. 45 (alienation of affections).

Washington. — Beach v. Brown (1898) 20 Wash. 266, 43 L.R.A. 114, 72 Am. St. Rep. 98, 55 Pac. 46 (alienation of affections).

Wisconsin. — Lee v. Hammond (1902) 114 Wis. 550, 90 N. W. 1073 (criminal conversation).

In Wales v. Miner (Ind.) supra, the court said: "The fact that a divorce may have been granted to the plaintiff a few days before the bringing of the suit would not destroy the appellee's right of action; that might be the means of perfecting it. . . . The action is brought for the injury and destruction of plaintiff's marital relations, and is not based upon their then existence."

So, it was said in Michael v. Dunkle (1882) 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100: "It would not be in the interests of good order and the public morals to permit the seducer of a wife to set up a disagreement, or even a separation, between her and the husband, as a complete defense to an action by the latter for the wrong."

In Hendrick v. Biggar (1910) 66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. Supp. 162, affirmed on condition of remission of damages in (1912) 151 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. Supp. 306, and reversed on other grounds in (1913) 209 N. Y. 440, 103 N. E. 763, the court said:

"It would be strange, indeed, if the defendant, having broken up the plaintiff's home and forced her to a judgment for support which the court was powerless to finance, could plead such judgment as a bar to an action for her wrongdoing. Such is not the law."

But, it has been held, the failure of the husband to set up the adultery of the wife in a divorce suit against him is a complete bar to a subsequent action by him for criminal conversation. Gleason v. Knapp (1885) 56 Mich. 291, 56 Am. Rep. 388, 22 N. W. 865, wherein the court said: "The wife's divorce proceedings, which began in January, 1881, being followed by a decree which established that she had a sufficient cause of grievance at the earliest date when plaintiff attempted to show any grievance, must be regarded as a bar to any cause of action for that grievance, if it existed. If plaintiff had such a cause of action as he now asserts, it would not only have been admissible in evidence in that divorce suit, but it would have been an absolute and perfect defense to it. The suggestion of the circuit judge that the jury might, if they saw fit, infer that that very divorce suit was the outcome of defendant's misconduct, cannot be allowed any force, since defendant's (plaintiff's here) failure to defend on that ground, when that defense was open to him, and, according to his claim now, was known to him, left it as completely cut off as any other; and the decree is legally conclusive against him that no such facts exist. The facts sworn to by himself in this case are entirely contradictory to his sworn bill concerning the important allegation that he never cohabited with his wife after January 1, 1881, and his claim that he persisted in desiring her return after both bills were filed is somewhat extraordinary in view of this action. . . . There is nothing on plaintiff's own showing which, in our view, left him anything to go to the jury upon, as the divorce proceedings were introduced by himself, and, without showing them, he could not have been offered as a witness at all."

. . . The defense made by his own silence in the divorce suit is as full a bar as could be made, and, in view of it, the case is a very singular one to be brought in a court of justice after the divorce had become absolute and not appealed from."

The foregoing case was reviewed in Purdy v. Robinson (1909) 133 App. Div. 155, 117 N. Y. Supp. 295, set out infra, II. a, 2, the court saying: "Gleason v. Knapp (Mich.) supra, cited by the learned counsel for the appellant is not for him. In that case the wife had obtained a divorce, without defense, and the former husband afterwards sued the defendant for criminal conversation, alleging an act known to the former husband before the divorce suit. The court decided that, if the husband had such a cause of action, it would not only have been admissible in evidence in the divorce suit, but would have been an absolute defense; that the husband's failure to defend the divorce suit upon that ground left it completely cut off; and that the decree of divorce was legally conclusive that the facts now relied upon by him in his action for criminal conversation did not exist. Cited, also, in 2 Bishop, Marr. Div. & Sep. § 1589. I think that this doctrine is sound. But, of course, that rule depends upon the fact that the husband had knowledge, so as to make the plea."

Gleason v. Knapp (Mich.) supra, was also reviewed in Luick v. Arends (1911) 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353, set out infra, II. a, 1, wherein the court said: "The case of Gleason v. Knapp is further distinguishable from the case on trial inasmuch as in that case the doctrine really applied was that of estoppel by pleadings, whereby Gleason was not permitted to take a position in his alienation of affections case diametrically opposed to his verified complaint in his divorce case. This plaintiff is now alleging practically the same facts as he alleged in defense of his wife's action for divorce. As the divorce judgment is not mutual under the above authorities, it does not bar him from alleging the same facts in his complaint in this action. There is no estoppel because of his pleadings, his claims in each case being consistent, consequently the case cited (Gleason v. Knapp) does not apply."

However, the failure of the husband to charge adultery in defense of a suit for divorce on the ground of cruelty has been held not to bar a subsequent action by him for the alienation of his wife's affections. Knickerbocker v. Worthing (1904) 138 Mich. 224, 101 N. W. 540, wherein the court said: "Counsel says plaintiff failed to set up this charge in his amended answer in the divorce case, and is now debarred from charging the defendant with said offense. It is true, the defendant in that case did not say in so many words that his wife and Mr. Worthing had committed adultery, but he, in effect, so charged them. This court so regarded the allegations of his answer, and passed upon that question in disposing of the case. Counsel also says that, because the court passed upon that phase of the case, and found the charge of adultery was not made out in the divorce case, the decree in that case is conclusive upon that question; citing as to both of these claims Gleason v. Knapp (1885) 56 Mich. 291, 56 Am. Rep. 388, 22 N. W. 865. There is language in the opinion in that case which tends to justify the claim of counsel, but when the case is considered carefully it will be found to be distinguishable from this one. In the case of Gleason's wife against him no answer was put in. In the case of Gleason against his wife nothing was done by him except to file his bill of complaint. In the case brought by him against Knapp the court found the facts sworn to by him were entirely contradictory to his sworn bill against his wife. The question involved in the case of Knickerbocker v. Knickerbocker (1903) 135 Mich. 102, 97 N. W. 1117, was whether the wife was entitled to a divorce upon the ground of cruelty. We held that she was. The question involved here is whether the affections of Mrs.

Knickerbocker were alienated by the unlawful acts of the defendant."

In a concurring opinion in Knickerbocker Case (Mich.) supra, it was said: "The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of the chief justice. . . . I also agree that the plaintiff's action is not barred by the failure to charge adultery in terms in the answer interposed in the chancery case. There is no doubt that a bona fide defense was made in that case. It would be going beyond anything held in Gleason v. Knapp (Mich.) supra, relied upon by defendant's counsel, and going beyond the requirements of public policy, to hold that because the husband (if such were the fact) chose to make his defense without introducing that element he is barred from maintaining this action against another. Much less can it be said that the decision of this court in the divorce case, rendered long after the trial of the present case at the circuit, such decision being upon a question of fact, can or should have the slightest effect upon the verdict of the jury in the present case."

II. Application of rules.

a. Generally.

1. Action for alienation of affections.

In Luick v. Arends (1911) 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353, an action for alienation of affections brought by a husband from whom the wife had obtained a divorce in another state, it was held that the decree was no bar to the action, the court saying: "At the outset . . . we are confronted with the question whether the decree of divorce granted the wife from her husband, the plaintiff, upon the court's findings of cruel and inhuman treatment of her by the plaintiff, endangering her life, covering the identical period of time embraced within the pleadings and evidence in this action between the plaintiff and a third person, is res judicata or an estoppel, by judgment, on those questions and plaintiff's treatment of his wife, under investigation in this case against Arends, who was a stranger to the divorce action. The result of the divorce action was a judgment against this plaintiff, finding him at fault in the disrupting of his family relations, and adjudging the dissolution of the marriage because thereof, and justifying her action in leaving him. If the findings and judgment in the divorce proceedings are binding upon the plaintiff in this case, they absolutely preclude his recovery, and further discussion of the case and errors alleged would be needless. The authorities are practically unanimous in their holdings that the decree is admissible, and is res judicata as against the world, only to the extent of judicially establishing the prior existence of the marriage, and its dissolution, and the status of the parties thereafter under the decree. To this extent only is the divorce judgment a judgment in rem and res judicata in this action; the divorce decree establishes its own existence only, and thereafter the status of the former husband and wife as between themselves and the world; but the judgment of divorce does not carry into this case, under the rules of former adjudication or estoppel by judgment, the issues involved in the divorce trial, nor the grounds upon which the decree of divorce was granted. For reasons of public policy only does the law treat the divorce action as a proceeding in rem, and this only to the above extent. It is a well-known rule of law that in a proceeding strictly in rem not only the parties named in the action, but the world, is concluded by the judgment, not only to the extent of the judgment itself, but as to all matters in issue and necessarily determined in the findings of fact and decision of matters of law upon which the judgment is based; but a divorce decree is in all things a judgment in personam, and as such the rules of evidence applicable to judgments in personam apply, except so far as the same is to be treated as a judgment in rem as above stated. Hence, the Iowa divorce decree is not admissible in evidence except to establish its own existence, the marriage of the parties being admitted, and as bearing upon the admissibility of testimony relating to the statute as to privileged communications between husband and wife. It is not res judicata to plaintiff's cause of action; it does not estop, by judgment, plaintiff from asserting his cause of action against defendant, Arends. Arends was a stranger to the record in the Iowa divorce proceedings; the judgment in that case did not bind him, except as it operated as against the world in certain particulars only as a judgment in rem."

The case of Prettyman v. Williamson (1898) 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731, was an action by a husband for alienation of affections in one count and for criminal conversation in another. After the commencement of the action the legislature granted the wife a divorce, and the court held that the divorce was not a bar to the action, saying: "Although it is true, as Mr. Bishop has said in his valuable work on Marriage & Divorce, vol. 1, § 1465, 'that a legislative divorce, equally with a judicial one, snaps the vinculum of the marriage, and that whatever hangs upon it falls,' yet the learned author, in laying down that proposition, illustrates its meaning by referring to the next section, which is as follows: 'If the man dies, the woman will not be his widow, entitled to dower and a portion of his personal property. He will not, on her death, be authorized to hold her lands as tenant by the courtesy; but, on the contrary, his interest and that of his grantees and representatives, in them and in her choses of action, cease. This is not a divesting of vested rights.' The learned writer did not mean, and it cannot be the law, that the divorce would be a bar to an action like the present, brought for an injury to the marital relations prior to the divorce, and which action is not based upon the existence of such relations at the time of the commencement of the suit."

In Hostetter v. Green (1914) 159 Ky. 611, L.R.A.1915C, 870, 167 S. W. 919, the court said: "The argument for appellant is that a judgment in a divorce case is a judgment in rem and therefore binding not only upon the parties thereto, but upon the whole world, and that inasmuch as the evidence in that case and this was substantially the same that issue is res judicata as to appellee, and he is precluded from again litigating it. But this contention is not sound; the appellants in this action were not parties to the divorce suit, and in the nature of things could not have been, nor is the wife a party to this suit; the judgment in the divorce suit is binding upon the appellants in this suit only in so far as it fixed the status of the parties to the divorce suit. While the evidence in the two actions may be substantially the same, the pleadings presented essentially different causes of action; in the divorce suit the issue was which party had abandoned the other, while in this suit is involved the issue whether the parents of the wife, prior to the abandonment, were guilty of such conduct and of exercising such influence over their daughter as alienated her affections from the appellee and thereby brought about the abandonment. It does not follow that if Green did abandon his wife, that the abandonment might not have been forced upon him by reason of the hostility of the Hostetters to him, and their influence over their daughter, coupled with mistreatment of him, might have driven him to abandoning his wife when such abandonment would not have been necessary and would never have taken place except for their mistreatment of him and their conduct in prejudicing their daughter against him. Abandonment of a wife by the husband does not necessarily mean that her affections have not theretofore been alienated from him by other persons. The issue of abandonment in a divorce case between husband and wife, and the issue of alienation of affections between either of them and third parties in another and distinct case, are in no sense akin to each other; and because the evidence in the two cases may be substantially the same is no reason why a judgment in one should be a bar to the other. It is not inconceivable that, even if the evidence in the two cases were exactly the same, it might not uphold a charge of abandonment in the one case, and the charge of alienation in the other. In the divorce case the appellee was barred by law from testifying, while in this case, for the first time, he was permitted by his own evidence to give his version of the differences between him and his wife and what brought them about. It would be unjust to appellee to deny him the right to be heard on the issues raised in this suit, where he may, under the law, testify, because in a previous action between him and another upon different issues, where he was barred from testifying, the same facts were held against him upon the issues there pending. He has not had his day in court as between him and appellants upon the issues between them, and, for the first time in this case, was permitted to testify about these facts."

In Modisett v. McPike (1881) 74 Mo. 636, it was held that the fact that a wife obtained a divorce from her husband, based on his misconduct, did not of itself constitute a defense to an action by him for the alienation of her affections, if, notwithstanding the misconduct on the part of the plaintiff, his wife would not have sued him for divorce if it had not been for the acts, conduct, and influence of the defendant in the alienation action.

In Beach v. Brown (1898) 20 Wash. 266, 43 L.R.A. 114, 72 Am. St. Rep. 98, 55 Pac. 46, the court said: "The action in this case was brought by the respondent after she had obtained a divorce from her husband, and it is therefore urged by the appellant that, if she ever had the right to bring this action, it was lost when she sought and obtained a divorce; that all rights were settled by the decree of divorce; and cases from this court are cited to sustain that contention. But we do not think that the cases cited or the law bear upon this character of rights. It could not, in the very nature of things, have been contemplated in the divorce decree. It is a damage which is peculiar to the wife, which the husband, under no rule of right, could have any interest in; and it would be a harsh rule of law that, conceding that the wife had this right during coverture, would deprive her of the right when the wrongful acts of which she complains created the necessity for and caused the action for divorce. Of course, the damages could not be calculated after the time when the decree of divorce was obtained."

So, in Philpott v. Kirkpatrick (1912) 171 Mich. 495, 137 N. W. 232, it was held that a husband was not estopped from maintaining a suit for the alienation of his wife's affections by reason of having previously brought a divorce suit in which he complained of the present defendant's interference with his domestic relations, and in which he obtained a decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, it being said that the respective positions of the plaintiff in the two suits were not so inconsistent as to work an estoppel. The court added, however: "It should be borne in mind that the decree in favor of the complainant in the divorce case was because of the wife's extreme cruelty. The decree places it upon no other grounds. As we have shown, the decree was signed on the very day the divorce was granted by the circuit judge, who also heard the instant case, and there was nothing in the record to show that there was any mistake in the decree. It does appear in the record that the plaintiff desired his counsel to make the defendant a corespondent in the divorce case. This, however, was not done."

In Wilson v. Coulter (1898) 29 App. Div. 85, 51 N. Y. Supp. 804, an action for alienation of affections, the defendants requested the court to charge that the plaintiff could not recover damages subsequent to August 10, 1895, when she began her action for a separation on the ground of desertion, and also that she could not recover damages after April 1, 1896, when the judgment in that action was entered. The court replied: "On that subject, gentlemen, I will charge you that if it was the plaintiff's desire and wish to become separated from her husband at the time, and end her relations with him, rather than to live with him as her husband, then you will not take into consideration her loss of his conjugal society after that period. But if, on the other hand, you find that she desired to live with her husband, but was unable to find him,—to locate him,—and that this action of separation was instituted under the circumstances, and as the necessary result of the action of these defendants in inducing her husband to leave her and remain away from her, and as a necessary course for her, in order to obtain some provisions for her maintenance and support, then you are entitled to still take into consideration, as charged by the court before, all the loss of the conjugal society resulting from the wrongful act of the defendants." The defendants excepted to the refusal to instruct as requested and to the instruction given. On appeal it was said: "In actions of this character the plaintiff is entitled to recover damages, not only for the loss of her husband's society, but for the loss of his support and maintenance, which the marriage relation entitles her from the husband and his estate. In case the jury found that the plaintiff did not prosecute her action for a separation because of her desire to live apart from her husband, but because she was unable, by the action of the defendants, to learn of his whereabouts and induce him to return, then the permanent loss of his society and support could be taken into account by the jury on the question of damages."

Under a statute permitting a corespondent to appear in the divorce action and defend the action so far as the issues affect him, the corespondent may become bound by the judgment in the divorce proceeding. But the corespondent is not so bound where the judgment roll does not, in any manner, disclose that he became a party to the divorce action. Hendrick v. Biggar (1913) 209 N. Y. 440, 103 N. E. 763, reversing (1912) 151 App. Div. 522, 136 N. Y. Supp. 306, which affirmed on this point (1910)

66 Misc. 576, 122 N. Y. Supp. 162, wherein the court said: "This appeal presents for consideration one of the . . . class of cases where the corespondent had not been originally served with a copy of the summons and complaint, but voluntarily appeared and demanded service of the latter, and, in the first instance, we shall consider an assumed case where the judgment roll in the divorce action duly discloses that a corespondent has thus appeared, and joined issue, and contested the allegations of adultery made against him, or, after service of the complaint and appearing to defend, has been duly placed in default on the trial of such issues. In such a case we see no reason why judgment based upon the trial of such issues should not be an adjudication as to and binding upon such corespondent. It is true that this section provides for a somewhat anomalous practice, and that a corespondent acting under it does not, in the ordinary manner, become a party to the action and to the judgment rendered therein. Nevertheless, he does become a party to it in a manner which, although qualified, gives him a full opportunity to defend against and contest the particular allegations which affect him. Thus there is afforded that opportunity for a full and complete trial of these issues which calls for the application of the fundamental principle governing the general doctrine of res judicata, that a party shall not be heard a second time on a issue which he has once been called upon and permitted to try and contest. We do not think, however, that the evidence presented in this action of appellant's alleged participation in the divorce action so brings her within the principle which we have just stated as to make said judgment binding on her. The judgment roll does not, in any manner, disclose that she became a party to said divorce action. Evidence was offered outside of said judgment roll, to the effect that she appeared in the action and demanded a copy of the complaint, and that a copy of said complaint was served upon the attorney who served this notice of appearance. It appears, however, that said attorney also represented the defendant in said action, and it is not made at all clear that a copy of the complaint was served on him by reason of his appearance for this appellant rather than as attorney for the defendant in the divorce action. But in addition to this, there is no further evidence disclosing appellant's relations to said action. The judgment roll would seem to make it reasonably plain that she did not appear on the trial of the action and contest the allegations of adultery with her, and there is no evidence to show that she ever answered in the action, or that she was properly placed in default in not appearing upon the trial. Under these circumstances, and with such absence of proof, we are not willing to hold that she is bound by the judgment."

The decision in the foregoing case was approved in Raymond v. Williston (1914) 213 Fed. 525.

2. Action for criminal conversation.

In Michael v. Dunkle (1882) 84 Ind. 544, 43 Am. Rep. 100, an action for criminal conversation, it appeared that before the criminal intercourse occurred, the plaintiff and his wife had separated and did not afterwards live together, and that before the commencement of the action she had obtained a divorce from him. The court, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff, said: "The woman was still the appellee's wife, and notwithstanding the differences which had led to the separation, which it seems was caused by his cruelty, there might have been a reconciliation between them; and indeed there is evidence that the appellee was seeking to bring this about at the time when the offenses of the appellant were committed and discovered. After this discovery, it is not strange that the appellee permitted his wife, without resistance, to obtain a divorce; but he did not thereby waive or lose his right to redress for the injury done."

Likewise, in Coney v. Harney (1890) 53 N. J. L. 53, 20 Atl. 736, an action by a husband for criminal conversation, the defendant filed a plea alleging that in an action for divorce brought by the wife, the husband had filed a cross petition charging her with having committed adultery with the defendant, and, that issue having been joined and evidence taken, the cross petition of the husband was dismissed, and a decree granted to the wife on her petition. The court, holding that the plea was bad, said: "It has been contended, in support of the plea, that the decree therein set up is conclusive against the plaintiff as res judicata, and affords defendant a bar to this action. It was argued with ingenuity and no little force, that the law ought not to permit one who has made an issue of this character, and, having presumably produced all the evidence in his power, has encountered a defeat thereon, to again vex the courts by a retrial of the same issue. Such considerations have elsewhere induced legislation providing for making the alleged adulterer a party to the divorce proceeding as co-respondent. But no such legislation has changed our law. We are therefore left to enforce the well-settled and indisputable rule on this matter. An estoppel, even by the judgment of a court, must be mutual to be admissible in bar, and such a judgment will bind only those who are party or privy thereto. Here defendant was neither party nor privy. There was no mutuality, for had it been adjudicated that defendant had committed the adultery charged in the cross petition, such adjudication manifestly could not have been set up against him. Under the rule referred to, he cannot set up the adjudication in his favor."

It appeared in Purdy v. Robinson (1909) 133 App. Div. 155, 117 N. Y. Supp. 295, an action by a husband for both alienation and criminal conversation, that the wife had obtained a divorce on the ground of the husband's adultery, and that the criminal conversation took place in the time intervening between the commencement of the wife's action for divorce and the final decree therein. The court, in sustaining the husband's right to bring the suit, said: "A husband's cause of action for criminal conversation should not be barred by the plea of the adulterer that, after the act of criminal conversation, the husband had forfeited or destroyed his conjugal rights. . . . The proposition of the defendant, applied to this case, is that after a wife begins an action for absolute divorce, if she have a leman thereafter, he is secure from an action by her husband for criminal conversation. But the beginning of an action for absolute divorce does not sever the relation of husband and wife. The wife cannot thereafter cohabit with the husband and succeed in her action; but cohabitation is not the full measure of his conjugal rights. . . . The fact that the husband committed adultery is not available as a bar to the adulterer with the wife, when sued for criminal conversation."

b. Admissibility of decree in evidence.

1. Divorce obtained by plaintiff.

It is generally conceded that the spouse who is suing for alienation of affections or for criminal conversation, and who has already obtained a divorce, may introduce the decree of divorce for the purpose of showing that the other spouse, whom he claims has been debauched or whose affections have been alienated, no longer sustains the relation of husband or wife. Waldron v. Waldron (1895) 156 U. S. 361, 39 L. ed. 453, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 383, reversing (1890) 45 Fed. 315, on other grounds; Woldson v. Larson (1908) 90 C. C. A. 422, 164 Fed. 548; Mead v. Randall (1896) 111 Mich. 268, 69 N. W. 506; Lee v. Hammond (1902) 114 Wis. 550, 90 N. W. 1073.

In Woldson v. Larson (1908) 90 C. C. A. 422, 164 Fed. 548, supra, the court said: "A copy of the decree of divorce between the defendant in error and his wife was admitted in evidence. It is contended that this was error for the reason that a judgment in a suit is not evidence in another suit against one who was not a party to it. We think there can be no question of the competency and materiality of proof that the plaintiff in such action as this has, since the occurrence of the tort complained of, obtained a divorce from his wife. It is proper for him to show that the wife, whom he claims has been debauched, no longer sustains that relation to him, and the best proof of that fact is the decree of divorce."

In Lee v. Hammond (Wis.) supra, both the fact that a divorce had been granted and the ground on which it was obtained were held to be competent evidence.

But in the United States cases, supra, it was held that the party procuring the divorce may not use the decree in a suit for alienation of affections or for criminal conversation, for the purpose of showing the ground on which the divorce was obtained, or as proof of the act with which the defendant, as corespondent in the divorce action, was charged.

Thus, in Waldron v. Waldron (U. S.) supra, it was held that where the fact of divorce was confessed by the pleadings, and was admitted by counsel for the defendant, in open court, the divorce record was inadmissible.

It was said in Mead v. Randall (1896) 111 Mich. 268, 69 N. W. 506: "It was competent for the plaintiff to show the fact of divorce, for the purpose of negating any claim that there had been, up to that time, a reconciliation between the parties, plaintiff and his wife. But the bill of complaint, which was an ex parte statement of the plaintiff, not himself a competent witness, should not have been read in evidence. Much less should the jury have been permitted to consider it as substantive proof of the facts stated."

2. Divorce obtained against plaintiff.

Where the plaintiff in an action for alienation of affections or criminal conversation is the guilty person against whom a divorce has been obtained, it is held in some jurisdictions that the decree is admissible against him in mitigation of damages. Prettyman v. Williamson (1898) 1 Penn. (Del.) 224, 39 Atl. 731 (alienation of affections); Sackheim v. Mil- ler (1907) 136 Ill. App. 132 (alienation of affections). See also Luke v. Hill (1911) 137 Ga. 159, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 559, 73 S. E. 345 (alienation of affections); Simmons v. Simmons (1888) 21 Abb. N. C. 469, 4 N. Y. Supp. 221 (alienation of affections).

In Prettyman v. Williamson (Del.) supra, it was said: "The divorce granted by the legislature to Mrs. Prettyman, . . . may be and should be considered by you in mitigation of damages, if you should think the plaintiff entitled to recover damages, because the plaintiff would not be entitled to any compensation for the loss of the affection, society, and services of his wife after she ceased to be his wife."

Likewise, it was said in Sackheim v. Miller (1907) 136 Ill. App. 132: "The statements made to the court by defendant's counsel informed the court that the bill was by Mrs. Miller for a divorce, and that a divorce was granted to her, and plaintiff's cross bill was dismissed for want of equity. It was not stated what the bill charged, but inasmuch as a decree was granted on it in her favor, it must be presumed to have been for a statutory cause for divorce. The issue was, whether or not the defendant alienated the love and affection of plaintiff's wife. Evidence of any one of the statutory causes for divorce would tend to prove that the love and affection of plaintiff's wife were alienated by the cause for divorce averred in the bill and found as a fact by the decree. We are of opinion that the offered evidence should have been admitted."

But the spouse who is suing, and against whom a divorce has been granted, is not estopped from contesting, in an action against a stranger, to that decree the truth of the grounds on which the decree was prayed. Luke v. Hill (1911) 137 Ga. 159, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 559, 73 S. E. 345 (alienation of affections), wherein the court said: "It is a general universal rule that estoppels must be mutual. Strangers can neither take advantage of, nor be bound by, an estoppel. . . . A decree in a matrimonial suit, fixing the status of the parties, in distinction from the specific findings therein, is to be regarded as a judgment quasi in rem. So far as the adjudication fixes the status of the parties, the judgment concludes both parties and strangers; but, beyond the adjudication of the status, the decree does not conclude strangers. . . . The adjudication of the status is conclusive upon strangers, but does not bind them upon causes of action springing from the marital relation prior to the decree. A divorce decree will not estop a party thereto from contesting with a stranger the truth of the grounds as affecting his liability in another suit upon a cause of action arising, pending the divorce suit but before the decree. . . . Beyond the legal effect of determining the status of the parties, the law applies, as in other judicial proceedings, that a judgment is not conclusive in another suit, except in cases in which the same parties or their privies are litigating in regard to the same subject of controversy. The plaintiff in error is estopped by the decree of annulment from denying his matrimonial status; but in a cause of action against strangers, arising before the decree of annulment, based on the legality of his marriage, he is not estopped by the decree from contesting with them the truth of the grounds upon which the decree was prayed."

In other jurisdictions, however, the record in the divorce proceeding is admissible only to the extent of judicially establishing the prior existence of the marriage, and its dissolution, and the status of the parties thereafter under the decree. Hostetter v. Green (1914) 159 Ky. 611, L.R.A. 1915C, 870, 167 S. W. 919 (alienation of affections); Sickler v. Mannix (1903) 68 Neb. 21, 93 N. W. 1018 (alienation of affections); Luick v. Arends (1911) 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353.

It appeared in Sickler v. Mannix (1903) 68 Neb. 21, 93 N. W. 1018, supra, an action by a wife for alienation of affections, that the husband had been granted a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The court, in refusing to admit the divorce decree in evidence, said: "Mrs. Sickler [the defendant] was not a party to that suit, and it is only where a judicial record contains an admission of one or the other of the parties to it that it is admissible as such in favor of a stranger. . . . Mrs. Mannix [the plaintiff] did not admit in her pleadings in the divorce case that she had been guilty of extreme cruelty to her husband. On the contrary, she denied and contested the charge, and the fact that the court found against her on the trial does not make such finding admissible against her in favor of a stranger, on the trial of another action."

A divorce decree was held to be admissible in Luick v. Arends (N. D.) supra (an action for alienation of affections), only for the purpose of establishing its own existence,—the marriage of the parties being admitted,—and as bearing on the admissibility of testimony relating to the statute as to privileged communications between husband and wife. The court said: "The rule is general that a judgment or decree is not admissible in evidence as res judicata on the facts involved, or to operate as an estoppel by judgment in other than actions strictly in rem, except as between parties or privies. There must be a mutuality between the parties to the action in which the decree is rendered and in the action in which it is offered, and it is only admissible in favor of a party when it would be admissible against him if the decree had been the other way. Applying this test, it is plain that the trial court's ruling in excluding the grounds upon which the decree was entered is correct. Suppose the plaintiff in this action had prevailed in the divorce suit under his claim of desertion by the wife, and in this action plaintiff had offered in evidence the decree of divorce granted him, and entered against his wife's claim of cruelty, as proof that he had not been guilty of the acts of cruelty charged in defendant's answer in this case, and had not by cruelty alienated her affections.

It is clearly apparent that such testimony would be inadmissible as against the defendant in this action; he was not a party to the divorce action, nor could he be, nor could he have privity with any party to that action for divorce. . . . Wigmore, on Evidence, § 1348, subd. 2a, recognizes the fact that apparently contrary judgments may be rendered by different courts on the same facts, as counsel contends has resulted in this action, between different parties, under this rule, by the following comment upon it: 'A judicial judgment binds only the parties to the specific litigation, and therefore the same question of fact must be investigated anew, even innumerable times, between parties not affected by prior judgments. There may, therefore, be an analogous situation in which innumerable parties will be affected by a fact common to the rights or duties of all; and this fact, in the absence of a judicial proceeding binding on all, may be from time to time differently determined by different juries and judgments in successive litigations.' "

Where, however, the record in the divorce proceedings discloses admissions by the spouse against whom the divorce was obtained, and who later became the plaintiff in an action for alienation of affections or for criminal conversation, it may be received in evidence to the extent of showing those admissions. Bergman v. Solomon (1911) 143 Ky. 581, 136 S. W. 1010, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff in the alienation action admitted the charges of cruelty made in the complaint in the divorce action, the court saying that such course tended to show that he was willing to get rid of his wife.

c. Extraterritorial effect of decree.

A divorce decree obtained by one spouse in a foreign jurisdiction under such circumstances as not to be recognized by the law of the forum has been held not to bar an action by the other spouse for criminal conversation taking place after the rendition of the decree. Berney v. Adriance (1913) 157 App. Div. 628, 142 N. Y. Supp. 748; C. v. D. (1904) 8 Ont. L. Rep. 308, appeal dismissed in (1906) 12 Ont. L. Rep. 24.

A foreign statute imposing a penalty on the guilty party to a divorce proceeding, whereby he forfeits all rights acquired by the marriage (see Iowa cases cited infra, in the following subdivision), will not be given extraterritorial force so as to bar a cause of action for alienation of affections which arose in the forum prior to the obtaining, by the other spouse in such foreign jurisdiction, of a divorce against the plaintiff in the alienation action. Luick v. Arends (1911) 21 N. D. 614, 132 N. W. 353.

But in Bledsoe v. Seaman (1908) 77 Kan. 679, 95 Pac. 576, a spouse who had obtained a divorce in a foreign jurisdiction was held to be estopped to set up the invalidity thereof in an action for criminal conversation occurring after the decree.

III. Rule in Iowa.

In Iowa a statute providing that "when a divorce is decreed, the guilty party forfeits all rights acquired by the marriage," is held to be a complete bar to the right of one spouse against whom a divorce has been granted, to recover for the alienation of the affections or for criminal conversation with the other spouse. Hamilton v. McNeill (1911) 150 Iowa, 470, 129 N. W. 480, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 604 (alienation of affections); McNamara v. McAllister (1911) 150 Iowa, 243, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436, 130 N. W. 26, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 463 (alienation of affections); Duff v. Henderson (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 475 (alienation of affections and criminal conversation), overruling Wood v. Mathews (1877) 47 Iowa, 409.

In Duff v. Henderson (1921) — Iowa, —, 183 N. W. 475, the court said: "The appellant's petition is in two counts. In one count he seeks to recover damages from appellee for alienation of the affections of appellant's wife. In a separate count of his petition, the appellant seeks to recover for damages for criminal conversation between the appellee and appellant's wife. The appellee answered the said counts of the petition by alleging that the appellant was barred and estopped under § 3181 of the Code from maintaining either of said alleged causes of action, for the reason that, after the alleged causes of action arose, the appellant's then wife obtained a divorce from the appellant. A demurrer to the allegations of the answer was overruled. Section 3181 of the Code provides: 'When a divorce is decreed the guilty party forfeits all rights acquired by the marriage.' In Hamilton v. McNeill (1911) 150 Iowa, 470, 129 N. W. 480, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 604, we held that § 3181 of the Code was a full and complete bar to the right of a husband to recover for alienation of his wife's affection, where the wife subsequently obtained a divorce from her husband. In Wood v. Mathews (1877) 47 Iowa, 409, we held, in an action for criminal conversation, where the plaintiff's wife had procured a divorce from him, that this constituted no defense to an action for damages for the injuries sustained prior to the time of procuring the divorce. Wood v. Mathews was considered by the court in Hamilton v. McNeill, and, in the majority opinion, it was said: 'We think, however, that we are not called upon at the present time to say whether the Wood Case should be overruled. As before indicated, the present action is not an action for criminal conversation. The case presented by the petition is one of simple alienation by alleged acts and arts not in themselves criminal. Such an action is essentially different in its nature from an action for criminal conversation, although both contain some elements in common.' We are squarely confronted with the proposition that we are compelled in the instant case to overrule either Hamilton v. McNeill or Wood v. Mathews. If Hamilton v. McNeill is followed, then the procuring of a divorce by the appellant's wife was a complete bar to appellant's right to recover against the appellee for alienation of his wife's affections. If Wood v. Mathews is to be followed, then the appellant is not barred, by reason of the wife procuring a divorce from him, from maintaining a cause of action against the appellee for criminal conversation with his wife. A majority of the court are of the opinion that the majority opinion in the case of Hamilton v. McNeill should be adhered to, and that the obtaining of a divorce by the appellant's wife is a complete bar to his right to maintain an action for the alienation of the affections of his wife, under the provisions of § 3181 of the Code. The argument pro and con is so fully set forth in the majority opinion, and in the dissenting opinion in said case, that it is deemed unnecessary to further discuss the proposition. The views expressed by the present Chief Justice Evans in the majority opinion in said case are in accord with the views of the majority of the court as now constituted. We now hold that the obtaining of a divorce by the appellant's wife from the appellant is a complete bar to the appellant's right to maintain a cause of action against the appellee for the alienation of his wife's affections, and it therefore follows that the demurrer of the appellant to the answer of the appellee, pleading the obtaining of such divorce as a bar to the appellant's right of action on the count charging alienation of affections, was properly overruled. The majority of the court are of the opinion that Wood v. Mathews should be overruled, and that the obtaining of a divorce is a bar to the right of a husband to maintain an action for criminal conversation. It therefore follows that the demurrer of the appellant to the answer of the appellee, pleading the obtaining of a divorce by appellant's wife as a bar to the appellant's right to maintain an action for criminal conversation, was properly overruled. The court now holds that the appellant cannot maintain an action against the appellee for either alienation of the wife's affections or for criminal conversation, and the fact that appellant's wife obtained a divorce from him subsequent to the acts complained of is a complete bar to the right of the appellant to maintain either of said causes of action. The writer of this opinion dissents from the conclusion of the majority as expressed herein. I think Hamilton v. McNeill is wrong, and should be overruled, and that the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Deemer in that case is correct. I also think that Wood v. Mathews should be followed, instead of being overruled. Mr. Justice Stevens joins in this dissent, both as to the overruling of Hamilton v. McNeill and the following of Wood v. Mathews. The majority holding to the contrary, it necessarily follows that the judgment of the district court must be affirmed."

In Hamilton v. McNeill (1911) 150 Iowa, 470, 129 N. W. 480, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 604, which was followed in the foregoing case, the court summed up its conclusions as follows: "The right of action for damages for alienation of affection is a 'right acquired by the marriage' within the meaning of § 3181 of the Code. That by the terms of this statute the 'guilty party' forfeits such right. (2) That the forfeiture declared by the statute must be recognized by the court regardless of any advantage resulting thereby to any defendant. This is so, not because of any affirmative right conferred on the defendant, but because of the absence of right in the plaintiff. And the forfeiture is properly pleadable as such by a defendant. (3) That the decree of divorce shown in this record fixed the status of the plaintiff herein as the 'guilty party' therein within the meaning of said § 3181. The question at this point is not so much whether the decree is conclusive as between plaintiff herein and third parties, and as affecting alleged affirmative rights of such third parties, but whether the decree is conclusive upon the plaintiff himself as bringing him within the operation of the statute in question. We hold it to be conclusive upon plaintiff in the latter respect, that he became thereby subject instanter to the forfeiture declared by the statute. (4) That plaintiff's plea that the divorce was obtained by his own collusion will not avail to relieve him from its conclusiveness while it remains in force."

A. S. M.

MODERN WOODMEN OF AMERICA

v.

CLARA S. ALLIN et al.

FLORENCE A. INGALLS et al., Appts.,

v.

CLARA S. ALLIN.

Illinois Supreme Court — December 22, 1921.

(301 Ill. 119, 133 N. E. 677.)

Insurance — mutual benefit — payable to wife — when person ascertained.

1. Under a mutual benefit certificate payable to the holder's wife and children, the person described as wife is to be ascertained at the time of his death, so that, if the wife living when the certificate was issued dies and the member marries again, the second wife is entitled to the benefit.

[See note on this question beginning on page 959.]

— lien for advances to keep certificate alive.

2. One of several beneficiaries in a mutual benefit certificate who pays dues from his own money to keep the certificate in force is entitled to a lien on the fund realized from the certificate for the amount so paid.

APPEAL by the defendant children from a decree of the Appellate Court, First District, reversing a decree of the Circuit Court for Cook County (Scanlan, J.) in their favor in a suit to determine conflicting claims to a benefit fund arising under a certificate issued to their deceased father. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Elliott R. Goldsmith, for appellants:

The certificate does not include the second wife.

Day v. Case, 43 Hun, 179.

The widow is not one of the "legal heirs," and is not entitled to participate in the $3,000 fund as a beneficiary.

Gauch v. St. Louis Mut. L. Ins. Co. 88 Ill. 251, 30 Am. Rep. 554; Phillips v. Carpenter, 79 Iowa, 600, 44 N. W. 898.

Payment by the widow of $320 for dues to keep the certificate in force did not entitle her to an equitable lien.

Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. Ehlman, 246 Ill. 555, 92 N. E. 962.

Messrs. Lewis F. Baker and Samuel Grossman, for appellee:

A benefit certificate in a society of this character differs from an ordinary policy of life insurance in that it speaks with reference to the conditions existing at the time of the death of the member whose life has been insured by it.

Kirkpatrick v. Modern Woodmen, 103 Ill. App. 468; Ptacek v. Pisa, 134 Ill. App. 155.

From a consideration of the object for which benefit societies are formed, which is to afford protection to the family and dependents of the members of such societies after the death of the members, a person cannot take as beneficiary unless he falls within one of the designated classes at the time of the death of the member.

Murphy v. Nowak, 223 Ill. 301, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 393, 79 N. E. 112; Tyler v. Odd Fellows Mut. Relief Asso. 145 Mass. 134, 13 N. E. 360.

When the status of a beneficiary is the main, if not the sole, inducement for the insurance, the name becomes a mere descriptive designation, and the object of the benefit is, and always remains, in the person filling the particular status.

Order of R. Conductors v. Koster, 55 Mo. App. 186.

While at law a certificate is not assignable, in equity, a beneficial interest may be transferred therein, which will be protected by a court of chancery.

Supreme Council, R. A. v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401; McGrew v. McGrew, 190 Ill. 607, 60 N. E. 861; Jarvis v. Binkley, 206 Ill. 541, 69 N. E. 582.

Farmer, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Modern Woodmen of America filed its bill of interpleader in the circuit court of Cook county to have determined conflicting claims to a benefit fund of $3,000 under a benefit certificate issued to Richard H. Allin in 1887, whereby the society agreed to pay to the wife and children of the member, at his death, $3,000. The benefit certificate read, a benefit fund not to exceed $3,000 should "be paid at his [the member's] death to wife and children." At the time the certificate was issued, in 1887, Allin was married and had four children. His wife's name was Arabella M. Allin. Twenty years afterwards, in 1907, Arabella M. died, leaving her husband and their four children surviving. Allin married again, his second wife's name being Clara S. Allin. No children were born of this marriage. Allin died in December, 1918, leaving surviving him his widow, Clara S., and the four children of his first wife, and a dispute arose as to who was entitled to the fund. No change in the name of the beneficiaries had ever been made, and the widow claimed an equal interest in the fund with the children of deceased, and also reimbursement of the amount of $320 she had paid of her own money in dues on the certificate to keep it in force. The children disputed the validity of her claim, which caused the society to file its bill of interpleader. The widow and children filed answers, setting up their claims to the fund. The society paid the money into court and was dismissed out of the suit. The issues made by the widow and children were referred to a master in chancery to take testimony and report his conclusions. The master reported recommending a decree awarding the entire fund to the children of the deceased member. The court entered a decree as recommended by the master, awarding the entire fund to the four children after deducting the costs of the litigation. The widow prosecuted an appeal to the appellate court, and that court reversed the decree of the circuit court. The appellate court held the widow was entitled to $320 dues paid by her to keep the certificate in force, and the remainder of the fund was divided in five equal shares among her and the children. That court reversed the decree and remanded the case, with directions to enter a decree accordingly. A certificate of importance was granted, and the children have prosecuted an appeal to this court.

The first and principal question involved is whether the word "wife," as employed in the benefit certificate means only the person who sustained that relation to the member when the certificate was issued, in 1887, or whether it means the person who sustained that relation at the time of his death. The benefit certificate reads that Richard H. Allin has become a member of the order, and while in good standing is entitled to participate in the benefit fund to an amount not exceeding $3,000, "which shall be paid at his death to wife and children," subject to the conditions named on the back of the certificate and the society's fundamental laws. At the time the certificate was issued the laws of the society provided they might be amended at a regular or special meeting by a two-thirds vote. The laws in force at the time of the death of Arabella M. Allin, the first wife, provided that, if a beneficiary died before the death of the member, upon a failure to designate another beneficiary the benefits "shall be payable to the other surviving beneficiaries, if any there be, or if no beneficiaries survive him, then to the wife of such member if she survive him, and in case he has no surviving wife, to his legal heirs." Subsequently, and before Allin's death, the by-laws were amended, but the provision to meet the contingency of the death of a beneficiary before the death of the member and no other beneficiary being named was not essentially changed. Allin made no change in the beneficiaries designated when the certificate was issued in 1887, when Arabella M. was his wife.

Appellants, who are the children of Richard H. Allin, contend that the words in the certificate "to be paid at his death to wife and children" mean that payment was to be made to his then wife and children upon the death of the member; that Arabella M. being then his wife, she was designated as one of the beneficiaries, and upon her death, no other beneficiary having been named in her place, the entire fund became payable to the children as surviving beneficiaries. On the other hand the appellee contends that no specific person was designated to take the fund; that the designation of beneficiaries was of classes, and as the certificate speaks at the death of the member, the beneficiaries answering the description in the certificate are entitled to the fund.

Our attention has not been called to a decision of this or a similar question by any court of last resort. A few intermediate courts of appeal have passed on the question, but their decisions are not in harmony. We are then left to decide the question from a consideration of the language of the certificate and of the object of benefit societies to afford protection to the families and dependents of members of such societies after the member's death. We know of no valid objection to a member designating beneficiaries by classes, such as children, or wife and children, as was done in this case. If, instead of designation by classes, they had been designated by their individual names, they would take by that description if living at the death of the member. Here one of the classes designated was the member's wife. The person answering that description at the time the certificate was issued died before the death of the member, and at his death another woman answered that description. One of the objects of Allin in securing the certificate was to secure a fund for the benefit of the members of his family at his death. He designated as beneficiaries classes bearing a certain relationship to him,—i. e., wife and children. He knew no payment could be made until his death, and then only to persons answering the description of the beneficiaries. His four children were born before the date of the certificate and all of them are still living. More than ten years elapsed after Allin's second marriage before his death, but no change was made by him in the designation of his beneficiaries. At the time of his death appellee answered the description of one of his beneficiaries. We think the language of the certificate must be construed to mean that when he died he wanted his wife to share in the benefits, without regard to whether she was the same person who was his wife when the certificate issued. The construction that the designation of wife meant Arabella M. Allin as much as if she had been specifically named as a beneficiary is, in our opinion, unwarranted. It was the person who at his death answered the description of the class designated that he desired to protect. We have said appellants, who are the four children of Allin, were born before the benefit certificate was issued. He designated them as beneficiaries by the description of "children." If another child or children had subsequently been born and survived the father, such child or children would certainly have been entitled to share in the fund, but, if the certificate is to be construed as appellants contend,

Insurance—mutual benefit—payable to wife
—when person ascertained.

they would not have been protected. The four children were not designated by name, but it clearly was the intention of Allin to provide a fund for the benefit of all of his children who survived him, and it does not seem reasonable to construe the certificate to protect only such as were born before it issued. The same rule of construction would apply to a beneficiary designated as "wife." The person answering that description at the death of the member, when the certificate speaks for the first time, is within its protection.

The proof shows that appellee paid out of her own funds, for dues on the certificate to keep it in force, $320. She is entitled to an equitable lien on the fund for that amount, and to be paid that amount before the remainder of the fund is distributed among the beneficiaries. Supreme Council, R. A. v. Tracy, 169 Ill. 123, 48 N. E. 401; McGrew v. McGrew, 190 Ill. 604, 60 N. E. 861.

It was no abuse of the discretion of the court to order the costs of the litigation paid out of the fund.

The judgment of the Appellate Court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied February 10, 1922.

ANNOTATION.

Right of second wife to take under policy designating "wife" or "widow" as beneficiary, issued during life of first wife.

As indicated by the title, this note does not cover cases where the beneficiary was designated by name, although a few border-line cases have been included. Neither does it consider the rights of one who never occupied the legal relation of wife to the insured.

Designation of "wife."

It is generally held that the designation of the insured's "wife" as beneficiary relates to the person occupying that relationship to him at the time of his death. Pike County Mut. Life Asso. v. Berry (1919) 214 Ill. App. 316; MODERN WOODMEN v. ALLIN (reported herewith) ante, 956; Sherry v. Locomotive Engineer's Mut. Life & Acci. Asso. (1916) 6 Ohio App. 228; Re Browne [1903] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 188, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 85, 51 Week. Rep. 364, 87 L. T. N. S. 588, 19 Times L. R. 98; Bottomley v. Ancient Order United Workmen (1913) 25 Ont. Week. Rep. 26, 5 Ont. Week. N. 83.

Thus it will be observed that in the reported case (MODERN WOODMEN v. ALLIN, ante, 956), it was decided, under a mutual benefit certificate payable at insured's death "to wife and children," that the person described as "wife" was to be ascertained at the time of his death, so that if the wife living when the certificate was issued died and the insured remarried, the second wife was entitled to the benefit.

And in Re Browne [1903] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 188, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 85, 51 Week. Rep. 364, 87 L. T. N. S. 588, 19 Times L. R. 98, where a man having a wife and children took out a policy on his life, expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife and children;" it was held that the presumption that a married man speaking of his wife intends the person who is his wife at that time, and does not contemplate one whom he may marry after her death, loses weight in construing an instrument intended to make provision for a wife after the husband's death, and is countervailed by the presumption that he, in all probability, intended to provide for her who survived him, and for that reason stood in need of the provision; and that a similar line of reasoning pointed to the conclusion that he intended to benefit all of the children, which was strengthened by the reflection that he could not reasonably be supposed to have intended to benefit only the children living at the date of the policy, to the exclusion of afterborn children by the then existing wife, and therefore that a second wife and her child were entitled to participate jointly with the children of the first marriage.

And in Pike County Mut. Life Asso. v. Berry (1919) 214 Ill. App. 316, where an unmarried man took a benefit certificate designating his "wife and children" as beneficiaries and, after being married and divorced, married a second time and died, his second wife and children were held entitled to the benefit in equal parts. The court said: "In the benefit certificate under consideration, the beneficiaries are not named, but described. At the time of its issuance they did not exist. The intended beneficiaries are described as those who at the time of the death of the insured sustain the relation to him of wife and children. If none such were living, then to his legal heirs. Who are the beneficiaries is determined at the death of the insured. De Benio v. Catholic Order of Foresters (1915) 194 Ill. App. 616; Burr v. Royal League (1914) 193 Ill. App. 238. The insured died leaving appellant Cloa Berry, his wife, Thomas R. Berry and Marjorie M. Berry, his children, who are described in the benefit certificate as beneficiaries, and are therefore entitled to the fund the same as if they had been specifically named therein."

And in Bottomley v. Ancient Order United Workmen (1913) 25 Ont. Week. Rep. 26, 5 Ont. Week. N. 83, where the policy directed the money to be paid to the insured's wife, and she died and he married again, the second wife was held entitled to the fund.

And in Sherry v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. Life & Acci. Asso. (1916) 6 Ohio App. 228, where a policy was taken payable to "Mrs. Patrick Sherry, wife," and after the death of the insured's first wife he remarried, and thereafter the first policy was taken up and two new ones issued in place thereof, but no change as to the beneficiary was made, the second wife was held entitled to the entire proceeds of the policies as against the children of the first marriage. The court said: "In determining the rights of these parties under these policies we must rely wholly and entirely upon the language used in the clause hereinbefore referred to. At the time of the death of Patrick Sherry he had but one wife living, to wit, the plaintiff in this case. At the time of the execution and delivery of the policies in question he had but one wife living, the plaintiff herein. If he had intended to make any other person than his then wife, Mary A. Sherry, the sole beneficiary of said insurance policies, he certainly would have done so. It seems to us, being governed in the distribution of the fund in question by the surroundings of the parties, taken in connection with the plain meaning of the beneficiary clause in the policies, that, in the light of all these facts, there can be but one conclusion reached, and that is that Mary A. Sherry is entitled to all of the fund, and is the sole beneficiary of the two policies in question. It is contended by counsel for defendants that at the time the policy was taken out, in 1869, being the original policy, Patrick Sherry by his choice made provision for and designated the beneficiary thereunder, and must naturally, if not necessarily, have had in mind the person who was then his wife. If this line of reasoning be the correct one, then why is it not proper to claim that at the time when the two policies here in question were issued, and the plaintiff in this case was his wife, Patrick Sherry made his choice and designated the beneficiary, and of necessity had in mind the person who was then his wife? It seems to us if we apply to the two policies in question this same reasoning that is applied by counsel for defendants to the original policy, we can arrive at but one conclusion, and that is that the plaintiff is entitled to the proceeds of the policies in question."

And in Speegle v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. (1907) 77 S. C. 517, 58 S. E. 435, where the by-laws of a benefit association provided for the payment of a certain sum to the person named in the member's certificate, and that the beneficiaries should be his "wife, children," etc., and that in case the beneficiary predeceased the member, and no new designation of a beneficiary was made, the benefit should be payable to the member's next living relation in order named, it was held that the second wife (Hattie K.) of a member who had designated "his wife, Susan," as beneficiary, was entitled to the benefit as against the children of the first wife, Susan, who had died, the court holding that the second wife was the member's next living relation, and that the children took no vested interest, since the member might, during his life, have designated a new beneficiary, which he practically did by his second marriage.

And upon like facts and provisions the same result was reached in Harris v. Harris (1906) 44 Tex. Civ. App. 152, 97 S. W. 504.

The Browne Case, supra, was distinguished in Re Griffiths [1903] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 739, 72 L. J. Ch. N. S. 380, 88 L. T. N. S. 547, where a man having a wife and children effected insurance expressed to be "for the benefit of his wife, or, if she be dead, between his children in equal proportions," upon the ground that the policy in the Browne Case was expressed to be for the benefit of wife "and" children, and not as in the case under consideration, for the benefit of wife "or" children; and it was held that the presumption that a married man speaking of his wife intends his wife at that time was strengthened by the words "if she be dead," which seems to point to the wife who was living when the policy was effected; and consequently that a subsequent wife was not entitled to take.

And in Day v. Case (1887) 43 Hun, 179, 5 N. Y. S. R. 397, the designation of the beneficiary in a certificate of benefit insurance obtained by one H. M. Case, providing that "all payments or benefits that may accrue or become due to the heirs of the persons insured, by virtue of his policy, will be payable to Mrs. H. M. Case, or lawful heirs," was held to refer to the wife of the insured at the time the certificate was issued, and not to the person who was his wife at the time of his death.

And the Day Case (N. Y.) supra, was relied upon in Re Shanley (1916) 95 Misc. 427, 160 N. Y. Supp. 733, where the policy provided for payment "to either the executor or administrator, husband or wife," and in the application the name of the beneficiary was given as "Kate Shanley, wife," and it was held that a second wife (Bertha), whom the insured married after the death of his first wife, Kate Shanley, was not entitled to the benefit. The court said: "There was no new designation of the beneficiary, after the issuance of the policy and the death of the decedent's first wife, Kate Shanley. At the time the application was made and the policy issued, the accountant was not the wife of the deceased; and while he used the term 'wife' in the application, and the application formed a part of the contract of insurance (Wachtel v. Harrison (1914) 84 Misc. 76, 145 N. Y. Supp. 982), it clearly appears, from the fact that he inserted the name of the person who was his wife when the application was made, that he intended the beneficiary to be the latter, and not the accountant, who occupied that relationship at the time of his death (Day v. Case (N. Y.) supra)."

And in Bickel v. Bickel (1904) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1945, 79 S. W. 215, where a husband obtained a life policy payable to his "wife, Caroline, and his children," and his wife died, and his second wife (Louise) was held not entitled to any part of the proceeds of the policy, the court holding that when the first wife died her interest in the policy survived to the children, and calling attention to the fact that the policy was not issued by a benevolent society, and distinguishing cases dealing with contracts of such societies from the case at bar.

Designation of "widow."

The term "widow" as used in the designation of a beneficiary, or in by-laws relating thereto, is held to refer to the person who sustains that relation upon the death of the insured. Masonic Mut. Relief Asso. v. McAuley (1882) 2 Mackey (D. C.) 70; Phelan v. Phelan (1892) 21 Ins. L. J. (La.) 93; Small v. Jose (1893) 86 Me. 120, 29 Atl. 976; Peacock v. Joyce (1920) 142 Tenn. 335, 219 S. W. 350; Given v. Wisconsin Odd Fellows' Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1888) 71 Wis. 547, 37 N. W. 817; Riley v. Riley (1890) 75 Wis. 464, 44 N. W. 112; Re Parker [1906] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 526, 75 L. J. Ch. N. S. 297, 54 Week. Rep. 329, 94 L. T. N. S. 477, 22 Times L. R. 259.

Thus in Phelan v. Phelan (1892) 21 Ins. L. J. (La.) 93, where a policy was payable to the insured's personal representative "for the benefit of his widow," and the wife who was living when the policy issued died and he remarried, his second wife, who survived him, was held his "widow," and entitled to the benefit as against the heirs of his first wife. The court said: "The widow claims the fund upon the strength of the express clause in the policy. The heirs of the first wife maintain that as the present widow, at the date of the issuance of the policy, could not have been in Phelan's contemplation as to be some day his widow, she could not have been the beneficiary he had then in view; and that as the first wife was the only one at the moment likely to become his widow, it must be held that she it was whom the insurer had in his mind at the time of taking out the policy. It is a rule of interpretation applicable to all contracts, and from which policies of insurance are not excepted, that the intentions of parties must be drawn from the words or language, oral or written, which parties have themselves employed in order to convey their meaning. It is only in case that the language itself is doubtful, that courts may go outside for light or guidance as to intention. In this case, Phelan has very clearly made this policy for the benefit of his widow; and as there is a difference between widow and wife, the courts are not at liberty to use one expression for the other. There is nothing in such a provision, in any view to be taken of it, which would demand of the courts to ignore or distort it, from motives of public policy, the law permits second marriages, and a man may consider the contingency of his marrying again, and provide in all events for the necessities of the wife, first or second, from whom he may be called away by death. So it may have been his design, not considering at all the question of second marriage, that his wife shall be beneficiary only in the event of her surviving him. In this case, interpreting this provision of the policy according to its precise and clear expression, we must hold that Phelan had in view the wife, whether by first or second marriage, who would survive him, and as in this case it happened to be the defendant, Maria Geheeb Phelan, she is entitled to the proceeds of the policy. It is contended that one must have, at the time of the taking out of the policy, an insurable interest in order that the policy shall hold. The insurance company is not contesting the paying because the beneficiary was without insurable interest at the date of the issuance of the policy, on the contrary, it is willing and anxious to pay the one adjudged entitled to receive. We know of no law which prevents a person from contracting with another, and paying that other a consideration, stipulating that a third person shall receive the advantage for which the first party contracts and pays; it is, on the contrary, well settled that one may contract for the benefit of another, and that such other may enforce the obligation. There is no earthly reason why this principle should not apply in the case of life policies; and in fact it does apply in same. Hence in Hearing's Succession (1874) 26 La. Ann. 327, the supreme court of this state declares: 'A man may take out a policy of insurance on his life in the name of anyone, or having taken it out in his name, he may, with the consent of the assurers, transfer it to whom he pleases.' It would not make a particle of difference in any other contract that the third party, beneficiary, was not determined at the date of execution of the contract, but was expected to be in existence or be known by the time fixed for final execution. A might lend money to B, secured by mortgage, payable in one or more years to the one, if any, who at that time would be his, A's, wife. If at the time of date for payment, A was married, the wife could collect; if not, then A would receive the payment. In a contract of this nature, there is no reason why a man insuring his own life, and having, as all recognize, an insurable interest, may not pay the insurer the premium demanded, and stipulate that some person, not yet determined, by chance or circumstances, shall be the beneficiary. There is nothing here against public policy, and where law or public policy does not forbid, men may contract entirely as they will. As a fact the very contrary is the case; for it is eminently in accord with the dictates of public policy that a man should provide in this way for the needs of one who may at some future date be dependent or have claims on him."

And in Re Parker (Eng.) supra, it was held that the word "widow" as used in a policy designating as the beneficiaries the "widow, or widow and children, or some one or more of them" as the insured should appoint, did not refer to the then wife of the insured, should she survive him, but to the person who at his death should become his widow.

And in Riley v. Riley (1890) 75 Wis. 464, 44 N. W. 112, it was held that the word "widow" in the by-laws of a mutual benefit association, by which it was provided that the business and object of the association should be to afford financial aid and benefit to the widows, orphans, and heirs of deceased members, or such other persons as might be designated by the insured member, and that at the death of a member his widow or designated heirs should receive the specified sum,—does not refer to the wife of the member at the time he obtained his certificate of insurance, if she survived him, but means the person who was his widow at the time of his death. The court said: "In this case

Riley made no change as to the beneficiary named in the certificate, but died leaving the money to go according to the terms of the by-laws. The by-laws clearly gave it to the widow. It is so expressly stated, but the counsel for the appellants contends that the word "widow" in the by-laws was intended to refer to, and does actually mean, the first wife, if she survived her husband, where no other person as beneficiary was designated. We can perceive no valid reason for giving such a construction to the by-laws. Undeniably the plaintiff is Riley's widow, and it is the widow who is to have the avails of the policy, where the insured has given no other direction as to the person to whom it is to be paid. The declared object of the association is to afford financial aid to the widows and orphans; and the second wife, having lost her husband, may be, quite likely would be, as meritorious a person for assistance as the first wife, left a widow. Suppose the husband had survived both wives, having no children by the first wife, but leaving children by the second. Could it be claimed with any reason that these children would not be entitled to the insurance money? It might be argued with as much consistency that it was not intended the insurance should be paid to them, as it is now insisted that it should not be paid to the widow by a second marriage. Such a refinement upon language is not to be indulged in in the construction of these policies, which are usually drawn up by business men who use language in its common meaning. The by-laws certainly designate the widow as the person who is to have the benefit of the insurance, where no other direction is made by the insured, and the term certainly includes the widow by a second marriage. It is said that it is hardly to be conceived that the husband, having the power of changing the beneficiary, did not exercise that power and change the beneficiary named in the certificate. But we must presume that he was familiar with the rules and by-laws of the association, and knew that, according to them, the insurance would go to his widow, and that this was what he desired. The inference is that he wished to make no other disposition of the fund, but that his widow should take it. This is the legitimate inference from his neglect to make a change as to the beneficiary."

And in Small v. Jose (1893) 86 Me. 120, 29 Atl. 976, where the insured's wife, who was living when a policy issued payable "for the benefit of his widow, if any, and his then surviving children," the right of a second wife, who survived the insured, to some share, was not seriously contested, the question at issue being whether a daughter of a deceased child of the insured was entitled to a part of the amount of the policy.

And in Masonic Mut. Relief Asso. v. McAuley (1882) 2 Mackey (D. C.) 70, where the person who was the widow of a member of a benefit association, the by-laws of which provided that on the death of the member "his widow, orphan, heir, assignees, or legatee, shall be entitled to receive as many dollars as there are members in the association at the time of death," was held entitled to the benefit as against the administrators of the first wife, who was designated by name as the original beneficiary, and the husband's estate. The court construed the designation of the first wife to mean that she should receive the benefit only if she survived her husband, and held that the classes named in the by-laws should take in the order in which they appeared, beginning with the member's widow.

And in Peacock v. Joyce (1920) 142 Tenn. 335, 219 S. W. 350, where the by-laws of a benefit association, which were incorporated in the certificate, provided that if the beneficiary should die prior to the death of the member, and he failed to have another beneficiary named, the amount should be paid to "the widow," it was held that the member's second wife, whom he married after the death of his first, who was designated by name as beneficiary, was entitled to the benefit as against the children by his first wife, since, under the express terms of the certificate, the member's widow was entitled to take.

And in Given v. Wisconsin Odd Fellows Mut. L. Ins. Co. (1888) 71 Wis. 547, 37 N. W. 817, it was held that insurance in a mutual benefit association the by-laws of which provided that on the death of a member "the person designated before death, or his widow, child, or children, mother, sister, or sisters," etc., "as the case may be and in the order named," should receive the insurance, was payable to the widow of the insured, although when the certificate was issued, in the lifetime of a former wife, the insured had directed that the insurance be paid to her, her appointment as beneficiary being held to have been revoked by her death and the benefit being payable by the by-law to his widow.

J. T. W.

G. W. HANSON, Appt.,

v,

LEMARS MUTUAL INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

Iowa Supreme Court — February 14, 1922.

(— Iowa, —, 186 N. W. 468.)

Insurance — fire — injury from smoke and soot.

A policy of fire insurance on household goods does not cover loss due to their injury by smoke and soot from the flame of an oil stove turned too high.

[See note on this question beginning on page 967.]

(— Iowa, —, 186 N. W. 468.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Sioux County (Hutchinson, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a fire insurance policy. Affirmed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

Action upon a policy of fire insurance to recover thereunder damages caused by smoke and soot. At the close of plaintiff's evidence there was a directed verdict for the defendant. The plaintiff appeals.

Mr. Clarence A. Plank, for appellant:

There was a fire within the meaning of the policy, and defendant is liable for the loss sustained by plaintiff.

Way v. Abington Mut. F. Ins. Co. 166 Mass. 67, 32 L.R.A. 608, 55 Am. St. Rep. 379, 43 N. E. 1032; Balestracci v. Firemen's Ins. Co. 34 La. Ann. 844; O'Connor v. Queen Ins. Co. 140 Wis. 388, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 122 N. W. 1038, 1122, 17 Ann. Cas. 1118; White v. Republic F. Ins. Co. 57 Me. 91, 2 Am. Rep. 22; John Davis & Co. v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 115 Mich. 382, 73 N. W. 393; Russell v. German F. Ins. Co. 100 Minn. 528, 10 L.R.A. (N.S.) 326, 111 N. W. 400; Collins v. Delaware Ins. Co. 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 576; American Towing Co. v. German F. Ins. Co. 74 Md. 25, 21 Atl. 553.

Messrs. J. T. Keenan and Van Oosterhout & Kelyn, for appellee:

The policy did not cover loss for injury to plaintiff's goods by smoke and soot.

Collins v. Delaware Insurance Co. 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 576; Fitzgerald v. German American Ins. Co. 30 Misc. 72, 62 N. Y. Supp. 824; Samuels v. Continental Ins. Co. 2 Pa. Dist. R. 397.

The court did not err in directing the jury to return a verdict for the defendant.

Meyer v. Houck, 85 Iowa, 319, 52 N. W. 235; Hurd v. Neilson, 100 Iowa, 555, 69 N. W. 867.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was a holder of an insurance policy of the defendant company which covered his household goods. He averred in his petition that he suffered a loss from fire to such household goods to the amount of $428, in that damages had been caused to his household goods by smoke and soot which escaped from his oil stove and filled his house to such an extent as to cause the damage complained of. The story of the fire in brief is that plaintiff arose at 5 o'clock in the morning and lit the burners of his oil stove in the kitchen for the purpose of heating a boiler full of water which had been set thereon the night before. The ultimate purpose was to heat the water for use in the family washing to be done that morning. Having lit the burners with a match, the plaintiff went back to bed and fell asleep. One hour later he was awakened by the smoke and soot which filled his house. He immediately repaired to the kitchen and found that the flames from his burners extended nearly to the top of the boiler, and were emitting in great quantities the smoke and soot complained of. He removed the cause of the smoke and soot by turning out the wicks in the burners. He testified, "I went over there and turned them out." The following statement by the trial court is a fair summary of the record: "There was no fire except that under the boiler, as he tells it. The only thing that was necessary to extinguish the fire was to turn down the burner. The burner was turned down, and the fire under the stove went out; smoke disappeared. There is no evidence here that there was any leak, that there was any fire in the pan, or that that tank had ignited. The only evidence here is that the burner that was started was turned up too high, or became overloaded, which caused more fire and flame than was reasonably and necessarily intended when it was lighted. It is a matter of common knowledge with those who use the oil stoves that they will smoke if they are not particularly watched and cared for, and I cannot see any theory upon which the plaintiff can recover in this case. There was no leaking oil; no ignition of the tank; nothing necessary to put it out but to turn down the burner, and it went out."

Nothing is claimed for any damage done by flame or heat except as the same produced the smoke and soot. The defendant denied all liability for the loss on the ground that there was no fire within the contemplation of the policy. It is not essential to the plaintiff's right of recovery that he should show that he had suffered loss by the actual burning of any part of his property, but it is essential that it should appear that the smoke and soot from which he suffered resulted from a "hostile" fire rather than from a "friendly" one. Ordinarily a fire in a stove or furnace and subject to control in such place is a "friendly" fire, and damage for smoke and soot therefrom is not within the contemplation of an insurance policy. The rule in such cases is stated in Wood on Insurance, § 103, as follows: "Where fire is employed as an agent, either for the ordinary purposes of heating the building, for the purposes of manufacture, or as an instrument of art, the insurer is not liable for the consequences thereof, so long as the fire itself is confined within the limit of the agencies employed, as from the effects of smoke or heat evolved thereby or escaping therefrom from any cause, whether intentional or accidental. In order to bring such consequences within the risk, there must be actual ignition outside of the agencies employed, not purposely caused by the assured, and these, as a consequence of such ignition, de hors the agencies."

In Cannon v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 110 Ga. 563, 78 Am. St. Rep. 124, 35 S. E. 775, it is stated as follows: "It does not appear from the proofs of loss that there was any fire in or about the building, except in the stove where it was intended to be built. This fire did not spread from where it was built and intended to remain. It was, therefore, all the time during the alleged injury and damage to the goods, what is termed in the books a 'friendly,' and not a 'hostile,' fire. It is true there is sound authority for the proposition that an insured can recover loss occasioned by smoke, soot, etc., thrown out by a fire; but we think in these cases it will be found that such matter causing injury was the product of a hostile fire. If a fire should break out from where it was intended to be and become a hostile element by igniting property, although it might not actually burn the property insured, yet if it caused injury thereto by smoke or heat, or other direct means, damages would be recoverable."

The plaintiff relies upon the Wisconsin case of O'Connor v. Queen Ins. Co. 140 Wis. 388, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 122 N. W. 1038, 17 Ann. Cas. 1118, wherein recovery was allowed. The fire in that case was described by the court as follows: "The heat was so intense as to char and injure furniture, and the great volumes of smoke and soot greatly injured the furnishings and personal property of the plaintiff. It does not appear from the evidence that there was any ignition outside of the furnace, although the fire was so intense as to overheat the chimney and flues, and char furniture in the rooms. The evidence shows that the chimney was so hot it seemed as though it was on fire, that the fire was burning fiercely in the furnace, around the mopboards was burned, and the mopboards blistered, the wall paper charred and burned, and the chimney cracked from the excessive heat. . . . The fire was extraordinary and unusual, unsuitable for the purpose intended, and in a measure uncontrollable, besides being inherently dangerous because of the unsuitable material used."

Reliance is also had upon the case of Collins v. Delaware Ins. Co. 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 576. The fire was described by the court as follows: "The plaintiff's goods were not burned, but were damaged by smoke and soot; but it is well settled that a policy against 'direct loss or damage by fire' may cover loss other than by actual burning, such as by water used to extinguish the fire, and by smoke from the fire. If, however, the fire itself be not insured against, as it ordinarily is not when it is kept within the place that is fitted and intended for it, there is no liability for such consequences as the escaping of smoke or gas. We cannot do better than to adopt the illustrations used in a well-considered Massachusetts case. If a stove should be cracked and spoiled by a fire kindled in it to warm the house, or if a fire in a fireplace should crack the mantel, or scorch valuable furniture left too near it, or injure property by its smoke which the chimney failed to carry off, or if a lamp should throw off soot or smoke in such quantities as to cause damage to property, in every such case, it may be conceded, if the fire burned nothing but that which was intended to be burned for a useful purpose in connection with the occupation of the house, and if it did not pass beyond the limits assigned to it, the insurance company would not be liable."

It appears also in that case that the fire had melted off a cap of the container and was burning from the inside thereof.

From the foregoing it will be seen that close questions may arise over the dividing line between a "hostile" and a "friendly" fire. In the case before us we think it cannot be said that the evidence was sufficient to justify a finding of a "hostile" fire within the contemplation of ~~Insurance—fire—injury~~ the policy. It was ~~from smoke and soot.~~ manifestly a case where the wick had been turned too high, from which cause smoke and soot were inevitable from the beginning, and which was at all times subject to control by merely turning back the wick. The only burning or charring of any kind done by the flame was upon the wick. So far as appears, all the smoke and soot came from the wick.

We feel compelled to hold, therefore, that the trial court properly sustained the motion for a directed verdict.

Affirmed.

Stevens, Ch. J., and Arthur and Faville, JJ., concur.

ANNOTATION.

Loss by heat, smoke, or soot without external ignition as within fire insurance policy.

For liability of property insurer as affected by explosion (including the question of what constitutes a fire preceding an explosion), see annotation in 13 A.L.R. 883.

Of some interest, perhaps, by way of analogy, is the annotation in 1 A.L.R. 1163, on "Burning as element of offense of arson."

Where premises are insured against loss by fire, and fire is employed on the premises for economic or scientific purposes, and it is confined to the agencies intended, and damage ensues from smoke, soot, excessive heat, etc., without any actual ignition of the insured property, the loss is generally held not to be within the protection of the policy, which extends only to

"hostile" fires, and does not include so-called "friendly" fires.

Georgia. — Cannon v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (1900) 110 Ga. 563, 78 Am. St. Rep. 124, 35 S. E. 775.

Iowa. — HANSON v. LEMARS MUT. INS. ASSO. (reported herewith) ante, 964.

Kansas. — McGraw v. Home Ins. Co. (1914) 93 Kan. 482, 144 Pac. 821, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 227.

Maryland. — American Towing Co. v. German F. Ins. Co. (1891) 74 Md. 25, 21 Atl. 553.

New York. — Fitzgerald v. German American Ins. Co. (1899) 30 Misc. 72, 62 N. Y. Supp. 824.

Pennsylvania. — Samuels v. Continental Ins. Co. (1892) 2 Pa. Dist. R. 397.

England.—Austin v. Drewe (1816) 6 Taunt. 436, 128 Eng. Reprint, 1104, 2 Marsh. 130, Holt, 126, 16 Revised Rep. 647, 4 Campb. 360.

It will be observed that in the reported case (HANSON v. LEMARS MUT. INS. ASSO. ante, 964) a policy insuring against loss by fire is held not to cover injury or damage to household goods by smoke and soot from the flame of an oil stove turned too high. The court states that it is not essential to a recovery that a loss has been suffered by the actual burning of any part of insured's property, but that it must appear that the smoke and soot resulted from a "hostile" fire, rather than from a "friendly" one.

The earliest case upon the question appears to be Austin v. Drewe (Eng.) supra, in which it was held that no recovery could be had under a policy insuring against damage by fire to stock and utensils in a sugar house, where sugar was damaged by the heat and smoke from the usual fires, which got into the room by reason of the mismanagement of a register at the top of the chimney.

And in Fitzgerald v. German American Ins. Co. (1899) 30 Misc. 72, 62 N. Y. Supp. 824, where the court followed Austin v. Drewe (Eng.) supra, it was held under a policy insuring against loss or damage by fire, that there could be no recovery for damage to the insured property resulting from smoke emitted by a lighted lamp which did not cause any fire exterior to itself.

And in Samuels v. Continental Ins. Co. (Pa.) supra, the court, without rendering an opinion, denied recovery under a policy insuring against all direct loss or damage by fire, for damage caused by the smoke and soot of a lamp, the flame of which, from some unknown cause, flared up to a height of 2 or 3 feet above the chimney.

And in Cannon v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (Ga.) supra, under a policy insuring "against all direct loss or damage by fire," it was held that the insured was not liable for damage to the insured property caused by smoke and soot escaping through a defective or disarranged stovepipe, from a fire intentionally built in the stove and kept therein; or for damage caused by the water used in cooling a portion of the ceiling heated by such pipe, if there was no actual ignition by the heat, and it did not appear that the use of the water was necessary to prevent ignition. The court said: "It was, therefore, all the time during the alleged injury and damage to the goods, what is termed in the books a "friendly," and not a "hostile" fire. It is true there is sound authority for the proposition that an insured can recover loss occasioned by smoke, soot, etc., thrown out by a fire; but we think, in these cases, it will be found that such matter causing injury was the product of a hostile fire. If a fire should break out from where it was intended to be, and become a hostile element by igniting property, although it might not actually burn the property insured, yet if it caused injury thereto by smoke or heat, or other direct means, damages would be recoverable. But this is not this case."

And in Gibbons v. German Ins. & Sav. Inst. (1888) 30 Ill. App. 263, a fire insurance policy was held not to cover damage from steam escaping from the heating apparatus, which produced such a degree of heat that the furniture and books were charred. The court referred to Austin v. Drewe (Eng.) supra, as sustaining their conclusion, and said: "In each case there was excessive heat, but no fire where it ought not to have been. Fire and heat are not one, but cause and effect; and damage by heat is not insured against in terms, and is covered by the policy only where the misplaced fire causes it. If the fire were a moral agent, no blame could be imputed to it. It was doing its duty, and no more. The damage was caused by another agent who, undertaking to transmit the beneficial influence of the fire, broke down in the task."

And in American Towing Co. v. German F. Ins. Co. (Md.) supra, recovery was denied under a policy insuring a tug, including the boiler, against loss by fire, for damage to the interior of the boiler caused by its being overheated, when empty, by the furnace fires, and not by a fire outside the furnace. The court said: "The burning or warping the bars of the grate in the furnace, though produced by the action of fire, could hardly be supposed to be within the scope of the risk insured against, however general the terms of the policy. And if that be true of the furnace, it is difficult to perceive why it is not equally true of such parts of the boiler as are brought in contact with the fire in the furnace, or the heat evolved therefrom. The fire, while in the furnace, was in its proper place, and where it was intended to be; and it was placed there to act upon the boiler, which, in course of time, would be burned out or warped, as the grate in the furnace would be, by the continued action of fire thereon. And if such results of the action of fire upon these materials, while in ordinary use, are not within the risk, it would be difficult to say upon what degree of heat or under what conditions the liability under the policy would attach for injury caused by the action of fire while confined to the furnace, and producing no external ignition. If a person has his house insured against all loss or damage by fire, and he should make a fire in his grate or fireplace, of such intense heat as to crack his chimney, or to warp or crack his mantelpieces, it could hardly be contended that he could hold the insurance company liable for such damage, though the damage was unintentionally allowed to be produced by the action of fire. In such case the fire would not have extended beyond the proper limits within which it was intended to burn; but the heat emitted therefrom would have produced effects not intended by the insured."

And in McGraw v. Home Ins. Co. (1914) 93 Kan. 482, 144 Pac. 821, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 227, there was held to be no liability under a fire insurance policy for damage to a boiler, due to a want of care or skill on the part of the person in charge of it, or to interference with its management by some other employee, as such a fire would be a "friendly," rather than a "hostile," one; but it was held that if someone who desired to injure the plaintiff's property gained unlawful entrance to the building, and drained the water from the boiler and lighted a fire under it, which the person extinguished after damaging the boiler, and withdrew, without leaving any trace, the fire would be regarded as a "hostile" one, such as would render the insurer liable.

And in Western Woolen Mill Co. v. Northern Assur. Co. (1905) 72 C. C. A. 1, 139 Fed. 637, certiorari denied in (1905) 199 U. S. 608, 50 L. ed. 331, 26 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750, recovery was denied on a policy insuring against loss by fire for damage to wool, caused by spontaneous combustion with smoke and great heat, while the wool was submerged in water for several days during a flood. The court said: "That the wool, submerged for the time mentioned, became smoking hot, may be conceded; that spontaneous combustion, caused by the wool being submerged in water, existed, may also be conceded; and still the plaintiff has not shown any direct loss by 'fire' as that word is used and known to the public generally. Fire is always caused by combustion, but combustion does not always cause fire. The word 'spontaneous' refers to the origin of the combustion. It means the internal development of heat without the action of an external agent. Combustion, or spontaneous combustion, may become so rapid as to produce fire; but, until it does so, combustion cannot be said to be fire. 'Fire' is defined in the Century Dictionary as 'the visible heat or light evolved by the action of a high temperature on certain bodies, which are in consequence styled "inflammable or combustible."' In Webster's Dictionary 'fire' is defined as 'the evolution of light and heat in the combustion of bodies.' No definition of fire can be found that does not include the idea of visible heat or light, and this is also the popular meaning given to the word. The slow decomposition of animal and vegetable matter in the air is caused by combustion. Combustion keeps up the animal heat of the body. It causes the wheat to heat in the bin and in the stack. It causes hay in the stack and in the mow of the barn to heat and decompose. It causes the sound tree of the forest, when thrown to the ground, in the course of years, to decay and molder away, until it becomes again a part of mother earth. Still we never speak of these processes as 'fire.' And why? Because the process of oxidation is so slow that it does not, in the language of the witness at the trial, produce a 'flame or glow.' It appears, without contradiction, from the evidence, that there was not at any time any visible heat or light in or about this wool."

And in Babcock v. Montgomery County Mut. Ins. Co. (1849) 6 Barb. (N. Y.) 637, a policy insuring against loss by fire was held not to cover damage to the insured house from lightning where there was no ignition or burning. The court said: "Unless, therefore, there be actual ignition, and the loss be the effect of such ignition, the insurers are not liable. Not that the identical property to which the damage occurred should be consumed, or even ignited, but there must be a fire or burning which is the proximate cause of the loss. It is immaterial how intense the heat may be; unless it be the effect of ignition, it is not within the terms of the policy. The heat of the sun often contracts timber, from which losses occur; but they would not be considered losses by fire."

And to the same effect is Kenniston v. Merrimack County Mut. Ins. Co. (1843) 14 N. H. 341, 40 Am. Dec. 193.

And in Sleet v. Farmers' Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1908) — Ky. —, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 421, 113 S. W. 515, it was held that there could be no recovery under a policy insuring against loss by fire, for the loss of a barn by being knocked down by lightning, but not burned.

But in O'Connor v. Queen Ins. Co. (1909) 140 Wis. 388, 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 501, 133 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 122 N. W. 1038, 17 Ann. Cas. 1118, a policy insuring against all direct loss and damage by fire included loss by smoke, soot, and excessive heat due to a fire kindled, with unusually inflammable materials, in the furnace designed to heat the building, although the fire did not escape from the furnace and was not communicated to the property injured. The court said: "The plaintiff lived in a rented house heated by a furnace. His servant built a fire in the furnace of material not for use therein, or intended so to be used, and of such a highly inflammable character as to cause intense heat and great volumes of smoke to escape through the registers leading into the rooms, and greatly damaged plaintiff's property. The heat was so intense as to char and injure furniture, and the great volumes of smoke and soot greatly injured the furnishings and personal property of the plaintiff. It does not appear from the evidence that there was any ignition outside of the furnace, although the fire was so intense as to overheat the chimney and flues, and char furniture in the rooms. The evidence shows that the chimney was so hot it seemed as though it was on fire, that the fire was burning fiercely in the furnace, around the mopboards was burned, and the mopboards blistered, the wall paper charred and burned, and the chimney cracked from the excessive heat. It is the contention of appellant that the damage occasioned by heat, smoke, and soot is not covered by the policy, where the fire is confined within the furnace. This position involves the construction of the words of the policy 'direct loss or damage by fire,' and leads to a consideration of what fires are within the contemplation of the policy. No limitation is placed upon the word 'fire' by the language of the policy itself, but it is said that 'contracts of insurance are to be construed according to the sense and meaning of the terms which the parties have used; and, if they are clear and unambiguous, the terms are to be taken and understood in their plain, ordinary, and proper sense.' No doubt this is the general rule, but it must also be remembered, in applying the rule, that this and other courts have construed contracts of insurance favorably to the insured. Karow v. Continental Ins. Co. (1883) 57 Wis. 56, 46 Am. Rep. 17, 15 N. W. 27; Brady v. Northwestern Ins. Co. (1863) 11 Mich. 425; May, Ins. 3d ed. 402; Peters v. Warren Ins. Co. (1840) 14 Pet. (U. S.) 99, 10 L. ed. 371. Appellant insists that a fire confined within the limits of a furnace, although producing damage by smoke and heat, is not a fire within the meaning of the policy in question, and relies mainly upon the case of Austin v. Drewe (1816) 4 Campb. 361, 6 Taunt. 436, 128 Eng. Reprint, 1104, 2 Marsh. 130, Holt, 126, 16 Revised Rep. 647. In that case the plaintiff was the owner of a sugar factory several stories high, with pans on the ground floor for boiling sugar, and a stove for heating. A flue extended to the top of the building, with registers on each floor connecting with the flue to introduce heat. Because of the negligence of a servant in not opening a register at the top of the flue, or chimney, used to shut in the heat during the night, the smoke, sparks, and heat from the stove were intercepted, and, instead of escaping through the top of the flue, were forced into the rooms, in consequence of which the sugar was damaged. The flames were confined within the stove and flue, and no actual ignition took place outside thereof, and it was held that the loss was not covered by the policy. The lord chief justice said that there was no more fire than always existed when the manufacture was going on, and which continued to burn without any excess. The case seems to turn upon the point that the fire was the usual and ordinary fire, never excessive, and always confined within its proper limits. We shall briefly refer to other cases cited by appellant on this point." After examining the cases, the court concluded: "The foregoing cases, we think, fully show that Austin v. Drewe is not authority against plaintiff here. There the fire was under control, not excessive, and suitable and proper for the purpose intended. It was, in the language of the books, a 'friendly,' and not a 'hostile,' fire. In the case before us the fire was extraordinary and unusual, unsuitable for the purpose intended, and in a measure uncontrollable, besides being inherently dangerous because of the unsuitable material used. Such a fire was, we think, a 'hostile' fire, and within the contemplation of the policy. Ordinarily, the question in such cases is for the jury. New York & B. Despatch Exp. Co. v. Traders' & M. Ins. Co. (1882) 132 Mass. 377, 42 Am. Rep. 440, s. c. on subsequent appeal (1883) 135 Mass. 221; Richards, Ins. § 221. But in this case, the evidence being practically undisputed, we think no error was committed in directing a verdict for the plaintiff."

And in Way v. Abington Mut. F. Ins. Co. (1896) 166 Miss. 67, 32 L.R.A. 608, 55 Am. St. Rep. 379, 43 N. E. 1032, it was held that damage to insured property by smoke arising from the burning of soot in a chimney, accidentally ignited by the burning of waste paper in a stove, was covered by a policy insuring against all loss or damage by fire, especially where there was an accidental obstruction of the flue contributing to the damage. In reply to the contention of the defendant (who relied upon Austin v. Drewe (Eng.) supra) that the policy was not intended to apply to a fire which was lighted and maintained for ordinary purposes for which fires are used in buildings, and which was confined within the place fitted for such fires, the court stated that, while it was not disposed to question the soundness of the general principle upon which the contention was founded, it deemed it by no means easy to determine whether the principle should be extended far enough to cover an occasional fire in a chimney, incidental to the ordinary use of a stove, or whether such a fire be held to be one for whose unexpected injurious consequences an insurance company should be liable, and further said: "We are inclined to the opinion that a distinction should be made between a fire intentionally lighted and maintained for a useful purpose in connection with the occupation of a building, and fire which starts from such a fire, without human agency, in a place where fires are never lighted or maintained, although such ignition may naturally be expected to occur occasionally as an incident to the maintenance of necessary fires, and although the place where it occurs is constructed with a view to prevent damage from such ignition. A fire in a chimney should be considered rather a hostile fire than a friendly fire, and as such, if it causes damage, it is within the provisions of ordinary contracts of fire insurance."

The Way Case was referred to with approval in Collins v. Delaware Ins. Co. (1899) 9 Pa. Super. Ct. 576, in which a recovery was upheld for damage to the insured property caused by heavy smoke and soot from an oil stove used for heating, due to the oil therein catching fire. Here the trial court left to the jury to determine whether the smoke and soot which caused the damage proceeded from fire outside the place where, under the contract of insurance, it was intended to burn, and it would appear that the jury found that the fire was out of its proper place. Whether or not the insurance company would have been liable had it been in its proper place, the court did not say.

And a recovery may be had under a policy insuring against loss happening by fire, for damage resulting from heat from an adjoining burning house, although there was no actual ignition of the property insured. Case v. Hartford F. Ins. Co. (1852) 13 Ill. 676. The court here distinguished Austin v. Drewe (Eng.) supra, on the ground that the damage there resulted from a fire in the stove and flue, and which was confined within its proper limits.

In New Orleans R. & Light Co. v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. (1919) 145 La. 82, 81 So. 764, where a recovery was sought upon a fire insurance policy, for damage to an electrical generator, the insurer conceded that it was liable for such damage as might have resulted from fire, even though it might have been ignited by an electrical current, but contended that a large part of the damage resulted from a short circuit which produced a high-powered current, accompanied by extreme heat, and this contention was held to be sustained by the evidence, and a recovery for such damage was denied.

J. T. W.

AUGUSTUS S. PEABODY

v.

ANDREW RUSSEL, Auditor of Public Accounts, et al., Appts.

Illinois Supreme Court — February 22, 1922.

(302 Ill. 111, 134 N. E. 150.)

Appropriation — of reserve funds — validity.

1. An appropriation of a specified sum for reserve to be apportioned between certain departments of government as emergencies arise, by the director of finance with approval of the governor, is not valid under a constitutional provision that bills making appropriations of money out of the treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made, and appropriate to them respectively their several amounts in distinct items and sections.

[See note on this question beginning on page 981.]

Constitutional law — effect of legislative construction.

2. Legislative construction of a constitutional provision is of no weight when there is no doubt as to its proper construction.

[See 6 R. C. L. 63; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 13.]

(Cartwright, J., and Stone, Ch. J., dissent.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Circuit Court for Sangamon County (Smith, J.) in favor of complainant in an action brought to enjoin defendants from granting, issuing, or signing any warrants pursuant to an appropriation to the Department of Finance of a reserve fund. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Edward J. Brundage, Attorney General, and Clarence N. Boord for appellants.

Mr. Walter F. Dodd, for appellee:

The requirement of a specified object and purpose makes necessary the establishment of definite limits within which the money is to be used.

People ex rel. State Bd. v. Brady, 277 Ill. 124, 115 N. E. 204; People ex rel. Hopkins v. Kings County, 52 N. Y. 556; State ex rel. Broadwater v. Siebert, 99 Mo. 122, 12 S. W. 348; Menefee v. Askew, 25 Okla. 623, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 537, 107 Pac. 159; Dickinson v. Clibourn, 125 Ark. 101, 187 S. W. 909; State ex rel. Norfolk Beet-Sugar Co. v. Moore, 50 Neb. 88, 61 Am. St. Rep. 538, 69 N. W. 373; Martens v. Brady, 264 Ill. 178, 106 N. E. 266; Mitchell v. Lowden, 288 Ill. 327, 123 N. E. 566; Fergus v. Russel, 270 Ill. 304, 110 N. E. 130.

The appropriation here is not a distinct item for a specified object and purpose, but a total to be allotted into items for purposes to be determined in the future.

Martens v. Brady, 264 Ill. 178, 106 N. E. 266; Mitchell v. Lowden, 288 Ill. 327, 123 N. E. 566.

An allotment to an office from the reserve fund destroys the definite amounts appropriated to that office by legislative action.

People ex rel. Breckon v. Election Comrs. 221 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 321, 5 Ann. Cas. 562; People v. Kane, 288 Ill. 235, 123 N. E. 265.

There is no legislative construction in favor of this appropriation except that involved in the creation of the "reserve" fund itself.

Phoebe v. Jay, Beecher's Breese (Ill.) 268; Burke v. Snively, 208 Ill. 328, 70 N. E. 327.

Mr. Werner W. Schroeder, amicus curiæ:

There is nothing in the Constitution to indicate the minuteness to which the items must be reduced. An item is valid even though the legislature could actually have split it into a great many more parts and could have detailed the objects far more minutely.

Mitchell v. Lowden, 288 Ill. 327, 123 N. E. 566; Martens v. Brady, 264 Ill. 178, 106 N. E. 266.

The making of an appropriation such as the one in question is a practical necessity, because emergencies do arise in the conduct of government, which cannot be foreseen, and which require immediate action.

People ex rel. Holmquist v. Illinois C. R. Co. 237 Ill. 324, 86 N. E. 724; People ex rel. Moneyham v. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. 247 Ill. 360, 93 N. E. 405; People ex rel. Williamson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 253 Ill. 100, 97 N. E. 245.

Legislative construction placed upon a doubtful constitutional provision is entitled to great weight and consideration, and where an act has been recognized, sanctioned, and acquiesced in by the different departments of the government and the people for many years, such practical construction raises a strong presumption of its correctness.

People ex rel. Sadler v. Olson, 245 Ill. 288, 92 N. E. 157; Nye v. Foreman, 215 Ill. 285, 74 N. E. 140; Boehm v. Hertz, 182 Ill. 154, 48 L.R.A. 575, 54 N. E. 973; People ex rel. Neil v. Knopf, 171 Ill. 191, 49 N. E. 424.

Carter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was commenced by the presentation of a petition in the circuit court of Sangamon county for leave to file a bill for injunction in accordance with the provisions of §§ 16 to 22 of chapter 102 (Hurd's Stat. 1919, pp. 2055-2056). That court granted such leave, and this bill was thereafter filed. The defendants, who are appellants here, filed a general demurrer, which was overruled, and, they having elected to abide by the demurrer, the court entered a decree for injunction as prayed in the bill, and from that decree the case has been brought by appeal to this court.

Appellee, Peabody, alleged in his bill that he is a resident, citizen, and taxpayer of Cook county, having filed the bill for injunction in his own behalf and on behalf of all taxpayers who may desire to join therein. He alleged that the fifty-second general assembly, at its regular session in 1921, passed an act entitled "An Act to Provide for the Ordinary and Contingent Expenses of the State Government until the Expiration of the First Fiscal Quarter after the Adjournment of the Next Regular Session of the General Assembly," and that said act, except certain items vetoed by the governor, was duly approved June 30 and went into effect July 1, 1921. Laws 1921, p. 83. The bill further alleges that by the terms of that act an appropriation was made in the following language:

(25) To the Department of Finance:

For reserve.....$500,000.

To be apportioned between the executive, judicial and military departments of the state government and allotted as emergencies arise by the director of finance with the approval in writing of the governor.

The bill sets forth that § 16 of article 5 of the Illinois Constitution provides that "bills making appropriations of money out of the treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made, and appropriate to them respectively their several amounts in distinct items and sections," and alleges that said appropriation to the department of finance "for reserve" is unconstitutional and void as in violation of the Constitution, and particularly the section just quoted, and prays that said appropriation be held unconstitutional and void, and that a perpetual injunction issue enjoining Andrew Russel, auditor of public accounts, from granting, issuing, or signing any warrants pursuant to such appropriation, and that Edward E. Miller, state treasurer, be perpetually enjoined from countersigning, honoring, or paying any such warrants.

In the brief filed by the attorney general it is stated that after the passage of the omnibus bill the attorney general advised the auditor of public accounts that payment should not be made from said appropriation until the constitutionality thereof should be determined by the courts, and that opinion practically states that the appropriation is unconstitutional. On this question, when the bill in this case was filed for an injunction in the circuit court of Sangamon county, counsel for the governor of the state and the director of finance appeared in the circuit court and asked leave to intervene and to file a brief for appellants, the state auditor and the state treasurer. This leave was granted, and, on the appeal to this court, counsel for the governor and director of finance also asked leave to file a brief in behalf of the appellants, and that leave was granted and briefs have been submitted by counsel for the governor and director of finance.

The question has been argued in the briefs by both counsel for appellants and for appellee as to whether the appropriation here in controversy specifies an "object" or "purpose" and appropriates thereto the $500,000 in a "distinct item," as provided by § 16 of article 5 of the Constitution. The language just referred to, relied on by counsel for appellee in his brief as making this appropriation unconstitutional and void, was placed in the Constitution by an Amendment adopted by the people in 1884, conferring what is generally known as the "item veto power of the governor." As stated by this court in Martens v. Brady, 264 Ill. 178, on page 190, 106 N. E. 271: "The purpose of the constitutional provision here invoked is to enable the governor, when passing on appropriation bills, to consider and act on the items of the appropriation separately."

Even before this provision was inserted by the Amendment of 1884, the Constitution of 1870 contemplated that the purpose of appropriations should be specified, and provided in § 17 of article 4 that "no money shall be diverted from any appropriation made for any purpose, or taken from any fund whatever, either by joint or separate resolution."

The framers of the amendment to § 16 of article 5 in 1884 undoubtedly had before them the broad language of § 13 of article 4 that "no act hereafter passed shall embrace more than one subject," and it would appear that they intended to use language clearly indicating that appropriations should specify both the object and purpose and the amount. It will be noted that § 25 of the Appropriation Act here in question states that the $500,000 is "to be apportioned between the executive, judicial and military departments of the state government and allotted as emergencies arise by the director of finance with the approval in writing of the governor."

Manifestly, such an appropriation has neither certainty as to the department by which the appropriation is to be used, nor as to the purpose for which it is to be expended. Section 24 of the State Finance Act (Laws 1919, p. 951) says: "The item 'reserve,' when used in an appropriation act, shall include expenditures for public purposes which were unforeseen by the general assembly."

It would appear from this definition that the statute would permit the director of finance, with the approval of the governor, to employ this money for any public purpose within the general constitutional or statutory powers of the executive, judicial, and military departments of the state government. There is no specification of the object and purpose in § 25 of the Appropriation Act as to this $500,000, as required by the Constitution.

It would appear to be argued by counsel for appellants that the appropriation here involved is one to be allotted and used by the several departments of the state government "as emergencies arise," and that "emergencies" constitute a specified "object and purpose" to which a distinct item has been appropriated, and that the word "emergency," properly construed, can only mean when a real emergency arises—when an occurrence takes place in the operation of government, which could not reasonably be anticipated by the legislature and was not provided for by the legislature, and which requires speedy action. This court said in People ex rel. State v. Brady, 277 Ill. 124, on page 129, 115 N. E. page 206: "That an appropriation can only be paid out of the treasury in payment of obligations incurred for the particular purposes specified in the appropriation was decided in People ex rel. Brinkerhoff v. Swigert, 107 Ill. 494, where it was sought to compel the auditor and treasurer to pay over to the captain of a company, in a lump sum, the share of an appropriation allotted to that company, and there was no showing that any obligation of the state had been incurred, and no bill of particulars or specification was presented. The law on that subject was repeated in Fergus v. Russel, 270 Ill. 304, 110 N. E. 130, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1120, where it was held that an appropriation for a particular purpose can only be paid on the presentation of itemized vouchers, showing that obligations have been incurred."

In the same case the court, in referring to the statutory provision as to the state board of agriculture, said (277 Ill. 130): "This provision, if it were valid, does not apply to this case, because the appropriations were made for specific purposes, and not to be expended for such purposes as in the opinion of the board would best advance the interests of agriculture, horticulture, manufactures, and domestic arts. If the act did apply it would be in violation of the Constitution, which provides that bills making appropriations shall specify their objects and purposes, and appropriate to them, respectively, the several sums in distinct items and sections. The general assembly must determine to what objects and purposes money of the state shall be appropriated, and cannot bestow that power upon any person or board for the exercise of discretion of the donee as to the objects for which the money shall be expended."

In Fergus v. Russel, supra, heretofore cited in People ex rel. State Bd. v. Brady, supra, the court said (270 Ill. 332): "Paragraph 26 of § 1 of the Omnibus Bill is as follows: 'To the state treasurer, such sums as may be necessary to refund the taxes on real estate sold or paid on error and for overpaying of collectors' accounts under laws governing such cases, to be paid out of proper funds.' The objection to this item is that no definite sum is appropriated. Paragraph 3 of § 16 of article 5 of the Constitution is, in part, as follows: [Here giving the portion above quoted.] It will thus be seen that to make a valid appropriation a definite sum of money must be appropriated for the purpose specified."

It is manifest that the appropriation of $500,000 is not an item in the constitutional sense, but is a sum for general distribution. The constitutional provision requires a definite amount for a definite object and purpose. In this appropriation there is no definite amount for a definite object and purpose, but a general amount, to be apportioned into items among a number of possible objects which are in no way specified, and this allotment or specification is necessary before the appropriation is effected.

We do not think anything said in Mitchell v. Lowden, 288 Ill. 327, 123 N. E. 566, relied on by counsel for amici curiæ, as to large appropriations for a specified amount to a given object, justifies the appropriation of $500,000 as set forth in the Appropriation Act. It is clear from the reasoning in Mitchell v. Lowden, and People ex rel. State Bd. v. Brady, supra, that the size of the appropriation as to a specified amount is not material, if the item is otherwise proper. In our judgment a fair reading of the opinion in Mitchell v. Lowden tends to support the decision of the trial court with reference to this appropriation being contrary to the constitutional provisions. It is clear, from the items of the Appropriation Act objected to, that the appropriation itself is not a complete act of legislation, but seeks to delegate to an administrative officer the specification of objects and purposes, and the determination of distinct items therefor. The Constitution expressly requires these acts to be performed by the general assembly itself. People ex rel. Breckon v. Election Comrs. 221 Ill. 9, 77 N. E. 321, 5 Ann. Cas. 562; Rouse v. Thompson, 228 Ill. 522, 81 N. E. 1109; Sheldon v. Hoyne, 261 Ill. 222, 103 N. E. 1021, and cases cited. The reasoning of this court in People v. Kane, 288 Ill. 235, 123 N. E. 265, supports the same conclusion.

It would seem from a plain reading of the provisions of § 16 of article 5 of the Constitution, as well as from the construction already put upon the provisions of the Constitution by this court, that the Appropriation Act in question, in attempting to appropriate, in § 25 thereof, $500,000 to be expended by the director of finance, on the approval of the governor, is unconstitutional and must be held void.

It is argued at some length by counsel for amici curiæ that appropriations similar to the one here in question have been made by the legislature from time to time for many years past, the sums appropriated varying in amount from

Appropriation—of reserve funds —validity.

$3,000 to $4,000, down to 1919 when a sum was appropriated and expended equal to the one here in question. The legislative construction placed upon a doubtful constitutional provision is entitled to weight, but, when there is no doubt as to the proper construction of the constitutional provision, such legislative construction is entitled to little or no weight. In the first volume of our decisions, Phoebe v. Jay, Beecher's Breese (Ill.) 268, in speaking of the authority of the legislature to act, this court said (page 271): "The Constitution is their commission, and they must act within the pale of their authority, and all their acts, contrary or in violation of the constitutional charter, are void. If they have no power to pass an act, any number of repetitions of unconstitutional acts, or acts beyond the pale of their authority, can never make the original act valid."

This same doctrine was quoted with approval by this court on this subject in Burke v. Snively, 208 Ill. 328, 70 N. E. 327. Of course, it is unnecessary for us to discuss or decide whether the former appropriations that have been expended under the authority of the various departments of the state government were constitutional or not. It is clear that, if these moneys in former years were expended contrary to the Constitution, under the authorities just cited, it would furnish no justifiable reason for again violating the plain provisions of the Constitution.

Counsel for amici curiæ also argue at length that under the decisions of this court similar general funds for emergency or contingent expenses have in effect been held constitutional under the provisions of the statute in such cases as People ex rel. Holmquist v. Illinois C. R. Co. 237 Ill. 324, 86 N. E. 724; People ex rel. Moneyham v. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. 247 Ill. 360, 93 N. E. 405, and People ex rel. Williamson v. 20 A.L.R.—62.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 253 Ill. 100, 97 N. E. 245. It is obvious from an examination of the respective statutes construed that the language under construction in those cases is not as specific as the constitutional provision here in question. See Hurd's Stat. 1917, chap. 24, § 111, chap. 120, § 121, and chap. 139, § 125. In this case the court has under construction a constitutional provision, and not the provisions of a statute such as govern appropriations for villages, cities, towns, and counties, and what is said in those cases, in our judgment, does not in any way tend to support the arguments of counsel for amici curiæ that the appropriation here in question should on the reasoning of those cases be held valid.

Neither do we think the argument of counsel for amici curiæ should control here because it seems absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the state government that a large latitude in regard to appropriations should be permitted in order to care for the emergencies that necessarily arise from time to time. The answer of this court to this argument is found in Knickerbocker v. People, 102 Ill. 218, where this court said (page 220): "Counsel for appellant have pressed upon the attention of the court, with much earnestness and in strong terms, the supposed inconveniences and great hardships that will probably result from holding the act in question unconstitutional, as a reason why such a construction should not be given to it. The argument of ab inconvenienti should have but little weight, if any, in solving the question before us. Considerations of this character address themselves to the official duty and conduct of the court, rather than to the question in hand. While they afford the strongest reasons why the court should act with great caution and mature deliberation in the consideration of the case, yet they do not throw a particle of light upon the vital question upon which it depends. It is not claimed that considerations of this character can have any controlling influence in a case where the act of the legislature is clearly unconstitutional, but it is urged they may be looked to in doubtful cases. This view has the sanction of authority, yet it is rather plausible than forcible, for, where an act of the legislature is manifestly unconstitutional, it is the duty of courts to so hold, however disastrous the consequences may be. On the other hand, if there is a reasonable doubt as to its unconstitutionality, the act should be sustained, whether any evil consequences would flow from holding it invalid or not."

This reasoning of the court, rendered in a decision construing the Constitution more than forty years ago, is a complete answer to the argument of counsel as to the inconvenience that may come to the state government from holding this appropriation of $500,000 invalid. It has been held by the courts of last resort in other states where somewhat similar provisions are in force that the provisions requiring the object of the appropriation to be specified and definite should be enforced. Dickinson v. Clibourn, 125 Ark. 101, 187 S. W. 909; State ex rel. Broadwater v. Seibert, 99 Mo. 122, 12 S. W. 348; Menefee v. Askew, 25 Okla. 623, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 537, 107 Pac. 159; People ex rel. Hopkins v. Kings County, 52 N. Y. 556. In this last case the court said (page 569): "It is not difficult, and ought not to be regarded as an unreasonable or onerous requirement, to state the 'object' to which an appropriation is to be applied, or the 'single work or object' for which it is proposed to create a state debt, or the 'object' for which a tax is deemed necessary, and to which it is to be applied."

In our judgment, if this appropriation for the benefit of either one, two, or three departments of the state government, without specifying the definite purpose or object of the appropriation, can be sustained, then such appropriations for every branch of the state government just as indefinite must be sustained, and we see no legal reason why, if $500,000 could be thus appropriated, even larger sums might not be appropriated to various state departments in the same indefinite and uncertain manner. We deem the argument of no force that similar appropriations have been heretofore made and wisely expanded by the governor and other state officials, without any serious harm to the public, and therefore the present and future governors of the state and state officials can be rightly trusted to continue to protect the interests of the public. Assuming that all this may be accepted as true, yet it furnishes no justification for disregarding the plain mandates of the written Constitution. If the provisions of the Constitution as to appropriations require them to be too definite and specific to make the conduct of the state government practical and efficient, it is not for the courts to change these specific provisions because of the impracticability and inconvenience of enforcing the Constitution. The courts must enforce the Constitution as adopted by the people, and if the Constitution requires a change it should be done in the regular manner. It may well be said that there are worse conditions than not having public officials able to carry out conveniently and satisfactorily the emergency work that may be required from time to time, without a specific appropriation. In a constitutional government no injury can come to a state greater than the destruction of the safeguards provided in its Constitution.

The decree of the Circuit Court will be affirmed.

Cartwright, J., dissenting:

The opinion adopted in this case holds the appropriation to the department of finance to be allotted as emergencies arise by the director of finance, with the approval in writing of the governor, to be a violation of § 16 of article 5 of the Constitution, giving to the governor power to veto any one or more of the items or sections contained in any bill making appropriations for money out of the treasury. This appears to be contrary to the purpose and intent of the Amendment of 1884, by which the provision was incorporated in the Constitution, and also contrary to the rule that courts must presume the words of the Constitution to have been employed in their natural and ordinary meaning.

In construing a constitutional provision it is important to consider the object intended to be accomplished and the mischief designed to be remedied. Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. 100. The Constitution, when adopted in 1870, by § 17 of article 4, vesting the legislative power in a general assembly and declaring limitations upon the exercise of the power, provided that no money should be drawn from the treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law. There was no provision that appropriations should be in distinct items or sections, and appropriations were frequently not made so as to enable the governor to exercise the veto power. Governor Cullom, in his message in January, 1883, recommended that § 16 of article 5 should be amended so that the veto power of the governor should be enlarged so as to give the governor the power of partial veto by items or sections. The governor called attention to the fact that governors of many states possessed that power, and that mayors had been given the power in 1875. In compliance with the recommendation of the governor, a resolution for the Amendment to the Constitution giving the governor power to veto distinct items or sections was submitted to the people and adopted. It was not in article 4, pertaining to the legislative department, which remained unchanged, but in article 5, concerning the executive department, and in that section which related to the veto power. The only purpose of the Amendment was that appropriations should be made in such separate items as would enable the governor to exercise his veto power, and it seems to me clear that the appropriation in question was of such a character as to meet the purpose of the Amendment. It specifies that the reserve is to be apportioned between the executive, judicial, and military departments of the government, and allotted, as emergencies arise, by the director of finance, with the approval in writing of the governor; and this is surely sufficiently specific to enable the governor to determine whether he would approve of the appropriation or exercise his power to disapprove of it.

Disregarding, however, the history of the Amendment, its evident purpose, and the article amended, it seems to me that the appropriation did specify the object and purpose for which it was made, and appropriated the amount in a distinct item and section. It has been the constant practice of the legislature to make appropriations for contingencies which may arise between sessions of the legislature, and the power has not only never been questioned, but is not now questioned. Such appropriations are made to meet expenses that may or may not occur within the scope of the department to which the appropriation is made. This appropriation is more specific in limiting the expenditure to emergencies which may arise. An emergency is:

"A sudden or unexpected occurrence or condition calling for immediate action." Standard Dict.

It is "an unforeseen occurrence or combination of circumstances which calls for immediate action or remedy; pressing necessity; exigency." Webster's Dict.

It is "any event or occasional combination of circumstances which calls for immediate action or remedy; an unforeseen occurrence; a combination of circumstances which calls for immediate action or remedy; a sudden or unexpected occasion for action; a sudden or unexpected happening; any case of casualty or unavoidable accident." 20 C. J. 499.

It is "some unforeseen occasion, condition, or pressing necessity that requires immediate action; a sudden or unexpected happening or occasion calling for immediate action." Century Dict.

It is not only more specific than an appropriation for contingencies, but there are practical considerations which cannot be overlooked in interpreting the Constitution. The state owns and operates twenty-seven different establishments in different parts of the state, including state hospitals for the insane, feeble-minded, and blind, the penitentiaries, reformatory, and other similar institutions, and the state government is charged with the maintenance of peace and order within its bounds. Emergencies may arise at any time calling for immediate action, which will be the only effective remedy. In 1920 landslides were endangering the state buildings at the Chester State Hospital, and money was taken from such an appropriation as this to build retaining walls and preserve and protect the state buildings. It would be nothing less than a calamity if no appropriation could be made for that specific purpose until the legislature should be called in special session. Riots are liable to occur, and have occurred, calling for immediate action in suppressing the same, and on two occasions property of the state has been destroyed by windstorms, where there was a necessity for immediate restoration to such an extent as to answer the purpose of the institution. Making an appropriation for such purposes is only the exercise of ordinary prudence and foresight.

As has been stated, there has never been, and is not now, any claim that appropriations for contingencies may not be made without specifying the particular purpose of the appropriation. In the same appropriation bill in which this appropriation was made there was an appropriation to the department of public welfare for contingencies of $100,000, to the governor, $40,000, to the department of public works and buildings, $20,000, to the secretary of state, $15,000, to the division of poultry husbandry, $5,000, and numerous other like appropriations to the various departments of the state government, which were approved by the governor, besides appropriations vetoed, not because they violated any constitutional provision, but because they did not meet with the approval of the governor. To recognize the validity of these appropriations, more indefinite than the one in question, which appropriated a definite sum of money for a specific purpose, with no discretion as to the purpose, does not appear to me to be justified or founded in reason.

It is true that the Amendment must be construed as it appears to have been understood by the people who adopted it. It was not only adopted to meet the objection of a want of veto power, but I do not see how it can be said that the people understood the Amendment as prohibiting such an appropriation as this. There are provisions in the statutes requiring appropriations of counties, cities, villages, and towns to specify the purposes of the appropriations, and it has been the general practice to make appropriations for contingent expenses or other similar designation. The court has sustained such appropriations as in compliance with the statute, where the amount is reasonable. People v. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. 237 Ill. 312, 86 N. E. 721; People ex rel. Whitlock v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. 249 Ill. 549, 94 N. E. 959; People ex rel. Williamson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 253 Ill. 100, 97 N. E. 245. These local governments cover the entire state, and the people must have understood that such appropriations could be made. As to such local governments it is within the power of the court to determine whether the amount appropriated is reasonable, but the court has no power to interfere with, regulate, or control the legislative discretion as to the amount of an appropriation. As a matter of fact, the legislature, at the session when this appropriation was made, appropriated about $170,000,000, of which the appropriation in question was but a small portion, but, if it were large, the court would have no right to set it aside for that reason.

Stone, Ch. J., also dissenting:

I concur in the above dissent. A fund such as is here appropriated cannot be made available for any of the purposes for which specific appropriations have been made. To sanction such use would be, in effect, to increase the appropriations made for the purposes specified. It is impossible, however, to foresee and provide for all emergencies which may arise in the discharge of the functions of state government, just as such contingencies cannot be foreseen in the administration of the government of municipalities. There appears to be no good reason for a different rule as applied to the wider functions of the state. It was clearly held in People ex rel. Moneyham v. Cairo, V. & C. R. Co. 247 Ill. 360, 93 N. E. 405, which holding has been approved in later cases, that such appropriations may be made for the reason that "it is practically impossible to always provide in advance for incidental expenses that will arise during the year." There appears to have been no objection to the amount appropriated in this case. The reason for approving such an appropriation in the case of a municipality applies with equal if not greater force, in the case of the state.

ANNOTATION.

Particularity of specification of purpose required in appropriation bill

The reported case (PEABODY v. RUSSEL, ante, 972) involves a provision (§ 16, art. 5) of the Illinois Constitution, as follows: "Bills making appropriations of money out of the treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made, and appropriate to them respectively their several amounts in distinct items and sections." It is held that an appropriation of a definite sum of money "to be apportioned between the executive, judicial, and military departments of the state government, and allotted as emergencies arise by the director of finance with the approval in writing of the governor," is invalid for lack of certainty as to the department by which the appropriation is to be used, and as to the purpose for which it is to be expended.

So, in People ex rel. State Bd. v. Brady (1917) 277 Ill. 124, 115 N. E. 204, the court said, obiter, that "the general assembly must determine to what objects and purposes money of the state shall be appropriated, and cannot bestow that power upon any person or board for the exercise of discretion of the donee as to the objects for which the money shall be expended."

In Martens v. Brady (1914) 264 Ill. 178, 106 N. E. 266, however, it was held that an appropriation "for the purpose of building and maintaining state aid roads in the several counties of the state" did not violate the foregoing constitutional provision in not specifying the amount for building roads in one item and the amount for maintaining them in another item. The court said: "The constitutional provision here invoked in one of importance, and must be complied with in all appropriations to which it is applicable. Building roads, and maintaining them when built, are different undertakings, but both are necessary to carry out the general scheme or purpose of the act, which is to provide for better highways throughout the state. The purpose of the constitutional provision here invoked is to enable the governor, when passing on appropriation bills, to consider and act on the items of the appropriation separately. In order to carry out the general scheme of the act, however, the building and maintenance of roads are so closely connected that it is difficult to say where one ends and the other begins. The act itself clearly contemplates but one fund to carry out its provisions, as is evidenced by § 1, which provides "that the term "state road and bridge fund," when used herein, shall mean all moneys appropriated by the state of Illinois for road and bridge purposes." We do not think the construction and maintenance of state aid roads constitute separate and distinct items which, under the constitutional provision, it is required should be separately itemized in the bill making the appropriation. Their relation to the purpose and scheme of the act, and to each other, is so close that it is not to be supposed the governor would approve of the one and veto the other. Again, the general assembly, at the time of making the appropriations, could not know the amounts needed or required to first construct the roads and afterwards maintain them. The appropriations which constitute the state road and bridge fund are available to the state highway commission, which can make allotments from said fund to each county of the state as provided by the act, and the commission is required, in preparing vouchers for warrants, to designate the amount spent for construction and the amount spent for maintenance, and also show the location, as to county and division of the county, on which the same is to be used. This requirement is practicable and furnishes a record of the amount expended for each purpose, and where used. We do not think the constitutional provision invoked was violated."

So, in Hett v. Portsmouth (1905) 73 N. H. 334, 61 Atl. 596, it was held that an appropriation of a definite sum of money for "permanent street improvements" was not so indefinite as to amount to an attempted delegation of legislative power to the executive officers whose duty it might be to expend the money. The court said: "If it is conceded that the expression, standing alone, and unexplained or unlimited by extraneous evidence, might include a great variety of public highway enterprises, the kind, locality, and extent of which would require the exercise of that degree of deliberation and judgment which is vested in the governing body, the question remains whether the circumstances attending the vote do not sufficiently limit the general scope of the language used. What was the intention of the members of the city council passing the vote, when ascertained from a consideration of all the competent evidence? What did they understand was included in the expression 'permanent street improvements'? The facts that the city had in 1903 adopted a policy of making permanent improvements in the roadbeds of the streets, as contradistinguished from temporary repairs, by using asphalt paving, that after an investigation of the subject the city had appropriated money for asphalt paving, and that a considerable amount of that paving was laid, proving to be satisfactory, constitute evidence showing that work of that character upon the streets was included in the title to the joint resolution of 1904, and in the body thereof. That such was the intention of the city council can admit of little doubt under the circumstances, while such a purpose is not inconsistent with the language used. It is, therefore, unnecessary to inquire whether other highway improvements might not be called 'permanent.'"

In State ex rel. Broadwater v. Siebert (1889) 99 Mo. 122, 12 S. W. 348, it was held that a reappropriation of an unexpended balance of a former appropriation is on the same footing as the original appropriation as to the necessity of stating the object for which the reappropriation is made. The court said: "That question must be determined by the terms of the act of reappropriation, and resort cannot be had to the first act for that purpose. By the terms of the reappropriation in this case, the object stated is 'to pay the balance due under the contract made for the enlargement of the capitol building.' When this reappropriation was made, there was nothing due the relator upon any contract for the enlargement of the capitol building, nor had there been any contract whatever made with him by the commissioners. Conceding that, under the act making the original appropriation, the commissioners had authority to contract for the services for which they approved relator's account, they did not so contract until after the time had elapsed within which he could have been paid, by virtue of such original appropriation. And the terms of the reappropriation limit the payment to such balance as may be due under the contract, i. e., under the contract made before the passage of the act of reappropriation upon which a balance was or might become due. By no proper construction can relator's claim, under an original contract made after the act, be brought within the terms of the reappropriation, and, there being no fund upon which the auditor was authorized by law to draw a warrant, the peremptory writ prayed for will be refused."

While not precisely in point, for the reason that the particularity of the specification related to the amount of money appropriated, and not the purpose for which it was appropriated, the cases of Fergus v. Russel (1915) 270 Ill. 332, 110 N. E. 142, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 1120, and Engstad v. Dinnie (1898) 8 N. D. 1, 76 N. W. 292, bear collaterally on the subject under annotation. Fergus v. Russel (Ill.) supra, arose under the provision of the Illinois Constitution heretofore quoted. It was held that an item which failed to appropriate a definite sum of money was invalid. To the same effect, see Engstad v. Dinnie (N. D.) supra, wherein the court stated the facts and its conclusion as follows: "A careful reading of the enactment of December 18th reveals the important fact that the same nowhere undertakes to appropriate any specific sum or amount as an expenditure for an electric light improvement for the city of Grand Forks. Its terms warrant the expenditure of no sum or amount which is stated or made definite. The law requires not only that an annual appropriation bill shall 'specify' the purposes for which the appropriation is made, but it must go further and specify 'the amount appropriated for each purpose.' Rev. Codes, § 2262. The measure we are considering, adopted December 18th, assumed to appropriate $50,000 out of the general fund of the city for the purpose of paying salaries and the incidental expenses of the city government, including the payment of city orders; and also, incidentally, for the purpose of 'defraying the expense of erecting and completing and installing an electric light plant for said city, and the operating expenses of the same during said fiscal year.' From this language it appears that, while the city council attempted to appropriate a gross amount ($50,000) from the general fund of the city for certain purposes mentioned, it does not specify the sum or amount which each or either purpose is to receive. From this language it is impossible to determine how much of this appropriation may be expended for any one purpose named in the enactment. We are far from holding that, in an appropriation out of the general fund of a city to meet the ordinary expenses incident to carrying on the city government, each item of expense must be anticipated, and stated in dollars and cents in the appropriation bill. No such rigid and fanciful requirement as that suggested is made by the law, and we certainly shall not attempt to read into the statute by construction any such embarrassing rule. But a costly improvement such as that contemplated in the contracts in question does not fall within the ordinary operating expenses of a city organized under the Code."

A. S. M.

T. W. MARTIN, Plff. in Err.,
v.
C. W. HEMPHILL.

Texas Commission of Appeals (Section B) — February 15, 1922.

(— Tex. —, 237 S. W. 550.)

Evidence — parol to show status of person signing contract.

1. Parol evidence is admissible in an action to enforce a contract, confirmation of which was signed in a firm name "by" an individual, but which confirmation did not purport to include the whole contract, to show that the individual was the sole member of the firm.

[See note on this question beginning on page 992.]

— parol to vary writing.

2. In the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake oral evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written contract.

[See 10 R. C. L. 1016; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 1139.]

— contract only partly in writing.

3. Where a writing represents only a part of a contract, the other parts being expressed orally, those parts of the contract not reduced to writing which are consistent with the writing may be shown.

[See 10 R. C. L. 1030; 2 R. C. L. Supp. 1142.]

Name — right to adopt business name.

4. An individual may, in the absence of statutory prohibition, adopt any name he chooses under which to carry on business.

[See 19 R. C. L. 1383.]

Contract — signature — firm name by individual.

5. A signature affixed to a contract of a firm name "by" the name of an individual does not show that the individual signed as agent for the firm, rather than as the firm itself.

Partnership — character — status.

6. A partnership at common law is not a legal entity, but only a contractual status, and before a suit can be filed by or against it the membership of the firm must be shown.

[See 20 R. C. L. 805, 920, 936; 3 R. C. L. Supp. 1103, 1111.]

Bank — authority of president — contract for cotton.

7. The president of a state bank has no implied authority to bind it by a contract for the purchase of cotton.

[See notes in 1 A.L.R. 693; 9 A.L.R. 1146.]

ERROR to the Court of Civil Appeals for the Third Supreme Judicial District to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the District Court for Coleman County (Woodward, J.) in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for breach of certain contracts for the sale of cotton. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. Snodgrass, Dibrell, & Snodgrass, for plaintiff in error:

The court erred in holding that to permit plaintiff to prove by oral testimony that he was the sole constituent member of the firm, and the only person doing business under the name of McDonald Brothers, would be to vary and contradict the terms of the written contracts of confirmation offered in evidence.

Heffron v. Pollard, 73 Tex. 96, 15 Am. St. Rep. 764, 11 S. W. 165; Tinsley v. Dowell, 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946; Hunter v. Adoue, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 542, 86 S. W. 622; 29 Cyc. 270, 419, 420.

At common law a partnership is not a legal entity, but only a contractual status.

Glasscock v. Price, 92 Tex. 271, 47 S.

W. 965; Houghton v. Puryear, — Tex. Civ. App. —, 30 S. W. 583.

Mr. W. Marcus Weatherred, for defendant in error:

Parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument.

Heffron v. Pollard, 73 Tex. 96, 15 Am. St. Rep. 764, 11 S. W. 165.

A state bank cannot engage in the buying and selling of cotton.

Commercial Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 97 Tex. 536, 104 Am. St. Rep. 879, 80 S. W. 601; First Nat. Bank v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 99 Tex. 118, 87 S. W. 1032; Fidelity & D. Co. v. National Bank, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 301, 106 S. W. 782; Commercial Nat. Bank v. First Nat. Bank, 97 Tex. 536, 104 Am. St. Rep. 879, 80 S. W. 601.

Powell, J., filed the following opinion:

The court of civil appeals gives us the benefit of a clear and accurate statement of this case, as follows:

"Appellant filed this suit against the appellees, C. W. Hemphill and the Central State Bank of Coleman, a state banking corporation, to recover damages for the breach of certain contracts for the sale of cotton by appellees to appellant. The appellees filed separate answers, and the trial court sustained exceptions of the appellee Central State Bank, which eliminated that defendant from the suit.

"The case was tried before a jury, and the court peremptorily instructed a verdict in favor of the remaining defendant, C. W. Hemphill. Judgment was rendered upon the verdict for such defendant, from which this appeal has resulted.

"Appellant's cause of action was based upon certain contracts for the purchase of cotton made at different dates during the month of September, 1917, which contracts were each evidenced by written confirmations. The confirmations were signed with the printed name, McDonald Brothers, by T. W. Martin, the latter name being written. It was alleged that the confirmations were each delivered to C. W. Hemphill and accepted by him; and that, at the time of the making of the contracts and the issuing of the confirmations, appellant was engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton in the town of Coleman, in Coleman county, Texas, for himself, but was transacting business under the name of McDonald Brothers. It was further alleged that these facts were well known to the defendant C. W. Hemphill. These allegations were denied, both generally and specially.

"Appellant offered to prove the facts as alleged, but, upon objection by the appellee Hemphill that the proof tendered was an attempt to vary and contradict by parol the terms of written contracts, the court excluded such testimony.

"The bill of exceptions upon this point shows that appellant testified, in substance, that he resided in Coleman, Coleman county, Texas, during the cotton season of 1917-18, and had been following the business of buying and selling cotton for fifteen or twenty years, sometimes buying for himself and sometimes for other people. That, during the cotton season of 1916, he was engaged in buying cotton at Sweetwater, Texas, for McDonald Brothers, of that place. That during the season of 1917 and 1918 he was engaged in buying and selling cotton at Coleman.

"When it was attempted to show the manner and name in which he did business during the season of 1917, objection was made, and the jury was retired. During the retirement of the jury, appellant testified that he did business at Coleman during 1917, under the name of McDonald Brothers, and that he was the sole constituent member of such firm. He testified that he made the purchases in question from appellee C. W. Hemphill, and that in each instance he issued a written confirmation, which correctly stated the date, the amount, and the price and terms of the contract. The first confirmation is typical of all, and is as follows:

"Coleman, Sept. 8, 1917.

"C. W. Hemphill, Dear sir:—We beg to confirm herewith purchase from you as follows:

100 B. C. at 19½ B/M.

"Differences as follows:

Good middling ..½.. On

St. middling ..½.. On

Middling

St. low middl'g ..½.. Off

Low middling ..½.. Off

St. good ordin'y Off

Spots Off same grade white

Tinges Off same grade white

"Terms: Oct. 15th. Reimbursement. E. & O. E.

"Yours very truly,

"McDonald Bros.,

"by T. W. Martin.

"It was also testified by appellant that he had previously had a conversation with Hemphill, concerning the use of the name of McDonald Brothers in the contracts. The substance of this testimony was that local merchants had run a garnishment against appellant's bank account, and that he suggested running the cotton account in the name of McDonald Brothers, to avoid the garnishment of his funds, to which Hemphill assented.

"Appellant also testified that Hemphill never delivered the cotton upon any of these contracts, but requested an extension of time, to which he consented, provided Hemphill would pay any overdrafts created by the purchase of other cotton to fill the contracts. It was not claimed that there was any definite period of extension.

"As stated, the court excluded this testimony, and in the bill of exceptions qualified the same as follows:

"This suit was brought by T. W. Martin on written confirmation signed "McDonald Bros., by T. W. Martin," T. W. Martin having testified that during the season of 1916 he bought cotton for and represented McDonald Brothers, which was a cotton firm engaged in buying and selling cotton. When he sought to testify that in the confirmations issued he was not acting for McDonald Brothers, but for himself under the name of "McDonald Brothers," the defendant objected on the ground that the written confirmation, by the manner of its signature, showed that T. W. Martin was not signing as an individual, but as the agent of McDonald Brothers, and that Martin should not be permitted to vary the legal meaning and effect of the signature and of the written instrument, by parol testimony that he was acting for himself in so signing the instrument, which objections were by the court sustained under the decision of Heffron v. Pollard, 73 Tex. 96, 15 Am. St. Rep. 764, 11 S. W. 165.

"The principal questions upon this appeal are whether the trial court correctly interpreted the contracts as not binding appellant as principal, but as showing that he executed the confirmation as the agent of McDonald Brothers; and whether the court correctly held that appellant should not be permitted to vary the legal meaning and effect of the signature and of the written instruments, by parol testimony that he was acting for himself in signing the same.

"It is in substance the contention of appellees that the contracts were plain and unambiguous, and showed upon their face that appellant did not execute the same for himself and as an individual, but in the capacity as agent for McDonald Brothers, and that, therefore, parol evidence would be inadmissible to vary the meaning and legal effect of the instruments.

"Upon the other hand, it is claimed by appellant that the printed signature of the name McDonald Brothers, not revealing whether it was a corporation or partnership, and, if a partnership, not disclosing the constituent members of the firm, parol evidence was admissible to show who was transacting business in that name; and that such testimony would not be contradictory, but explanatory of the written instrument.

"Both parties rely upon the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, upon the authority of which the trial court based his ruling in excluding the proffered testimony, and in peremptorily instructing for appellee Hemphill."

The court of civil appeals, also relying upon the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, concluded that the trial court properly excluded the testimony in question and affirmed its judgment. See — Tex. Civ. App. —, 221 S. W. 333.

The controlling question before us is whether or not the court of civil appeals correctly held that Martin should not have been permitted to prove that he was the sole member of the firm of "McDonald Brothers." We think the court erred in so holding, and that such testimony should have been admitted by the trial court. We do not think that proof would have revised the written confirmations. If not, it was clearly admissible.

It is elementary that, in the absence of fraud, accident, or mistake, oral evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary the terms of a written instrument. Many Texas authorities in this connection are collated in case of Harper v. Lott Town & Improv. Co. — Tex. Com. App. —, 228 S. W. 188. That the court in the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, had this rule of evidence in mind is quite clear. This can be gathered from several sections of that opinion as follows:

(1) "As to the legal effect of this contract upon its face there can be no doubt. It discloses the names and relation of all the parties connected with it. It binds Fry, the principal, and does not bind Heffron, the agent. If it had said in express terms that Fry was bound by the contract, and Heffron not, the meaning in the light of the law would not have been more unmistakable. Can Heffron be held liable upon this written agreement? Is it permissible in order to bind him to show by parol testimony an intention exactly contrary to that expressed on the face of the writing, namely, that Heffron was bound by it and that Fry was not bound? In our opinion this cannot be done without violating a cardinal rule of evidence."

(2) "In the present case, also, the name is not a fictitious one. It is the name of a real person. But the contract purports to bind him alone, and upon its face is inconsistent with the idea that the defendant, in signing it, may have intended to use it for his own business name."

(3) "The intention of the parties to a written contract must be derived from the writing itself when its meaning is clear. Can it be said that the admission of parol evidence to show that the contract before us was made for the benefit of defendant [Heffron], and was intended to bind him, does not violate this rule? We think not. The contract clearly shows the relation of all the parties to it, who was to be bound and who was not to be bound, and its legal effect cannot be varied by such evidence."

But there is another rule of the law of evidence which is equally elementary. It has been stated for the supreme court of Texas by Justice Williams in the case of Coverdill v. Seymour, 94 Tex. 1, 57 S. W. 37, as follows: "It is sometimes the case that the writing represents only a part of the contract, the other parts being expressed orally, and, in such cases, these parts not reduced to writing, which are consistent with the writing, may be shown."

We think this is the rule applicable to the case at bar, and under which the proffered testimony was admissible.

In the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, the written contract in several instances, in its very body, bound one John W. Fry a real person. He was fully and completely identified repeatedly. The contract was complete in itself in every detail. It nowhere mentioned Heffron as being bound. In signing the contract, Heffron executed it for John W. Fry in this language: "John W. Fry, per Heffron." Fry was a legal entity. He could sue and be sued. No explanation as to his identity was required. As said by the court in this case, the contract itself was just as clear as if it had expressly provided that Heffron was not to be bound. So, in the case at bar, if the written confirmation had expressly provided that Martin was not a member of the firm of "McDonald Brothers," then the testimony in question would have varied the contract and would not have been admissible. But, what do we find to be the facts in the instant case upon this point?

Evidence—parol to show status of person signing contract.

—parol to vary writing.

—contract only partly in writing.

The confirmation in suit was essentially an incomplete statement of the contract. It did not even pretend to reflect the entire agreement between the parties. It was not even signed by Hemphill. All the parties to the suit in their pleadings set up many things outside the contents of the confirmations. In so far as they were not inconsistent with the latter they were admissible in evidence. Hemphill said it was understood that he was acting for another man, and was not to be bound personally; that if he accepted the contract at all, it was only in that limited manner. There were many other parts of the contract not covered by the written confirmations.

It will be conceded that Martin had the right to assume the trade-name of "McDonald Brothers," or any other name. In this connection, we quote as follows from 29 Cyc. p. 270: "Without abandoning his real name, a person may adopt any name, style, or signature wholly different from his own name, by which he may transact business, execute contracts, issue negotiable paper, and sue or be sued. Such assumed or fictitious name may be either a purely artificial name, or a name that is or may be applied to natural persons."

The tradename "McDonald Brothers" does not necessarily imply that two or more persons by the name of McDonald are doing business under that name, or that the firm includes anyone by the name of McDonald. In fact, a tradename used by a partnership firm does not, prima facie, conclusively prove anything as to its constituent members. In this connection, we quote as follows from 30 Cyc. pp. 419, 420: "At common law a partnership may be validly organized, without any provision in the agreement as to the name under which it is to do business. When a firm name is fixed upon it may be the full individual name of any partner; the surnames of all the partners; or the surname of one or more of the members with the addition of '& Co.:' or it may consist of individual names wholly distinct from the names of any of the members; or it may be a name purely fanciful. . . . Partnership contracts are perfectly valid when made in the firm name, even though such name does not contain the names of any of the partners."

Our supreme court has recognized the above rules laid down by Cyc. In the very case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, the court says: "We understand the law to be that when a party, for the purpose of transacting business, adopts an assumed name, whether it be fictitious or the name of another, he is bound by a contract made in that name."

Upon this very point, the court of civil appeals is in accord, in the instant case, with the principles of law now under discussion. That court in this very case says: "It must be conceded that it is usually permissible for a person to assume a fictitious or artificial business name, or even the real names of other natural persons, in the making of contracts, and, where the contract is not inconsistent with such theory, a recovery may be had by the person really contracting under the assumed name."

Name—right to adopt business name.

name of "McDonald Brothers," or any other name. In this

It is quite clear that Martin had the right to do business under the tradename of "McDonald Brothers." He alleged that he was so doing business; that he and Hemphill agreed it was best to do so, and because of Martin's financial condition. The allegations of the pleadings set up the whole agreement and contract between the parties. The written confirmations were silent on many of these points. One of the incomplete portions of the confirmations is the composition of the firm of McDonald Brothers. The firm name appears but once in any part of the writing, and that is at the very end thereof. It appears thus: "McDonald Brothers, by T. W. Martin." The court of civil appeals says that the confirmation itself clearly shows that Martin signed as agent of the firm. We cannot agree with this holding.

Contract—
signature—firm name by individual.

Certainly, no agency is expressly shown. If he had signed it by "T. W. Martin, Agent," then it would have clearly appeared that he was so acting, or if he had signed it by "T. W. Martin, Member of Firm," the intention would have been equally clear. But he did neither of these things. He only signed his name. It is a matter of common knowledge that firm names are frequently signed by members of the firm. When the firm name is printed, the name of someone authorized to sign for the firm is necessary, in order to attest the authenticity of the firm's signature. In our common experience, we know almost daily of instances where firm names are signed and then followed by the name of someone else who was a member of that firm. The signature shows, in such cases, that the firm's name was signed by this member of the firm. Yet it is seldom stated that he is a member of the firm. Martin, as the sole member of the firm, could have signed this instrument just as he did. It was not inconsistent with his contention as pleaded. Certainly there should be no presumption of mere agency, when one does not expressly sign as agent, and especially when the written instrument itself nowhere states anything which, even by implication, shows any such agency.

It is clear to us that the confirmations shed absolutely no light upon the composition of the firm of "McDonald Brothers," but leave the whole matter open as the subject of parol proof. As we view it, proof that Martin was either agent or sole member of the firm would be consistent with the written confirmations.

Really, parol proof would be absolutely necessary in this case before McDonald Brothers could sue or be sued. A partnership, at common law, is not a legal entity, but only a contractual status. See Glasscock v. Price, 92 Tex. 271, 47 S. W. 965; Houghton v. Puryear, 10 Tex. Civ. App. 383, 30 S. W. 583. Before a suit could have been filed by or against McDonald Brothers, it would have been necessary to allege the membership of said firm. Proof showing its membership would have been explanatory and not contradictory thereof. This was necessarily an open question in the case at bar, and, as we view it, the evidence was clearly admissible. On the other hand, in the case of Heffron v. Pollard, 73 Tex. 96, 15 Am. St. Rep. 764, 11 S. W. 165, John W. Fry was one man, an individual, a legal entity, and no further light was necessary in his identification.

Partnership—character—
status.

McDonald Brothers is really, in the case at bar, a fictitious tradename. It is true there are McDonalds at Sweetwater. There are perhaps other McDonalds in every county in Texas. But, in the instant case, it was a fictitious name, adopted by Martin and Hemphill under a mutual agreement, according to the pleadings. It is for the jury to pass upon the truthfulness of Martin's allegations. If they are true, then, if the proffered testimony in support thereof is excluded, this rule of evidence becomes the instrument and vehicle of a grave injustice in defeating contractual obligations honestly assumed. The firm name of "McDonald Brothers" did not reveal who constituted such firm. Therefore parol testimony was admissible to show who was transacting business at that time and place under that name. As already stated, such testimony would not be contradictory of the written confirmation, but merely explanatory thereof.

We think if the supreme court which decided the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra, had had the facts of the instant case under consideration, it would have admitted the proffered testimony in evidence. We feel justified in this assertion in view of the following quotation from the opinion in the above cause last referred to: "If the contract had been signed in the name of Fry only, it would have been proper to have permitted it to be read to the jury upon proof that defendant [Heffron] signed it, that the contract was made for his benefit, and that he assumed the name of Fry as his business name in the transaction."

If the contract had been so signed, the writing, on its face, would certainly have bound no one but Fry. Heffron's name would have appeared nowhere in the written contract. Under those circumstances, the court in that case says that Heffron would have been permitted to explain the contract by stating that he used Fry's name as a business name, and that he (Heffron) was the real party at interest. It seems to us that if such an explanation be permissible, then there could be no serious doubt as to the admissibility of testimony by Martin, explaining that he was the constituent member of the firm of McDonald Brothers. Certainly one would be as much an explanation as the other, and neither apparently any more a variation of a written contract than the other. In one case, Heffron would be explaining his use of the name of another individual, entirely unlike his own; in the other, Martin would be explaining his use of a partnership, or firm tradename, entirely foreign to his own.

As we construe the decision in Heffron v. Pollard, supra, the court there found that John W. Fry's name was used repeatedly in the very body of the contract; that his name was signed to the contract "per Heffron;" that John W. Fry, prima facie, means John W. Fry, a definite description of a given individual; that no explanation was necessary to his complete identification; that when Heffron signed "John W. Fry, per Heffron," it showed conclusively that Fry was the principal, whose name was being signed by his agent, Heffron, otherwise Heffron would have either signed his own name only after having also used it in the body of the contract, or would have been consistent all the way, and used only the name of John W. Fry throughout the contract. In other words, the court held in Heffron v. Pollard that when the name of one individual is signed by another individual, and the latter's name is also signed to the contract, the latter is, as a matter of law, merely the agent of the former, and proof to the contrary is not admissible.

But the use of an indefinite firm or partnership name is a vastly different proposition, as we view it; "McDonald Brothers" does not identify a soul. It might be used by any man, or set of men. It, prima facie, conveys no meaning; when its name, in printed form, is signed to a contract, it is the usual custom for someone to attest the signature; that is done by a member of the firm as often as by a mere agent; the signing of the firm name by a member of the firm cannot be inconsistent with his membership therein; evidence explaining the constituency of the firm and his membership therein is certainly not only admissible, but generally essential. When a firm name is signed by an individual, with nothing in the contract anywhere to show whether the latter is an agent or member of the firm, the signer is just as likely to be the one as the other; we are inclined to think the law makes no presumptions, and we are certain it carries no conclusive presumption; his status is subject to proof.

We think what we have said sufficiently disposes of the issue as to the admissibility of the testimony in question. But counsel for Martin quote as follows from the case of Tinsley v. Dowell, 87 Tex. 23, 26 S. W. 946: "The general rule is that one who contracts as agent cannot maintain an action in his own name and right upon the contract.

To this general rule there are four exceptions generally recognized by the courts and text-writers: First, where the agent contracts in his own name, second, where the agent does not disclose his principal, who is unknown; third, where by the usages of trade the agent is authorized to act as owner of the property; fourth, where the agent has an interest in the subject-matter of the contract, and in this case whether he professed to act as agent or not."

In discussing the above quotation, counsel contend very vigorously that in the case at bar Martin was plaintiff, asserting certain rights in court, and not a defendant, denying liability, as in the case of Heffron v. Pollard, supra. Proceeding further in that same connection, they state: "Now, in the case at bar, the plaintiff in error alleged and undertook to prove not only that he had an interest in the subject-matter of the contracts in controversy, but that he had the sole and only interest therein; and, in view of this announcement by our supreme court, we respectfully submit that he was entitled to prove his case by the evidence offered upon said trial and which was excluded by the trial court, and he was entitled to make such proof regardless of whether this court holds, or does not hold, that by the manner of executing the contracts plaintiff in error professed to act as agent or not."

We do not think it necessary to pass upon the correctness of this contention of counsel, and we do not do so, although it strikes us as having some force. As said before, we think what we have already said disposes of this question, and that the confirmation does not, in itself, show that Martin signed as agent.

We think the bank was properly dismissed from the suit by the trial court. The president of the bank had no authority to bind his principal, a state bank, to any such contract as the

Bank—authority of president—contract for cotton.

one pleaded by Martin. We are in complete accord with the decision of the court of civil appeals upon this point, when it says: "We hold that plaintiff's petition wholly fails to state a cause of action against the bank, for the reason that, under the pleading, such transactions were ultra vires the corporation. It was not alleged that the bank had, at the time of the making of the contracts, any cotton to deliver thereunder, or that it would, in due course of business, acquire such cotton as collateral to any loans made. The mere potential ability of the bank to acquire such property in the future would not, in our opinion, suffice to give it authority to make contracts of this character for future delivery. Neither would the bank be bound by custom, upon contracts of its managing officers, for the future delivery of cotton, in such circumstances. Under the pleadings, to hold the bank liable under these contracts would be, in effect, to recognize that a state banking corporation could engage in the business of buying and selling cotton for future delivery, a doctrine which this court cannot sanction."

We do not think it necessary to pass upon other contentions raised in the application, because we believe they have been effectually disposed of by what we have said in holding admissible the testimony in question. We are of the view that these questions will not now arise in such a way as to give any difficulty upon another trial of the case.

It follows, from what has been said, that we think the District Court and Court of Civil Appeals erred in excluding the proffered testimony tending to show that Martin composed the firm of "McDonald Brothers," and that such error requires a reversal of the judgment. In fact, the whole case turned upon that error.

Therefore, we recommend that the judgments of the District Court and the Court of Civil Appeals be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the former for another trial in conformity therewith.

Cureton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The judgment recommended in the report of the Commission of Appeals is adopted and will be entered as the judgment of the Supreme Court.

We approve the holding of the Commission of Appeals on the question discussed in its opinion.

ANNOTATION.

Admissibility of extrinsic evidence, to identify the person or persons intended to be designated by the name in which a contract is made.

It is not intended in the present annotation to discuss the numerous cases dealing with parol evidence to show who is bound by a contract signed by an agent, or cases of like character dealing with partnerships, but to cover cases of the nature of the reported case (MARTIN v. HEMPHILL, ante, 984), in which an assumed name is signed to a contract, the question being whether parol evidence is admissible to show who was meant by the assumed name. In addition, there have been included cases somewhat outside the above limitation, dealing with the admissibility of parol evidence to identify, as between two persons of the same name, the one who was intended in a contract.

Cases dealing with parol evidence to show who constituted an association or partnership which is a party to a contract have not, in general, been included. See for a case of this kind The Golden Rod (1912) 197 Fed. 837.

A case having some points of similarity to MARTIN v. HEMPHILL appears in Meyer v. Shapton (1914) 178 Mich. 417, 144 N. W. 887, although, as will subsequently appear, the facts make it perfectly distinct in principle and beyond the scope of this annotation. In that case it was held competent to show by oral evidence that an order for an automobile, written on a paper headed "Meyer Bros.," and signed by the purchaser, but not by the vendor, was in fact made with an individual named Herman C. Meyer. But in this case the testimony was that the firm of Meyer Brothers had not been in existence for a long period; that the plaintiff happened to have the printed form in question, and that by mistake the name of "Meyer Bros." was not erased; but that it was understood that the individual, the plaintiff, was making the sale.

A name signed to a contract may be shown to be a name adopted by another. In an action of unlawful detainer a lease signed "E. H. Turner," is admissible in evidence against the defendant G. W. Turner, and parol evidence is admissible to show that the said G. W. Turner was the person who signed the lease as E. H. Turner. Simons v. Marshall (1852) 3 G. Greene (Iowa) 502. Such evidence makes no change in any term, condition, or obligation in the lease. The proof only identifies one of the parties who signed the lease as being one of the parties in wrongful possession. The fact that he did not sign his true name does not release him from the obligation created by the fact that he did sign as lessee, and went into possession under the lease. It may be shown by parol evidence that a person referred to in the contract as "Pop Dyer," was the same person as S. H. Dyer, such person being commonly known as "Pop" Dyer. Haskell v. Tukesbury (1899) 92 Me. 551, 69 Am. St. Rep. 529, 48 Atl. 500. In an action on a contract in which the party of the second part is named as "Mrs. Isidor Braun," but which is signed "Isidor Braun," oral evidence is competent to show that Mrs. Isidor Braun thus signed the contract. Wuertz v. Braun (1906) 113 App. Div. 459, 99 N. Y. Supp. 340.

In Daugherty v. Heckard (1901) 189 Ill. 239, 59 N. E. 569, it was held competent in an action upon a contract bearing the name of but one person as party of the first part, to establish by parol proof that the contract was in fact that of a copartnership, and that the firm entered into the contract in the name and style of the individual.

In Hall v. Tufts (1836) 18 Pick. (Mass.) 455, where a mortgage was given to "Ebenezer Hall, 3d," to secure a note described as being held by him, and the note appeared to be payable to "Ebenezer Hall," parol evidence was admitted to explain that a partnership existed between Ebenezer Hall and Ebenezer Hall, 3d, and that the debt for which the note and mortgage were given was a partnership debt, the business of the partnership having been carried on, at least for a while, in the firm name of "Ebenezer Hall."

It seems to have been held competent in Thompson v. Thompson (1899) 78 Minn. 379, 81 N. W. 204, 543, to explain that an individual was doing business in the name of "Smith & Thompson," in an action upon a contract signed in such partnership name.

In Walker v. Miller (1905) 139 N. C. 448, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 157, 111 Am. St. Rep. 805, 52 S. E. 125, 4 Ann. Cas. 601, an action involving a deed of real estate to a partnership grantee, the members of which had died, but the name of which had been perpetuated and the property kept together by consent of all parties interested after a sale of the business to strangers, for the purpose of collecting the accounts and settling up the partnership affairs, it was held competent to identify the true owners of the property granted by the deed, by parol evidence.

A foreign merchant who had established one Edward Higginbotham and conducted business in London in the name of Higginbotham, that name being painted outside the countinghouse and employed in all the contracts, was held liable upon a broker's sold note, naming Edward Higginbotham, although, prior to the transaction evidenced by the note, the merchant had terminated the authority of Higginbotham to represent him, but had not given notice thereof, parol evidence being held competent to show the above facts. Trueman v. Loder (1840) 11 Ad. & El. 589, 113 Eng. Reprint, 539, 3 Perry & D. 567, 9 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 165.

Where the name of a party to a contract applies to more than one person, parol evidence is generally held admissible to identify the contracting party. Thus, where the name of the grantee in a deed is equally applicable to more than one person, parol evidence is admissible to show the true grantee. Wolff v. Elliott (1900) 68 Ark. 326, 57 S. W. 1111; Coit v. Starkweather (1830) 8 Conn. 289; Peabody v. Brown (1857) 10 Gray (Mass.) 45; Simpson v. Dix (1881) 131 Mass. 179; Avery v. Stites (1832) Wright (Ohio) 56; Begg v. Begg (1883) 56 Wis. 534, 14 N. W. 602.

In application of this rule, in Wolff v. Elliott (1900) 68 Ark. 326, 57 N. W. 1111, it was held competent to show that a deed to "John Elliott & Amanda Elliott his wife," was a deed to John Elliott and a woman named Amanda Elliott, whom he had married illegally and was living with as his wife, although he had a lawful wife living, also named Amanda Elliott.

Parol evidence is admissible in a case of a deed to Elijah Wheedon, where there were two persons, a father and son, by this name, to show which was meant, although the son was commonly designated as Elijah Wheedon, Jr.; this situation amounts to a latent ambiguity which parol evidence is competent to explain. Coit v. Starkweather (1830) 8 Conn. 289.

Parol evidence was held competent in Peabody v. Brown (1857) 10 Gray (Mass.) 45, to show that a deed to "Hiram Dowling, cordwainer," was intended for the father by that name, and not for his son of the same name, who was only thirteen years of age at the date of the deed. But the situation is held to create a latent ambiguity, opening the case for parol evidence.

Where the name of a grantee in a deed is equally applicable to father or son, parol evidence is admissible to show that the grantee intended was the son, although he was commonly designated with the term "Jr."

added to his name. Simpson v. Dix (1881) 131 Mass. 179.

In Begg v. Begg (1883) 56 Wis. 534, 14 N. W. 602, parol evidence was held admissible to show whether a father or son was the real grantee of a deed, where it was in evidence that, by usage, at least, the father was designated as "senior" and the son as "junior." The court says that as such affixes are no part of the name so as to render identity absolutely certain on the face of the deed, and as neither was used in this deed, it is immaterial, other than as a fact which might be shown with other evidence in order to prove which of the two was intended.

But where the father resides at one place and the son at another, a deed in which the grantee named might apply to either the father or son, if that alone were given, is not explainable by parol evidence, where the residence of the son is added. Babcock v. Pettibone (1874) 12 Blatchf. 354, Fed. Cas. No. 700; Barton v. Babcock (1871) 28 Wis. 192.

W. A. E.

YOSEMITE LUMBER COMPANY et al., Plffs. in Certiorari,
v.
INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

California Supreme Court (In Banc)—January 27, 1922.

(— Cal. —, 204 Pac. 226.)

Constitutional law — extent of authority conferred — support of workmen's compensation system.

1. Constitutional power to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation does not authorize the creation of a liability on any person to pay such compensation, or require any person to contribute funds to support the system.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1001.]

— judicial power — determination of liability to workmen.

2. The power to determine whether or not a liability exists to compensate a workman for injury is judicial.

[See 28 R. C. L. 824.]

Workmen's compensation — jurisdiction of commission — extent.

3. Under a constitutional provision authorizing determination by an industrial accident commission of disputes arising under legislation authorized by it, the jurisdiction of the commission cannot be extended beyond such disputes.

Constitutional law — requiring compensation of workmen.

4. Plenary power conferred by the Constitution to create and enforce a liability upon persons to compensate their workmen and their dependents for losses caused by injuries and death does not authorize the creation of a liability to compensate workmen of other persons.

— authority to create department of rehabilitation.

5. Constitutional authority to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, and enforce liability on the part of all persons to compensate their workmen and their dependents for loss by injury or death, does not authorize the creation of a state department for rehabilitation of disabled employees generally, to which an employer must contribute in case of the death of one of his workmen without dependents.

Tax — provision for rehabilitation of injured workmen.

6. A provision that an employer shall, in case of death in the course of his employment of one of his workmen without dependents, pay a certain sum into a state fund to be used for rehabilitation of injured workmen generally, and to pay the expenses of the industrial accident bureau, imposes a tax.

Constitutional law — delegation of judicial power — validity.

7. The legislature cannot confer judicial power upon the Industrial Accident Commission further than is authorized by the Constitution, where that instrument limits the power of the legislature to create new courts or judicial tribunals.

[See 28 R. C. L. 749.]

— authority to confer power on commission — limitation.

8. A provision of a constitutional amendment designed to establish a minimum wage for women and children, to the effect that the legislature may provide for the general welfare of all employees, and that no provision of this Constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon legislative authority to confer upon any commission such power and authority as the legislature may deem requisite to carry out the provisions of this section, does not empower the legislature to create a fund for industrial rehabilitation of injured employees generally, and confer upon the Industrial Accident Commission authority to hear and determine controversies as to distribution of that fund.

CERTIORARI to the Industrial Accident Commission to review its order awarding compensation for the death of an employee of the defendant lumber company to the state, in a proceeding by it under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, for such payment. Award annulled.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Messrs. A. E. Bolton and Arthur W. Bolton for plaintiffs in certiorari.

Messrs. Adolphus E. Graupner, U. S. Webb, and Warren H. Pillsbury for defendants in certiorari.

Shaw, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding in certiorari, under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act (Stat. 1917, p. 831), to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission requiring the Yosemite Lumber Company to pay to the state of California the sum of $350 for the death of John Moore, who was killed by an injury arising out of and in the course of said employment, because of the further fact that he left no dependents surviving him. The order was made under the authority of the Act of 1919, Stat. 1919, p. 273. The sole question for decision, as we view the case, is whether or not the said act gives the commission jurisdiction to adjudicate the liability of the employer to the state.

The act provides that when an employee receives a fatal injury, of a kind that is compensable under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, and "does not leave surviving him any person entitled to a death benefit, the employer . . . shall pay into the treasury of the state of California the sum of $350 for each such fatal injury in addition to any other payments under the provisions of said Compensation Act," not exceeding three times the average annual earnings of such employee, and that the moneys so paid "shall be covered into a special fund to be known as the 'industrial rehabilitation fund,' which fund is hereby created and appropriated for the purposes set forth in this act." Section 1.

It further declares that said fund may be used by the Industrial Accident Commission "for the promotion of vocational re-education and rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry in this state" (§ 2); that the remainder of the fund which may be left after the commission shall have used so much thereof as they deem best in such promotion shall be placed, "semiannually, to the credit of the accident prevention fund, established by said Compensation Act" (§ 3; also § 51, Compensation Act, Stat. 1917, p. 865). When $5,000 "shall have been accumulated in said fund," it is to be deposited "with the state compensation insurance fund as a revolving fund." From this "revolving fund" the payments so required by the aforesaid §§ 1, 2, and 3 are to be made, on the order of the Industrial Accident Commission, and the "state treasurer shall from time to time, upon the order of the commission, reimburse said state compensation insurance fund from the industrial rehabilitation fund for expenditures made from said revolving fund." The expenses of administration of the state compensation insurance fund in carrying out the duties imposed by the act are also "to be paid from said state industrial rehabilitation fund," all under the direction of the commission. Section 4. The commission is given jurisdiction to determine the liability of such employer and to require the payment by him of the $350 to the state in such cases, by proceedings before it in the same manner as provided in the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act; "provided further" that at any time after it is paid into the state treasury, any person claiming to be a dependent of the employee may establish such dependency to the satisfaction of the commission, and thereupon the state may be required to pay to said dependent the said $350, or whatever thereof is necessary to meet his claim. Sections 5 and 6.

The accident prevention fund referred to is used to support the "department of safety" carried on by the Industrial Accident Commission. Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 33 to 52. The state compensation insurance fund mentioned is established by the Workmen's Compensation Act for the purpose of enabling the commission to carry on the business of an insurance carrier for employers, with respect to their liability under the act.

It will be seen from these provisions that the act makes no provision for compensation by the employer to the person injured, or to the dependents of such person. The "compensation" contemplated by the act is only to be made when the workman who is killed by the injury leaves no dependents to be compensated, and it goes to other persons not related to the deceased workman or connected with his employer. It goes to the state to enable it to carry on a benevolent enterprise for the benefit of a class of workmen throughout the state, and to provide funds for the insurance bureau of the Industrial Accident Commission. The true intent of the act is to provide for the creation of a general fund for these purposes.

The proceeding in which the order or award in question was made was begun by the state of California after the death of John Moore. In its petition it averred that Moore left surviving him no person dependent on him for support, or any person entitled to a death benefit under the Compensation Act, and that, on account thereof, $350 was owing by the Yosemite Lumber Company to the state, under and by virtue of said Act of 1919. The Act of 1919 purports to confer upon the commission the power to make orders determining and enforcing the liability which the act creates. It is contended on behalf of the commission that legislative authority to confer such power upon the commission is found in § 21, article 20, of the Constitution, as amended in 1918. This claim is contested by the petitioner, who asserts that it has no such effect.

Prior to the amendment of 1918, § 21 of article 20 read as follows: "The legislature may by appropriate legislation create and enforce a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employees for any injury incurred by the said employees in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of either party. The legislature may provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under the legislation contemplated by this section, by arbitration, or by an industrial accident board, by the courts, or by either, any or all of these agencies, anything in this Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding."

The following is the section as amended in 1918 (see Stat. 1919, p. lxxv.):

"The legislature is hereby expressly vested with plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation, and in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any or all persons to compensate any or all of their workmen for injury or disability, and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of any party. A complete system of workmen's compensation includes adequate provisions for the comfort, health and safety and general welfare of any and all workmen and those dependent upon them for support to the extent of relieving from the consequences of any injury or death incurred or sustained by workmen in the course of their employment, irrespective of the fault of any party; also full provision for securing safety in places of employment; full provision for such medical, surgical, hospital and other remedial treatment as is requisite to cure and relieve from the effects of such injury; full provision for adequate insurance coverage against liability to pay or furnish compensation; full provision for regulating such insurance coverage in all its aspects, including the establishment and management of a state compensation insurance fund; full provision for otherwise securing the payment of compensation; and full provision for vesting power, authority and jurisdiction in an administrative body with all the requisite governmental functions to determine any dispute or matter arising under such legislation, to the end that the administration of such legislation shall accomplish substantial justice in all cases expeditiously, inexpensively, and without encumbrance of any character; all of which matters are expressly declared to be the social public policy of this state, binding upon all departments of the state government.

"The legislature is vested with plenary powers, to provide for the settlement of any disputes arising under such legislation by arbitration, or by an industrial accident commission, by the courts, or by either, any, or all of these agencies, either separately or in combination, and may fix and control the method and manner of trial of any such dispute, the rules of evidence and the manner of review of decisions rendered by the tribunal or tribunals designated by it; provided, that all decisions of any such tribunal shall be subject to review by the appellate courts of this state. The legislature may combine in one statute all the provisions for a complete system of workmen's compensation, as herein defined.

"Nothing contained herein shall be taken or construed to impair or render ineffectual in any measure the creation and existence of the Industrial Accident Commission of this state or the state compensation insurance fund, the creation and existence of which, with all the functions vested in them, are hereby ratified and confirmed."

The power to determine whether or not the liability referred to in the first paragraph of the above section and imposed by this law exists against any person is judicial power. Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 411, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390; Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 322, 153 Pac. 24; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 579, 158 Pac. 218; Marin Water & Power Co. v. Railroad Commission, 171 Cal. 712, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114. It is claimed that the new section authorizes the creation of a liability on employers in favor of the state for the benefit of workmen in general, and that it gives the legislature power to confer on the Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction to determine disputes concerning such liability. The second paragraph of the section is the part which purports to give this power, if it is contained anywhere in the section. It gives no authority to create a tribunal for any other purpose or with any other judicial power than to settle the "disputes arising under such legislation," referring to the legislation provided for in the first paragraph of the section. It is therefore apparent that, when we have ascertained the kind and character of the disputes that may arise under the legislation authorized by the first part of the section, we have found the limits beyond which the judicial power and jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission cannot go.

Constitutional law—judicial power—determination of liability to workmen.

Workmen's compensation—jurisdiction of commission—extent.

The first grant to the legislature by the new section is the grant of power "to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation." This does not authorize the creation of a liability on any person to pay such "compensation," or require any person to contribute funds to support the proposed system. It does not purport to touch upon the subject of liabilities.

Constitutional law—extent of authority conferred—support of workmen's compensation system.

The next phrase of the new section empowers the legislature "in that behalf to create and enforce a liability on the part of any or all persons, or the dependents of of their workmen for injury or disability, and their dependents for death incurred or sustained by the said workmen in the course of their employment." This does not authorize the creation of a liability on the part of any person to compensate the workmen of other persons, or the dependents of workmen of other persons. The phrase "their workmen" necessarily confines the persons to be compensated to workmen who are in the employ of the person who is made liable. This is also shown by the provision that if the workman is killed by an injury in the course of his employment, the compensation is to be made to his "dependents," thus excluding any idea of liability in such a case to provide for the welfare of workmen in general, or of a particular class of disabled workmen, in no way connected with the employer who is made liable for the particular injury. Nothing is added to the force of the provision by the use of the word "plenary." If the legislature has power to do a certain thing, its power to do it is always plenary. It is merely surplus verbiage.

—requiring compensation of workmen.

The use in this clause of the words "any and all persons," in describing those made liable, and the words "any and all of their workmen," in describing those to be compensated, do not show an intent to empower the legislature to enlarge the liability against a particular employer for a particular injury so as to include compensation to workmen in general as a class, or a contribution to a fund to be applied to the benefit of a class of persons, instead of to the dependents of the workman who may be killed by the injury.

Nor is such enlarged meaning given to the section by the use of the phrase "complete system of workmen's compensation," in the opening clause, or by the elaborate definition of that phrase which follows the first sentence. The section mentions and describes but one kind of liability: The liability of "any or all persons" to compensate "any or all of their workmen." This is in effect a provision for any person to compensate his workmen, which is but another form of saying that any employer shall compensate his employee for an injury arising out of the employment, or the dependents of such employee, if the injury causes death to him. The language of neither one of these parts of the section shows or expresses an intent to add another liability to that expressly stated. In these circumstances the maxim, "expressio unius est exclusio alterius," is applicable, and the meaning to be inferred is that only which is explicitly stated. And particularly it should not be inferred or implied from such language that so novel and different a thing was intended as the liability to the state which is imposed by the Act of 1919.

That there was no such thought in the minds of those who framed the amendment, or of the legislature that proposed it, is clearly indicated by the argument in favor of the amendment in the pamphlet distributed to the voters with the ballot at the election at which the amendment was adopted. The amendment was proposed by the legislature of 1917. Under § 1195 of the Political Code, when the legislature proposes an amendment to the Constitution, to —authority to create department of rehabilitation.

be voted upon by the electors of the state, the author of such amendment and one member of the same house who voted with the majority in submitting the same shall be appointed as a committee to draft an argument giving the reasons for the adoption of such amendment. This argument is to be printed in a pamphlet and distributed to the voters with the sample ballot, to be used by the voter in preparing his vote and in studying the questions upon which he is to act. Pol. Code, § 1195a. It is to be assumed that the arguments prepared by the author of the amendment state fairly and with reasonable fullness the meaning of the amendment and the effect it is expected to produce. The argument printed and distributed with the ballot upon the amendment here under consideration refers to the fact that the Workmen's Compensation Act had been in force for several years; that § 21 of the Constitution, as it was, "failed to express sanction for the requisite scope of the enactment to make a complete and workable plan," which plan embraced, as essential components, compulsory compensation for injury and death irrespective of fault, safety provisions, insurance by the state, and administration of the system, and it then states that the original section contained nothing covering safety or insurance, and only meager authority for administration; that the law in force had apparently exceeded the scope of the amendment authorizing it, and that the amendment was designed to give authority for the legislation already enacted and to sanction the plan then in existence. This obviously refers to the extensive revision of the original Workmen's Compensation Act that was enacted at the same session, as well as to the original act, neither of which attempted to create such a liability as that provided by the Act of 1919. There is no suggestion in the argument that the proposed amended section was intended to authorize the legislature to impose any liability upon employers of a character different from that already provided by the original section, and nothing to suggest to any voter the idea that it was for carrying on a system for the benefit of disabled workmen in general, or for the levy of contributions to support such system upon employers in whose service men having no dependents were killed by injuries received in the course of their employment. It cannot be supposed that the author of the amendment, or the legislature that proposed it, intended to provide for such a scheme as that contained in the Act of 1919 by language so illy adapted to suggest the idea as that contained in this section, and that the voters should be inveigled into voting for it by an argument presented to them with the ballot which does not even mention it.

In so far as the act purports to exact from employers a sum to be used by the state for disabled workmen in general, it is in reality a taxing law,—a revenue measure. It requires any employer to pay to the state the sum of $350 whenever one of his workmen who has no dependents is killed by an injury received in the course of his employment, and the fund thus raised is to be used for vocational re-education of workmen not connected in any way with such employer, and the surplus, if any, to go to pay the expenses of the state in carrying on the department or bureau administered by the Industrial Accident Commission, all of which are public purposes. This is purely a tax. "A tax is a charge upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes." Perry v. Washburn, 20 Cal. 350. A tax "includes every charge upon persons or property, imposed by or under the authority of the legislature, for public purposes." Madera v. Black, 181 Cal. 310, 184 Pac. 400; 1 Cooley, Taxn. p. 6. The amended section of the Constitution contains no suggestion of a design to provide for raising revenue by a tax of such an extraordinary character as this statute proposes. We need not consider the question whether, as a tax, it would not be void because of its unfair discrimination. We are of the opinion that the language of the section gives no warrant for the conclusion that it was intended to provide for taxation of any kind.

Tax—provision for rehabilitation of injured workmen.

Our conclusion is that § 21 of article 20, as amended in 1918, did not authorize the legislature to impose a liability on an employer to pay money to the state for the purposes specified in the Act of 1919. It follows by necessity that said section gives no authority to the legislature to confer on the Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction to determine any dispute that may arise concerning the liability of employers, sought to be imposed by said Act of 1919. It may be conceded that, under its general powers, the legislature might provide a fund for the benefit of persons disabled in industry in this state, and commit the administration of the fund to the Industrial Accident Commission, and might also levy a tax in some form to raise such fund. But any disputes that might arise concerning such tax would be cognizable only by the courts established by or under the provisions of article 6 of the Constitution, since no section of the Constitution gives the legislature power to confer jurisdiction thereof upon the Industrial Accident Commission. Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 322, 153 Pac. 24; Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 Pac. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 579, 158 Pac. 218; Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Industrial Acci. Commission, 177 Cal. 775, 171 Pac. 935.

Counsel for the commission cite the case of State Industrial Commission v. Newman, 222 N. Y. 363, 118 N. E. 794, as contrary to our views as aforesaid. The case is not in point. The Constitution of New York contains no provision limiting the power of the legislature of that state to create new courts or tribunals, such as are contained in our article 6. The question which we have discussed—that is, the power of the legislature to confer judicial power of this character upon the Industrial Accident Commission—could not arise in New York, for that state has not the constitutional limitations upon the legislative power to create courts which give rise to the question here and control our decision thereof.

Constitutional law—delegation of judicial power—validity.

It is further claimed that authority for the imposition of this liability and for the giving of this jurisdiction to the commission is found in § 17½ of article 20, which reads as follows: "The legislature may, by appropriate legislation, provide for the establishment of a minimum wage for women and minors and may provide for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of any and all employees. No provision of this Constitution shall be construed as a limitation upon the authority of the legislature to confer upon any commission now or hereafter created, such power and authority as the legislature may deem requisite to carry out the provisions of this section."

The arguments printed on the ballot for the election of 1914, at which this section was adopted, indicate that its main purpose was to authorize the establishment of a minimum wage for women and minors. Nothing whatever is said in the arguments upon any other subject except that there is a suggestion that all employers, bad as well as good, should be compelled to provide proper living and working conditions for their employees. The part of the section authorizing the legislature to "provide for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of employees" was, as we think, intended to refer to the comfort, health, safety, and welfare of employees during the time of their employment, and to have no reference to general provisions, such as are here involved, for the vocational re-education of those who have been injured and are not able to pursue their former occupation. It certainly furnishes no authority and has no reference to authority for giving the Industrial Accident Commission power to enforce the levy of contributions upon employers for the purpose of raising revenue with which to carry on a school for the re-education of employees, or for any other state purpose.

—authority to confer power on commission—limitation.

We find no ground upon which the jurisdiction of the commission can be upheld. Many other objections are made to the constitutionality of the act, but, in view of the conclusion above stated, we deem it unnecessary to consider them.

It is ordered that the award of the Industrial Accident Commission aforesaid be annulled.

We concur: Lennon, J.; Sloane, J.; Wilbur, J., Shurtleff, J.

I concur in the judgment: Lallor, J.

Petition for rehearing denied February 23, 1922.

ANNOTATION.

Constitutionality of provision of Workmen's Compensation Act for contribution to general fund in absence of dependents of deceased workman.

It will be observed that in the reported case (YOSEMITE LUMBER CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCI. COMMISSION, ante, 994) a provision of the Compensation Act for the payment, in case of the death of an employee leaving no dependents, of a certain amount into the state treasury, in addition to any other payments under the act, for the purpose of establishing an industrial rehabilitation fund for disabled workmen in general, was held not within the power of the legislature under constitutional amendments giving it power to create "a liability on the part of all employers to compensate their employees for any injury incurred by the said employees in the course of their employment," to create "a complete system of workmen's compensation," and to "create and enforce a liability on the part of any and all persons to compensate any or all of their workmen for injury or disability and their dependents." The court takes the view that the provision of the act in question is in reality a taxing law or revenue measure.

There is little direct authority on the question under consideration.

In State Industrial Commission v. Newman (1918) 222 N. Y. 363, 118 N. E. 794, where a division of the Compensation Act provided that if an employee who had previously incurred permanent partial disability through the loss of specified members incurred permanent total disability through the loss of other members, he should be paid, in addition to the compensation provided for partial disability, certain additional compensation out of a special fund created by the payment of a certain sum by the insurance carrier to the state treasurer in every case of injury causing death in which there were no persons entitled to compensation, it was held that this provision was authorized by and did not violate art. 1, § 19, of the New York Constitution, providing that nothing contained in the Constitution should be construed to limit the power of the legislature to enact laws for the payment either by employers, or by employers and employees, or otherwise, either directly or through a state or other system of insurance or otherwise, of compensation for injuries to employees, or for death of employees resulting from injuries. The court said: "An historical statement will indicate the approach to a correct determination of the question presented. In 1910, a legislative act entitled, 'An Act to Amend the Labor Law in Relation to Workmen's Compensation in Certain Dangerous Employments,' became a law. It was the forerunner of, and in general purpose and character similar to, the existing Workmen's Compensation Law. Laws 1910, chap. 674. In March, 1911, we adjudged it invalid, because it infringed certain provisions of the state Constitution, which then did not contain the section (§ 19 of article 1) we have referred to and in part quoted. That section was duly adopted on November 4, 1913, and, of course, became effective January 1, 1914. In March, 1914, the present Workmen's Compensation Law was finally enacted. Laws 1914, chap. 41. It did not then contain the provisions, here involved, of subd. 7 of § 15. In November, 1915, we decided that a claimant who became an employee under the act, having theretofore lost a hand, became entitled, upon the loss of the remaining hand while such employee, to the compensation for permanent total disability, and not to the lesser compensation for permanent partial disability. Schwab v. Emporium Forestry Co. 216 N. Y. 712, 111 N. E. 1099. Our decision related to a claim arising in July, 1914, and affirmed the decision of the appellate division, rendered May 5, 1915. Schwab v. Emporium Forestry Co. 167 App. Div. 614, 153 N. Y. Supp. 234. Manifestly the law was a hindrance to those who, having lost a hand or other member, sought to become employees under the act, because the loss of the remaining member subjected the employer to the payment of a compensation substantially greater than it would in case the employee had the two members. After the decision of the appellate division, the legislature, by an amendment to subdivision 6 of § 15, enacted 'Aat: 'An employee who is suffering from a previous disability shall not receive compensation for a later injury in excess of the compensation allowed for such injury when considered by itself and not in conjunction with the previous disability.' Laws 1915, chap. 615. The provisions of § 15 were supplemented in 1916 by the addition of subd. 7, which we have already quoted. The evident and clear purpose of the subdivision was to remove a condition, as between employers and partially disabled employees, inconsonant with the spirit of the act and, perhaps, unjust, through the creation of a state fund contributed to by the insurance carriers, and, as the permanent total disability arose, accessible to any member of the entire prescribed class of employees so disabled. Its provisions are within the letter and spirit of the Constitution. The act requires each employer within its provisions to secure the prescribed compensation to his employees in one of the following ways: (1) By insuring and keeping insured the payment of such compensation through the state fund; or (2) through any stock corporation or mutual association authorized to transact the business of workmen's compensation insurance in the state; or (3) securing from the State Industrial Commission in the stated manner permission to be a self-insurer. Section 50. The term 'insurance carrier' of subd. 7 of § 15 includes the state fund, the stock corporations or mutual associations, and the self-insurer. Section 3, subd. 12. All employers, therefore, contribute under identical conditions to the special fund of said subd. 7,—those utilizing the state fund or the stock or mutual associations through the insurance premiums contributed to the fund or association, and the self-insurers by payments directly. The special fund is exclusively distributed among the employees of those who contribute. Its creation and use are not different in principle from those of the state fund or the funds of the associations constituted of the premiums received. In the last analysis all compensation to the employees of the employers paying those premiums is not paid by the employer to his employees, but from the aggregated and indiscriminate funds. From those funds the awarded compensation is directly paid to the employees or dependents, or reimbursement for payments by employers is made to them. Sections 53, 54, 25, 26. In Jensen v. Southern P. Co. (1915) 215 N. Y. 514, L.R.A.1916A, 403, 109 N. E. 600, Ann. Cas. 1916B, 276, 9 N. C. C. A. 286, we expressed the conclusions that the scheme of the act is essentially and fundamentally the creation of a state fund from premiums paid by employers to insure or effect the payment of a prescribed compensation for disability or death from accidental injuries sustained by employees engaged in certain enumerated hazardous employments, and that the act was amply sustained by the Constitution. Subdivision 7 is well within the scheme."

In Watkinson v. Hotel Pennsylvania (1921) 195 App. Div. 624, 187 N. Y. Supp. 278, affirmed in (1921) 231 N. Y. 562, 132 N. E. 889, a provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act for the payment to the state treasurer in every case of injury to an employee, causing death, in which there are no persons entitled to compensation, of the sum of $900, to be held by the state treasurer as custodian, and conferring on the Industrial Commission the distribution thereof, was held not to be unconstitutional, as violating the due process of law, just compensation, or equal protection of law clauses, and it was held that the amount fixed was not unfair or unreasonable. It was also stated that a provision for the payment of $100 to the state treasurer where a deceased employee left no dependents was valid, and the above provisions of the Compensation Act were further held not to be rendered invalid by the Rehabilitation Law, accepting appropriations by the United States for vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons.

And in Salt Lake City v. Industrial Commission (1921) — Utah, —, 18 A.L.R. 259, 199 Pac. 152, it was held that a provision requiring an employer carrying his own insurance to pay a certain amount into the state treasury in case of death of an employee without dependents, to provide a fund for compensating employees suffering a second disability, which, when combined with the first, causes injuries greater than the compensation provided for the disability from the second injury alone, does not deprive the employer of the equal protection of the laws, or deprive him of his property without due process of law, where he is privileged to insure in the state fund if he chooses to do so. (The question of the constitutionality and construction of provisions directed against noninsuring employers is considered in the annotation appended to this case in 18 A.L.R. 259.)

J. T. W.

STATE OF INDIANA, Appt.,

v.

WILLIAM DAILEY et al.

Indiana Supreme Court — March 17, 1922.

(— Ind. —, 134 N. E. 481.)

Homicide — necessity of death within a year and a day.

1. Death must occur within a year and a day after infliction of the wound to constitute murder, under a statute merely providing for the punishment of that crime.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1006.]

— punishment of murder — definition. ment of murder refers to that crime
2. A statute providing for punish- as it existed at common law.

APPEAL by the State from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Clark County (Fortune, J.) sustaining a motion to quash an indictment charging defendants with the crime of murder. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. U. S. Lesh, Attorney General, for the State.

Messrs. Charles D. Kelso and Warren B. Allison, for appellees:

The common law governs in Indiana except in cases where its application is restricted or entirely prohibited by express statutory provisions.

Dunville v. State, 188 Ind. 373, 123 N. E. 689.

When a public offense has been declared by statute, and punishment fixed therefor, without definition, the courts will resort to the common law and the general import of the language used, to determine the sufficiency of the charge within the general terms of the statute.

State v. Patton, 159 Ind. 251, 64 N. E. 850.

The law conclusively presumes that death results from some other cause if the death does not take place within a year and a day after the felonious blow was struck, and neither the court nor the jury can draw a contrary one.

Archer v. State, 106 Ind. 432, 7 N.

E. 225; Gillett, Crim. Law, 2d ed. § 510; Clark, Crim. Law, p. 130; 21 Cyc. 702, 848; Com. v. Macloon, 101 Mass. 1, 100 Am. Dec. 89; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 93; State v. Orrell, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 189, 17 Am. Dec. 563; Thomas v. State, 67 Ga. 460; Percer v. State, 118 Tenn. 765, 103 S. W. 780; Clark v. Com. 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 440; People v. Aro, 6 Cal. 207, 65 Am. Dec. 503; People v. Kelly, 6 Cal. 210; State v. Mayfield, 66 Mo. 125; Hughes, Crim. Law & Proc. § 15, note 22; 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. § 533; 1 Whart. Crim. Law, 11th ed. § 436.

Myers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellees, by indictment duly returned in the Clark circuit court, were charged with the crime of murder. Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 2235. A separate and several motion by each appellee to quash the indictment was sustained, and judgment of release followed. The state appealed, and has assigned as error the action of the court in quashing the indictment as to each appellee.

The indictment in substance charged that appellee Gaunt, on November 18, 1917, did unlawfully, feloniously, purposely, and with premeditated malice strike Charles Orem with a dangerous and deadly weapon, thereby inflicting a mortal wound, from which mortal wound so inflicted Charles Orem, on January 21, 1919, died, and that appellee William Dailey, before the commission of the felony aforesaid, counseled, encouraged, hired, and commanded Gaunt to commit the felony.

The indictment on its face shows that the death of Orem occurred more than a year and two months after the wound was inflicted. The sole question presented by this appeal is, Must death result within a year and a day from the time the wound was given? On this particular question we have no statute. While a prosecution for murder is not barred by any limitation, yet that is not the question here presented. The legislature has enacted that "crimes and misdemeanors shall be defined, and punishment therefor fixed by statutes of this state and not otherwise." Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 287. This enactment has been in force since 1852, and is an exception ingrafted upon the act adopting the common law. Thus rests the support for the ruling that no common-law crimes, punishable as such, exist in this state (Ledgerwood v. State, 134 Ind. 81, 33 N. E. 631; State v. Terre Haute Brewing Co. 186 Ind. 248, 115 N. E. 772; McDaniels v. State, 185 Ind. 245, 113 N. E. 1004; Woodsmall v. State, 181 Ind. 613, 105 N. E. 155, 899; Hinshaw v. State, 188 Ind. 147, 122 N. E. 418), although by § 236, Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, "the common law, together with acts passed by the British Parliament in aid thereof, prior to the fourth year of the reign of James I., is, by adoption, in force, and prevails in this state so far as applicable, and when not inconsistent with our fundamental laws, state or Federal, and not inconsistent with the acts of our own legislature or statutes enacted by Congress" (Sopher v. State, 169 Ind. 177, 182, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 172, 81 N. E. 914, 14 Ann. Cas. 27).

In the instant case the crime is designated murder, and punishment therefor is fixed. Section 2335, supra. The word "murder" had a definite and well-defined meaning in law long before this statute was enacted.

Homicide—punishment of murder—
definition.

Consequently it logically follows that the offense designated as murder at common law is such under our statute. In Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. v. Clarke, 152 U. S. 230, 38 L. ed. 422, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 579, the court had under consideration a statute of this state, authorizing the personal representative of one whose death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another to maintain an action for damages against the one so causing the death, if commenced within two years. Burns's Anno. Stat. 1914, § 285. In that case counsel for plaintiff in error insisted that § 285, supra, should be construed as giving the right of action to such representative in case his decedent died from the effects of the wound so received by him within a year and a day thereafter, for the reason that the "law does not look upon such a wound as the cause of a man's death, 'after which he lives so long.'" The court did not agree with this contention. It held, as did this court, that § 285, supra, created a new cause of action, and was in derogation of the common law, and allowed two years after such death within which to commence it. In that case the court observed: "In cases of murder the rule at common law undoubtedly was that no person should be adjudged, 'by any act whatever, to kill another who does not die by it within a year and a day thereafter; in computation whereof the whole day on which the hurt was done shall be reckoned first.' 1 Hawk. P. C. chap. 13, id. bk. 2, chap. 23, § 88; 4 Bl. Com. 197, 306. The reason assigned for that rule was that, if the person alleged to have been murdered 'die after that time, it cannot be discerned, as the law presumes, whether he died of the stroke or poison, etc., or a natural death; and in case of life, a rule of law ought to be certain.' 3 Inst. 53. And such is the rule in this country in prosecutions for murder, except in jurisdictions where it may be otherwise prescribed by statute. Whart. Am. Crim. Law, § 1073; State v. Orrell, 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 139, 17 Am. Dec. 563."

In this state we have no statute in contravention of the common-law rule that a party must die within a year and a day after the wound is inflicted in order to make the killing either murder or manslaughter. Therefore if by analogy we may reason from the rule that, where a statute creates a crime by name without defining it, the court may do so by the aid of common-law definitions (State v. Patton, 159 Ind. 248, 251, 64 N. E. 850; Hopewell v. State, 22 Ind. App. 489, 492, 54 N. E. 127), then we might as readily say that the legislature, by its silence on the subject of time between the giving of the wound and the death, intended that the common-law ^{necessity of death within a year and a day.} rule of a year and a day should govern, and we so hold. Eppe v. State, 102 Ind. 539, 553, 1 N. E. 491, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 517; Moore's Crim. Law, § 849; Gillett, Crim. Law, § 510.

Other jurisdictions having statutes creating and defining the crime of murder very similar to ours, and no statute on the question now under consideration, have with one accord held that time is as essential now as at common law, because to sustain the charge it is necessary that it appear that the death occurred within a year and a day of the infliction of the alleged mortal wound. State v. Mayfield, 66 Mo. 125; State v. Testerman, 68 Mo. 408; State v. Sides, 64 Mo. 383; Edmondson v. State, 41 Tex. 496, 498; Hardin v. State, 4 Tex. App. 355, 370; Com. v. Parker, 2 Pick. 550, 558; Com. v. Robertson, 162 Mass. 90, 97, 38 N. E. 25; Percer v. State, 118 Tenn. 765, 777, 103 S. W. 780; State v. Bantley, 44 Conn. 537, 26 Am. Rep. 486, 489; State v. Orrell, supra; Brassfield v. State, 55 Ark. 556, 18 S. W. 1040; 21 Cyc. 702; 13 R. C. L. 747, § 52.

Judgment affirmed.

ANNOTATION.

Homicide as affected by time elapsing between wound and death.

The rule that death must ensue within a year and a day from the infliction of a mortal wound, in order to constitute homicide, obtains generally throughout the United States, deriving its support in some jurisdictions from the common law, in some from a statutory enactment which expressly includes this element in the definition of homicide, and in some from the rule announced in the reported case (STATE v. DAILEY, ante, 1004), to the effect that, where a statute creates a crime by name without defining it, the courts may do so by the aid of common-law definitions. Thus, in each of the following cases, the court has declared the rule to be that, in order to constitute criminal homicide by the unlawful taking by one human being of the life of another, it must appear that the death occurred within a year and a day from the time of giving the mortal wound:

Arizona.—Roberts v. State (1915) 17 Ariz. 159, 149 Pac. 380.

Arkansas.—Kee v. State (1872) 28 Ark. 155, 2 Am. Crim. Rep. 263; Brassfield v. State (1892) 55 Ark. 556, 18 S. W. 1040; Fisher v. State (1913) 109 Ark. 456, 160 S. W. 210.

See also Glover v. State (1915) 116 Ark. 588, 172 S. W. 876.

California. — People v. Kelly (1856) 6 Cal. 210; People v. Wallace (1858) 9 Cal. 30; People v. Cox (1858) 9 Cal. 32; People v. Steventon (1858) 9 Cal. 273; People v. Murphy (1870) 39 Cal. 52. See also People v. Aro (1856) 6 Cal. 207, 65 Am. Dec. 503; People v. Coleman (1858) 10 Cal. 334.

Connecticut. — State v. Bantley (1877) 44 Conn. 537, 26 Am. Rep. 486.

Indiana.—Epps v. State (1885) 102 Ind. 539, 1 N. E. 491, 5 Am. Crim. Rep. 517. And see the reported case (STATE v. DAILEY, ante, 1004).

Kentucky.—See Jane v. Com. (1860) 3 Met. 18; Rose v. Com. (1914) 156 Ky. 817, 162 S. W. 107.

Louisiana. — State v. Kennedy (1845) 8 Rob. 590.

Maine.—State v. Conley (1854) 39 Me. 78.

Massachusetts.—Com. v. Parker (1824) 2 Pick. 550; Com. v. Macloon (1869) 101 Mass. 1, 100 Am. Dec. 89; Com. v. Robertson (1894) 162 Mass. 90, 38 N. E. 25. See also Com. v. Snell (1905) 189 Mass. 12, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1019, 75 N. E. 75.

Michigan.—See Chapman v. People (1878) 39 Mich. 357.

Missouri.—Lester v. State (1846) 9 Mo. 666; State v. Sides (1877) 64 Mo. 383; State v. Borders (1917) — Mo. —, 199 S. W. 180; State v. Reakey (1876) 1 Mo. App. 3. See also State v. Mayfield (1877) 66 Mo. 125; State v. Testerman (1878) 68 Mo. 408.

Montana.—State v. Keerl (1904) 29 Mont. 508, 101 Am St. Rep. 579, 75 Pac. 362.

Nebraska.—See Debney v. State (1895) 45 Neb. 856, 34 L.R.A. 851, 64 N. W. 446.

Nevada.—State v. Anderson (1868) 4 Nev. 729; State v. Huff (1876) 11 Nev. 17; State v. Williams (1909) 31 Nev. 360, 102 Pac. 974.

North Carolina.—State v. Orrell (1826) 12 N. C. (1 Dev. L.) 139, 17 Am. Dec. 563; State v. Shepherd (1847) 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 195; State v. Haney (1872) 67 N. C. 467.

Oregon. — See Bowen v. State (1859) 1 Or. 270.

Tennessee.—Percey v. State (1907) 118 Tenn. 765, 103 S. W. 780.

Texas. — Edmondson v. State (1874) 41 Tex. 496; Hardin v. State (1878) 4 Tex. App. 370.

Virginia. — See Clark v. Com. (1893) 90 Va. 360, 18 S. E. 440.

Washington.—State v. Champoux (1903) 33 Wash. 339, 74 Pac. 557. See also State v. Phillips (1910) 59 Wash. 252, 109 Pac. 1047.

"The requirement that it must appear that the party died within a year and a day is a rule of evidence merely. Unless the party dies within that time, the prosecution will not be permitted to show that he died of the injury received." People v. Murphy (1870) 39 Cal. 52.

The reason for the rule was stated in State v. Orrell (N. C.) supra, as follows: "If such was not the case, that is, if death did not take place within a year and a day of the time of receiving the wound, the law draws the conclusion that it was not the cause of death; and neither the court nor jury can draw a contrary one." In the same case, in discussing the necessity of alleging the time of death in the indictment, the court said: "Nor is it less important to state the time of death, in order to show that the deceased died of the wound given her by the prisoner, within a year and a day after she received it. For, if the death happened beyond that time, the law would presume that it proceeded from some other cause than the wound."

Similarly, in State v. Anderson (Nev.) supra, it was said: "If the shot was fired more than a year and a day before the death, then the law would presume that the party died from some other cause than the wound. No proof of a shooting which took place more than a year and a day before the death of the party would be received, and of course the prisoner could not be in any danger from this source."

In State v. Shepherd (1847) 30

N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 195, it was said that in respect to murder the time of the death is material in but one respect, that is, that it occurred within a year and a day from the wounding, as the law attributes death not happening within a year and a day to some cause other than the wounding.

In construing a statute which provided that, "in order to make the killing either murder or manslaughter, it is requisite that the party die within a year and a day after the stroke received or the cause of death administered," the court in State v. Huff (1876) 11 Nev. 17, said: "The literal import of this language does lend some countenance to the notion that the law is guilty of the absurdity of saying that a malicious killing shall be deemed a harmless or a guilty act according to the length of time the victim survives after receiving the fatal wound. But knowing what the rule of law which the statute recognizes and affirms has always been, we are able to acquit it of such absurdity. It is a rule of evidence merely. Knowing that the real cause of death must be more or less doubtful in all cases where a wound has not proved speedily fatal, the law has wisely set a limit to that inquiry, and has determined that when a wounded party has survived the wound a year and a day, there shall be a conclusive presumption that he died from some other cause. It does not say, 'Notwithstanding you killed him with malice aforethought, you are deemed innocent because he lived a year and a day after you stabbed him;' but what it does say is, 'He lived so long after you stabbed him, I therefore conclude you did not kill him;' or, rather, 'It is so doubtful in such cases what was the cause of death that upon grounds of public policy I have determined never to permit the attempt to show that the wound was the cause.' " M. B.

DENNIS O'SHEA, Respt.,

v.

JOHN L. LAVOY, Appt.

Wisconsin Supreme Court — December 13, 1921.

(— Wis. —, 185 N. W. 525.)

Automobile — injury to guest — liability.

The owner of an automobile is not liable for damages to an invited guest riding therein for injuries sustained by the latter, due to the turning over of the machine because of a defective spring, even though it was a secondhand machine and the spring was repaired with old parts.

[See note on this question beginning on page 1014.]

Headnote by OWEN, J.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Marinette County (Quinlan, J.) in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Owen, J.:

The plaintiff is the father-in-law of the defendant, and is about seventy-two years of age. Both reside at Marinette, Wisconsin. On July 18, 1920, the defendant started in a Chalmers automobile on a trip to Norway, Michigan, for the purpose of bringing home one of his children who had been visiting at that place.

He took with him his wife, two children, his niece, another lady, the plaintiff, and his wife, whom he invited to make the trip with him. The car was a 1915 model. Defendant had purchased it as a second-hand car in 1919. Sometime prior to this date, four leaves of the left front spring broke, and defendant took the car to a garage and had the spring repaired. The broken leaves were the second, third, fourth, and fifth from the bottom; there being seven leaves in the spring. The garage man substituted some old leaves which he had in the shop for the broken ones, and thus repaired the spring. He took some leaves he had in the garage that were a little bit too long, cut off the tapered ends, and fitted them the same length as the ones that were broken. This was regarded as a temporary job, and a new spring was ordered. The garage man told defendant that it would not be good policy to run the car too long with the repaired spring, but that it would be safe as long as he watched himself on the road. The garage man testified that he knew the defendant intended to use the car in an ordinary way, and that he considered it entirely good and adequate, temporarily, for that purpose. He further testified that there was nothing unusual about using a repaired job on a spring temporarily before a new spring arrives. In fact, it was quite common to do that in that vicinity. He further testified that any part of a car that is made of steel is apt to crystallize after four or five years' use. Between the time of the repair of the spring and the trip in question, defendant ran the car a distance of 1,500 miles, making one trip from Marinette to Milwaukee therewith without any mishap.

While on the trip to Norway, they passed over a small bridge near the village of Daggett, Michigan, going at the rate of 15 to 18 miles an hour. Almost immediately thereafter the master (top) leaf of the spring broke very near the front end thereof, where it had no support from the other leaves. This caused the left side of the car to drop down, the fender coming in contact with the tire, which made it impossible to turn the car, which at that time was turned a little to the left, and the car slid a short distance and toppled over the edge of the road and down an embankment, turning completely over, causing injury to the plaintiff to recover damages for which this action was brought.

The defendant testified that when the leaves broke on the former occasion it did not let the fender of the car down onto the front wheel, and that he did not know that such a result would follow from a breaking of the master leaf.

The material allegations of the complaint were to the effect that plaintiff was riding with the defendant in said car as the defendant's invited guest along a public highway, and that said defendant was then and there driving said automobile at an excessive rate of speed, and the said left front spring of the automobile was defective, which fact was well known to the defendant for a long time prior to said date, and which said fact was entirely unknown to this plaintiff; that while it was so driven the said left front spring of said automobile broke, and by reason thereof the said car was thrown over a high embankment, through said defendant's carelessness and negligence. Upon the trial the complaint was amended by striking out the words "at an excessive rate of speed," and the words "at an ordinary rate of speed" were inserted instead, so that the only negligence on the part of the defendant relied upon at the trial was the using of the automobile with the defective spring, which it was alleged was well known to the defendant for a long time prior to said date.

The jury returned a special verdict in which it was found that the defendant was negligent in using the car at the time in question in the condition it then was; that such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries; that no want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff proximately contributed to his injuries; that plaintiff did not voluntarily assume the risk of any danger arising out of the operation, with ordinary care, of defendant's car in the condition in which it was at the time when the trip was commenced; and that the damages sustained by plaintiff were $4,800. Upon this verdict judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. From the judgment so entered defendant brings this appeal.

Messrs. Richmond, Jackman, Wilkie, & Toebeas, for appellant:

The complaint does not state a cause of action because no gross negligence is alleged.

Astin v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 143 Wis. 477, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 158, 128 N. W. 265; Howe v. Corey, 172 Wis. 537, 179 N. W. 791; Greenfield v. Miller, 173 Wis. 184, 12 A.L.R. 982, 180 N. W. 834; Massaletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, L.R.A.1918C, 264, 118 N. E. 168, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088, 18 N. C. C. A. 690; Jones v. Parish, 1 Pinney, 495, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 848; Willard v. Giles, 24 Wis. 319; Burns v. State, 145 Wis. 375, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1081, 128 N. W. 987; Childs v. North Hudson Bldg. & L. Asso. 82 Wis. 460, 33 Am. St. Rep. 57, 52 N. W. 600; Flynn v. Lewis, 231 Mass. 550, 2 A.L.R. 896, 121 N. E. 493; Avery v. Thompson, 117 Me. 120, L.R.A.1918D, 205, 103 Atl. 4; Wellman v. Mead, 93 Vt. 322, 107 Atl. 396; Huddy, Automobiles, p. 890; Epps v. Parish, 26 Ga. App. 399, 106 S. E. 297.

There was no allegation bringing the case within the rule of licensor and licensee.

Greenfield v. Miller, 173 Wis. 184, 180 N. W. 834; Muench v. Heinemann, 119 Wis. 441, 96 N. W. 800, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 221; Taylor v. Northern Coal & Dock Co. 161 Wis. 223, 152 N. W. 465, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 167; Brinilson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 144 Wis. 614, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 359, 129 N. W. 664; Davis v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 58 Wis. 646, 46 Am. Rep. 667, 17 N. W. 406; Vanderbeck v. Hendry, 34 N. J. L. 472; Cahill v. Layton, 57 Wis. 600, 46 Am. Rep. 46, 16 N. W. 1; Dowd v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 84 Wis.

105, 20 L.R.A. 527, 36 Am. St. Rep. 917, 54 N. W. 24, 10 Am. Neg. Cas. 485; Hupfer v. National Distilling Co. 114 Wis. 279, 90 N. W. 191; 29 Cyc. 449; 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1136; Pigeon v. Lane, 80 Conn. 237, 67 Atl. 887, 11 Ann. Cas. 371.

Messrs. George Evans and Martin, Martin, & Martin, for respondent:

The owner of the car is liable for an injury received by his guest due to a defective spring, which condition is unknown to the guest and known to the owner.

Greenfield v. Miller, 173 Wis. 184, 180 N. W. 834; Reiter v. Grober, 173 Wis. 493, 18 A.L.R. 362, 181 N. W. 739; Klein v. Beeten, 169 Wis. 385, 5 A.L.R. 1237, 172 N. W. 736; Patnode v. Foot, 153 App. Div. 494, 138 N. Y. Supp. 221; Gresh v. Wanamaker, 221 Pa. 28, 69 Atl. 1123; Burnham v. Central Auto. Exch. — R. I. —, 67 Atl. 429; Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342; Lochhead v. Jensen, 42 Utah, 99, 129 Pac. 347; Perkins v. Galloway, 194 Ala. 265, L.R.A.1916E, 1190, 69 So. 875; Galloway v. Perkins, 198 Ala. 658, 73 So. 956; Fitzjarrell v. Boyd, 123 Md. 497, 91 Atl. 547; Loftus v. Pelletier, 223 Mass. 63, 111 N. E. 712; Kennedy v. R. & L. Co. 224 Mass. 207, 112 N. E. 872; Massaletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, L.R.A.1918C, 264, 118 N. E. 168, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088, 18 N. C. C. A. 690; Jacobs v. Jacobs, 141 La. 272, 74 So. 992, L.R.A.1917F, 253, 74 So. 992; Avery v. Thompson, 117 Me. 120, L.R.A.1918D, 205, 103 Atl. 4; Roy v. Kirn, 208 Mich. 571, 175 N. W. 475; Barnett v. Levy, 213 Ill. App. 129.

Mr. Gerald F. Clifford also for respondent.

Owen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The automobile is an instrumentality of recent creation, which has rapidly established itself in the desires of the people. No other agency has so effectively appealed to their favor. Nothing contributes so much to the comfort and pleasure, the welfare and happiness, of the family. It has given a new idea to distances and materially enlarged the orbit of individual existence. It affords recreation which appeals to every member of the family, and pleasures which may be indulged by the family unit. It is a minister of health as well as pleasure. It makes the fresh air of the country available to the citizen of the congested city, and brings the pleasures of the city within the reach of the rural inhabitant. There are many who cannot afford to own an automobile. There are few who do not covet the comfort, pleasure, and recreation afforded thereby. It is an act of kindness and consideration for the owner of a car to lend its comfort and pleasure through an invitation extended to his less fortunate neighbor for a ride in the country, to join a picnic party, or to enjoy an evening at the theater in the near-by city. This is a species of hospitality which should be encouraged rather than discouraged, and the law should not couple with this friendly act a duty which makes its exercise an unreasonable hazard. On the other hand he who takes his friends and neighbors into his automobile places them in a high-powered, swiftly moving vehicle, attended with great danger unless handled and operated with a requisite degree of care. He must realize that he has voluntarily received into his keeping the lives and safety of his passengers, and he should not be permitted to trifle therewith, or to renounce all responsibility in such respect.

Upon these general observations, we apprehend there is little difference of opinion either in law or in human conscience. The difficulty arises in announcing in concrete form, with some degree of definiteness and workability, the exact extent and nature of this duty. It is a question that has not been discussed or decided by this court. While there are numerous decisions elsewhere, the question is nevertheless of recent origin, and the courts are not in complete accord in their method of its treatment, although there may not be a great practical divergence in the conclusions reached.

It has been held that the owner of a conveyance is liable to an invited guest, who sustains injuries while riding with him, only for gross negligence. Moffat v. Bateman, L. R. 3 P. C. 115, 22 L. T. N. S. 140, 6 Moore, P. C. N. S. 369; Coughlin v. Gillison [1899] 1 Q. B. 145, 68 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 147, 47 Week. Rep. 113, 79 L. T. N. S. 627; Avery v. Thompson, 117 Me. 120, L.R.A.1918D, 205, 103 Atl. 4, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 1122; Epps v. Parrish, 26 Ga. App. 399, 106 S. E. 297. It has also been held that he is liable for ordinary negligence. Siegrist v. Arnot, 10 Mo. App. 197; Perkins v. Galloway, 194 Ala. 265, L.R.A. 1916E, 1190, 69 So. 875; Mayberry v. Sivey, 18 Kan. 291.

There is a line of cases which hold that the situation gives rise to the relation of licensor and licensee; that the owner is not bound to furnish a sound vehicle or a safe horse, but is liable for active negligence which increases the hazard or creates a new one. Patnode v. Foote, 153 App. Div. 494, 138 N. Y. Supp. 221; Pigeon v. Lane, 80 Conn. 237, 67 Atl. 886, 11 Ann. Cas. 371; Beard v. Klusmeier, 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342; Fitzjarrell v. Boyd, 123 Md. 497, 91 Atl. 547.

In Massachusetts it is held that, while the legal relation arising between the owner of the automobile and his invited guest is that of licensor and licensee, it is also that of bailor and bailee, the nature of the bailment being that of a gratuitous mandatum, and that the owner is liable only for his acts of gross negligence. West v. Poor, 196 Mass. 183, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 936, 124 Am. St. Rep. 541, 81 N. E. 960; Massaletti v. Fitzroy, 228 Mass. 487, L. R.A.1918C, 264, 118 N. E. 168, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088, 18 N. C. C. A. 690.

A study of the cases, however, reveals a greater consensus of judicial opinion upon the degree of care which should be required of the owner of the automobile under such circumstances than is indicated by the above statement. For instance, in the states holding that the owner is liable for ordinary negligence, there is but one degree of negligence recognized. In such states the care which an individual is required to exercise under any particular circumstances is ordinary care, and a failure to exercise the care required constitutes negligence.

In the above-cited cases holding that the measure of the duty owing by the owner of the automobile is the same as that which a licensor owes to a licensee, the conduct which brought liability to the owner was rash and reckless, approaching if not constituting "gross negligence," under our definition of that term. It is to be remarked, however, that the practical application of the doctrine of those cases, that the owner is liable for his active negligence which increases the danger or creates a new one, makes him liable for acts which amount to no more than ordinary negligence. For illustration, see Lowell v. Williams, 183 App. Div. 701, 170 N. Y. Supp. 596. The doctrine of the Massachusetts cases plainly holds the owner liable only in cases of "gross negligence," as the term is understood in that state. But gross negligence, as understood in Massachusetts, comprehends a lesser degree of negligence than is included within our definition thereof.

Thus, it will be seen that the courts have held the owner liable only for a degree of negligence which approximates, but probably is less than, gross negligence, as defined by this court. This may be a just measure of responsibility to place upon the owner. But the problem which confronts us is to devise a rule which will accomplish that result. Would it be a just rule to hold the owner liable only for gross negligence as known to the jurisprudence of this state? Would this lay upon the owner a just measure of responsibility? Can the status of a gratuitous mandatory logically be imputed to one who transports human beings from place to place? Furthermore, does the rule of liability obtaining between licensor and licensee, which rule is intended to apply principally with reference to the condition of premises, establish a correct measure of responsibility with reference to the operation of an automobile? Would not that rule lead to liability for acts of ordinary negligence, and, if so, is that a just rule?

But the question of the liability of the owner of an automobile for damages resulting to his invited guest who is riding therein, by reason of his negligent management thereof, is not before us in this action and will not be decided. The foregoing discussion is indulged for the purpose of inviting the attention of the profession to the many aspects of the question which must influence the eventual determination thereof, with a view of directing their discussion into helpful channels when they shall have occasion to present that question to the court.

In this case the damage resulted from a defective spring on the automobile. Negligent operation thereof is not claimed. We can see no difference between an invitation extended by a person to dine with him and an invitation extended to ride with him. It has been held by this court that in the former case the legal relation arising was that of licensor and licensee. Greenfield v. Miller, 173 Wis. 184, 12 A.L.R. 982, 180 N. W. 834. It follows that the same relation arises in the latter case, which conclusion is supported by authorities already cited. Whether or not the established rules of liability existing between licensor and licensee are applicable in the matter of the "management" of the automobile, they plainly are applicable so far as the "condition" of the automobile is concerned. According to those rules, the guest accepts the premises of his host as he finds them, subject only to the limitation that the licensor must not set a trap, or be guilty of active negligence which contributed to the injury. Here the accident happened, as said before, because of a broken spring, and the question is: Did that constitute a "trap," within the meaning of the rule? That is the only basis upon which liability can be predicated. A "trap," within the meaning of this rule as we understand it, is a hidden danger lurking upon the premises, which may be avoided if known. Hence it is the duty of the host to advise his guest of its presence, so that the guest may enjoy the premises in a security equal to that enjoyed by the host. The guest has no right to a greater security than that enjoyed by the host or other members of his family. The host simply places the premises which he has to offer at the disposal and enjoyment of his guest upon equal terms of security.

In this case the defendant considered the automobile to be in sufficient condition to make the trip. This is evidenced by the fact that he not only intrusted his own safety thereto, but that of his wife and children as well. There can be no stronger evidence of the belief of the ordinary well-meaning man in the sufficiency of the car to safely make the trip.

So we have a situation where the owner of an automobile, who is about to make a pleasant trip, fully believing in the sufficiency of the car to do so with safety to the occupants, with the best of motives and with a view of promoting his pleasure, invites his father-in-law to ride with him, and by reason of the giving way of some part of the car the father-in-law sustains injuries. Under such circumstances, it is clear to us that the father-in-law, in accepting the invitation, took the car as he found it, was attended by the same measure of security enjoyed by the owner and the other members of his family, and that he was entitled to no more.

Were it material to the decision, we would hold that, upon the record, we find nothing which should have led the defendant to believe that the car was unsafe to make the trip, nor that he had any reason to anticipate the accident or the resulting injuries. It is true he had a repaired spring, but he had driven the car 1,500 miles after it was repaired without any indication that it was insufficient in its repaired condition for the purposes to which he devoted the car at the time in question. Besides, it was not the repaired part that gave way. It was the master leaf of the spring, which up to that time had fully performed its service. There is no evidence that the leaves supplied by the repairer did not contribute as much strength to the spring as those which were broken. It is common knowledge that the giving way of most any part of a car that has been used for upwards of five years may be expected, and this, we think, is the only knowledge with which the defendant could be charged respecting the deficient condition of the car. But knowledge of this is not sufficient to render him liable to those whom he invites to ride with him, for injuries resulting from the giving way of the various parts of the car. Furthermore, the accident was a most unusual one to result from the breaking of a spring, and, as we understand it, was due to the peculiar construction of this kind of car. The defendant testified that he did not know that the fender would engage the front wheel in case of the breaking of the front spring; and, if it were necessary to a decision of the case, the question of whether he should reasonably have anticipated the instant results from the breaking of the spring would be a serious one. However, we think neither of these latter questions is involved. We place the decision upon the ground that the owner did not fail in the performance of any duty which he owed to those whom he invited to ride with him. The consequence is that the plaintiff has no cause of action, and the complaint should have been dismissed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to dismiss the complaint.

Siebecker, Ch. J., took no part.

Automobile—injury to guest —liability.

ANNOTATION.

Automobiles: liability of owner or operator for injury to guest.

I. Injury due to negligent operation:

a. Invited guests:

1. General rule as to care in operation, 1014.
2. Minority rule, 1018.
3. Effect of statutes, 1021.

As to liability of parent for injury to child's guest by negligent operation of car, see annotation in 2 A.L.R. 900.

As to liability for injury to guest in car, see 12 A.L.R. 987.

For duty and liability of carrier of passengers for hire by automobile, see annotation in 4 A.L.R. 1499.

Scope.

The question of the liability of one driving the car, to another who is engaged in a joint enterprise with him, is not within the scope of this annotation.

In Barnett v. Levy (1919) 213 Ill. App. 129, it was held that where one alleges that he was riding in an automobile as the guest of the defendant, and seeks to recover for an injury claimed to have resulted from the defendant's negligent operation of the automobile, he must prove that he was riding as a guest, and cannot recover if it appears that the parties were engaged at the time in a joint enterprise, and that each had agreed to pay an equal part of the expense of the trip, and a case is not made out merely by proving that the plaintiff was a lawful occupant of the automobile.

In Wilmes v. Fournier (1920) 111 Misc. 9, 180 N. Y. Supp. 860, affirmed in (1920) 194 App. Div. 950, 185 N. Y. Supp. 958, the evidence was held to show that the plaintiff, at the time an injury was sustained, was riding as an invited guest in the defendant's automobile, and that the latter was liable for an injury which occurred through his negligence. It was contended that the parties were engaged in a joint enterprise, as they were on a hunting trip, but the court stated that even if this were true the defend-

I. a—continued.

4. Respondeat superior, 1021.
5. Application to facts, 1022.
- b. Guests at sufferance, 1025.
- c. Contributory negligence, 1026.

II. Injury due to condition of car, 1029.

ant would not, by reason of this, be immune from liability for his torts which resulted in any injury to the plaintiff.

I. Injury due to negligent operation.

a. Invited guests.

1. General rule as to care in operation.

The rule is established by the weight of authority that the owner or operator of an automobile owes the duty to an invited guest to exercise reasonable care in its operation, and not unreasonably to expose him to danger and injury by increasing the hazard of travel.

Alabama. — Perkins v. Galloway, (1915) 194 Ala. 265, L.R.A.1916E, 1190, 69 So. 875, second appeal in (1917) 198 Ala. 658, 73 So. 956; McGeever v. O'Byrne (1919) 203 Ala. 266, 82 So. 508.

California. — Spring v. McCabe (1921) — Cal. App. —, 200 Pac. 41.

Illinois. — Barnett v. Levy (1919) 213 Ill. App. 129; Masten v. Cousins (1919) 216 Ill. App. 268.

Kentucky. — Beard v. Klusmeier (1914) 158 Ky. 153, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1100, 164 S. W. 319, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 342.

Maryland. — Fitzjarrell v. Boyd (1914) 123 Md. 497, 91 Atl. 547.

Nebraska. — Bauer v. Griess (1920) 105 Neb. 381, 181 N. W. 156.

New Jersey. — MacKenzie v. Oakley (1920) 94 N. J. L. 66, 108 Atl. 771.

Tennessee. — Tennessee C. R. Co. v. Vanhoy (1920) 143 Tenn. 312, 226 S. W. 225.

The court in Perkins v. Galloway (1915) 194 Ala. 265, L.R.A.1916E, 1190, 69 So. 875, said: "The express or implied duty of the owner and driver to the occupant of the car is to exercise reasonable care in its operation not to unreasonably expose to danger and injury the occupant, by increasing the hazard of that method of travel. He must exercise the care and diligence which a man of reasonable prudence, engaged in like business, would exercise for his own protection and the protection of his family and property—a care which must be reasonably commensurate with the nature and hazards attending this particular mode of travel. Reaves v. Maybank (1915) 193 Ala. 614, 69 So. 137. Failing in this duty, he will be liable to the occupant or guest in the car for injuries the result of such carelessness or lack of diligence.”

On the second appeal of the Perkins Case in (1917) 198 Ala. 658, 73 So. 956, the court said: “It does seem to be a harsh or hard rule which makes the carrier or host liable to the passenger or guest as for injury or death, in the absence of gross negligence or wantonness, especially when the passenger or guest is treated by the carrier or host just as the latter himself is treated, and when both are injured by the same accident, as in this case. If this be so, the reply is: The law is so written, and cannot and should not be changed to meet hard cases; such instability would make shipwreck of the law. The liability of the owner of an automobile to a guest riding for pleasure only was recognized, but not decided, in the case of Powers v. Williamson (1915) 189 Ala. 600, 66 So. 585. That decision, however, went off on the ground that the owner of the machine was not in that case liable for the negligence of his son, who was operating the car; that is, that the doctrine of respondeat superior did not apply in that case. It is, however, a necessary conclusion that the owner would have been held liable in that case had the son been held to be the agent of his father, the defendant, or had the father, who was the owner, been operating the machine and been guilty of negligence proximately contributing to the injury. It is very true that it has been held that a gratuitous carrier of goods, like a gratuitous bailee of goods, is not liable to the owner of the goods in the absence of gross negligence. This distinction is well pointed out by Mr. Hutchinson (Carriers, vol. 2, § 1022, p. 1179), who says: ‘This, it will be observed, is different from the well-settled rule in regard to the gratuitous carriage of goods, which, as has been seen, does not impose upon the common carrier the same degree of responsibility as when the carriage is for compensation; and this illustrates the different light in which the two kinds of business are viewed by the law. The carrier of goods becomes an insurer of their safety only when he is paid to become so; but the carrier of the passenger is bound to the utmost care and caution, whether paid by the passenger or not; and this distinction is based upon wholly different reasons of public policy, being, in the one case, the value which it puts upon human life and personal safety, and, in the other, the necessity of preventing frauds and combinations to the “undoing of all persons” who may have dealings of that kind with the carrier. This distinction between the gratuitous bailment of goods to the carrier and the gratuitous carriage of the passenger is, upon this ground, well established, and in the latter case the carrier’s liability is the same as when he is paid for the carriage.’” In this case, although the guest was not invited to ride by the defendant, but by another person who was in the car, it was held that, as the defendant knew of the guest’s presence in the car, the duty not to injure him was the same as if he had expressly invited him to ride.

And in Cates v. Hall (1916) 171 N. C. 360, 88 S. E. 524, where there was conflicting evidence whether the plaintiff was riding in the defendant’s automobile as a passenger for hire, or merely as a guest, it was held that in either event the defendant owed him the duty to exercise that care which a prudent man should use under the circumstances. The court said: “And on the question more directly involved in the appeal, the decided cases here and elsewhere are to the effect that the distinction as to the liability of carriers in cases of passengers for hire, and those carried gratuitously, does not prevail as in the cases of common carriers of goods, but the same degree of care is exacted in the one case as the other. McNeill v. Durnham & C. R. Co. (1904) 135 N. C. 682, 67 L.R.A. 230, 47 S. E. 765; Benner Livery & Undertaking Co. v. Busson (1895) 58 Ill. App. 17; Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Klentschy (1906) 167 Ind. 598, 79 N. E. 908, 10 Ann. Cas. 869; Lemon v. Chanslor (1878) 68 Mo. 340, 30 Am. Rep. 799; Gillenwater v. Madison & I. R. Co. (1854) 5 Ind. 339, 61 Am. Dec. 101; Hale, Bailm. p. 497; 6 Cyc. 544. In McNeill's Case the court cites with approval from Lemon v. Chanslor the statement of the position as follows: "This, we think, was sufficient to authorize the instruction. The principle announced in it that, although plaintiff might have been a gratuitous passenger, such fact constituted no defense, is supported by all the authorities which have come under our observation. While in some of them intimations are made that in the case of a gratuitous passenger the carrier may only be liable for gross negligence, it has not been held in any of them that such fact will exempt the carrier from all liability. On the contrary, the weight of authority favors the doctrine of holding the carrier of passengers to the same degree of diligence in all cases where one has been received as a passenger, on the principle that "if a man undertakes to do a thing to the best of his skill, when his situation or profession is such as to imply skill, omission of that skill is imputable to him as gross negligence." In Indianapolis Traction & Terminal Co. v. Klentschy (1906) 167 Ind. 598, 79 N. E. 908, 10 Ann. Cas. 869, supra, it was held: "Carriers are liable to passengers for negligence resulting in damages, though the carriage is "gratuitous," and further, "When an officer of a street railway company, on behalf of such company, invited a visiting order, composed of women of whom plaintiff was one, to take a free trolley ride in one of such company's cars, the acceptance of such invitation by taking passage on the car constituted the plaintiff a passenger." In Hale on Bailments, p. 497, the author states the position as follows: "In one respect there is a striking difference between the liability of common carriers for goods and the liability of public carriers of passengers for injuries to a passenger. As has been seen, where goods are carried gratuitously the carrier is not regarded as a common carrier, but is simply a private carrier, and liable, as a mandatary, only for gross negligence. But in respect to public carriers of passengers, public policy has imposed an entirely different rule. Even though such passengers are carried gratuitously, if they have been accepted by the carrier as passengers, all the extraordinary liabilities of the relation attach. Having admitted him to the rights of a passenger, the carrier is not permitted to deny that he owes to him the duty which, as carrying on a public employment, he owes to those who have paid him for the service." Applying the principle, we are of opinion that whether plaintiff hired the car from one of the partners, or whether he was riding in a car which was donated by the partnership for free service, and was being operated at the time by one of the partners in pursuance of this arrangement, in either event he was to be considered a passenger, and is entitled to have his rights determined in that view of the case; and, as stated, it constituted reversible error to make the question of a contract for hire conclusive on the subject."

And in Avery v. Thompson (1918) 117 Me. 120, L.R.A.1918D, 205, 103 Atl. 4, it was held that the operator of an automobile who has voluntarily undertaken to transport a guest is required to exercise that degree of care which would seem reasonable and proper from the character of the thing undertaken. The court said: "In order to determine whether these verdicts are so manifestly contrary to the law and the evidence that they should be set aside by this court, it is necessary to ascertain, in the first instance, the measure of duty which Mr. Thompson, the inviter and the host, owed to Mrs. Avery, the invitee and guest, under the circumstances of this case; in other words, the degree of care which he was in law bound to exercise for her protection and safety during this gratuitous transportation. We should first inquire what was the legal relation existing between the parties. Ordinarily, in personal actions, the duty which is violated is one of two kinds. Either it is one imposed upon the defendant equally with all the world and independent of any act or violation on his part, as, for instance, the duty of a driver of an automobile toward other travelers on the highway; or it may arise out of contract, either under seal or given for good consideration in consequence of which the defendant has assumed a correlative duty, an illustration of which is the carriage of persons or property for hire. There is, however, a third way in which a legal duty may arise, and that is from a gratuitous undertaking on the part of the defendant—a duty voluntarily assumed without consideration, and a duty owed to the plaintiff alone because of the peculiar relations of the parties. The most common instance of this third classification is a gratuitous bailment. Within this zone, independent of either contract or tort in its larger sense, falls the defendant's duty, and therefore the plaintiff's right in the case at bar. The defendant (using this term for the sake of convenience) had entered into no contract with the plaintiff by the terms of which he had agreed to carry her safely from Friendship to Thomaston and return, nor was he obliged to invite her into his car to become his guest. He voluntarily undertook to transport her on this pleasure trip, and his liability wholly grew out of this voluntary undertaking, and was commensurate with the duty so assumed by him. The next inquiry is this: To what degree of care and exertion should he be held under these circumstances? Was he bound to convey her safely as a common carrier? Clearly not. Was he liable for injuries resulting from what has often been termed ordinary negligence; that is, a failure to exercise the care of an ordinarily prudent person in the same situation? Or should he be held bound to exercise only a slight degree of care, and be liable only in case of reckless and wilful misconduct—what has been often characterized as gross negligence? There has been much controversy over the use of phrases expressing different degrees of negligence, as 'slight,' 'ordinary,' and 'gross,' but it seems to be largely a matter of terminology, and the later decisions, while for the most part rejecting the arbitrary distinctions, acknowledge the existence of conditions that increase or diminish the degree of care to be exercised. In Raymond v. Portland R. Co. (1905) 100 Me. 529, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 94, 62 Atl. 602, this court said: 'It will be here observed that the courts, in discussing the above propositions, have used the term "negligence" instead of the word "care," to express the measure of duty. But confusion has arisen from regarding "negligence" as a positive instead of a negative word. For this reason it is usual to express the duty owed in positive terms, by stating what constitutes due care, rather than in negative terms, by stating what constitutes negligence, which is the unintentional failure to perform a duty implied by law. "Negligence" is the opposite of "due care." Where due care is found, there is no negligence. If there is a want of due care then there is negligence. We are inclined to agree with the great weight of judicial opinion that the attempt to divide negligence, or its opposite, due care, into degrees, will often lead to confusion and uncertainty. It seems to us, therefore, that the measure of duty owed by persons in the discharge of their mutual relations would be better expressed by the use of the term "negligence," if one prefers a negative definition, or "due," "reasonable," or "ordinary care," always having reference to the circumstances and conditions with regard to which the terms are used.' On the other hand, the Massachusetts court, in its latest discussions of the subject, closes an elaborate analysis of the authorities with the words: 'We are of opinion . . . that, in this commonwealth at any rate, degrees of negligence are known to the law.' Massaletti v. Fitzroy (1917) 228 Mass. 487, L.R.A.1918C, 264, 118 N. E. 168, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088, 18 N. C. C. A. 690. Notwithstanding these antagonistic statements as to definition, we doubt not that the two courts, from a given state of facts, would be apt to reach the same conclusion as to liability. The difference is more verbal than real. . . . The language is different in these two opinions, but the essential elements of the self-implied duty undoubtedly remain the same. Adopting, then, the modern method of statement, we think that the true rule of liability on the part of a voluntary undertaker should be this, that he be required to exercise that degree of care and caution which would seem reasonable and proper from the character of the thing undertaken." And, after examining the cases on the question before them, it was further said: "The foregoing decisions give expression in varying forms to substantially the same fundamental principle, and lead to the same essential inquiry, viz., Did the defendant exercise toward his invited guest that degree of care and diligence which would seem reasonable and proper from the character of the thing undertaken? The thing undertaken was the transportation of the guest in the defendant's automobile. The act itself involved some danger, because the instrumentality is commonly known to be a machine of tremendous power, high speed, and quick action. All these elements may be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the guest when she accepted the invitation. In a sense she may be said to have assumed risks ordinarily arising from these elements, provided the machine is controlled and managed by a reasonably prudent man, who will not, by his own want of due care, increase their danger or subject the guest to a newly created danger.

In other words, we conceive the true rule to be that the gratuitous undertaker shall be mindful of the life and limb of his guest, and shall not unreasonably expose her to additional peril. This would seem to be a sane, sound, and workable rule—one consistent with established legal principles and just to both parties. It leaves the determination of the issue to the jury as a question of fact."

And in Fitzjarrell v. Boyd (1914) 123 Md? 497, 91 Atl. 547, it was contended that an invited guest could recover from the owner of an automobile only if the injury resulted from the gross or wilful negligence of the owner, but the court refused to adopt this view, and held that the owner owed his invited guest the duty to use ordinary care not to increase the guest's danger, or to create any new danger, and that a recovery might be had for an injury to the guest, caused by an attempt, against the latter's protest, to pass another vehicle, by reason of which the car skidded and overturned.

And in Atwell v. Winkler (1921) 196 App. Div. 946, 188 N. Y. Supp. 158, it was held that one having a friendly, gratuitous ride is entitled to the exercise of proper care by the driver of an automobile, and is entitled to recover from the latter for an injury resulting from a failure to use such care.

And in Karavias v. Gallinocos (1917) 143 L. T. Jo. (Eng.) 237, where the defendant had invited the plaintiff to ride in his motor car, and the latter had sustained an injury, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, the jury having found that the defendant had failed to exercise reasonable care, but that he was not guilty of gross negligence. The court, however, expressed some doubt upon the question involved, and stated that it was a fit question to be taken to the court of appeals, whether in such a case it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove gross negligence in order to recover.

2. Minority rule.

In some jurisdictions it is held that gross negligence must be shown in order to hold the owner or operator of an automobile liable for an injury to an invited guest. (See, however, the remarks by the court in Avery v. Thompson (1918) 117 Me. 120, L.R.A. 1918D, 205, 103 Atl. 4, set out supra, I. a, 1, where an attempt is made partially, at least, to reconcile the decisions.)

Thus, in Massaletti v. Fitzroy (1917) 228 Mass. 487, L.R.A. 1918C, 264, 118 N. E. 168, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 1088, 18 N. C. C. A. 690, it was decided that one inviting another to ride gratuitously in his automobile is not, in the absence of gross negligence, liable for injury to him by the overturning of the car through the negligence of the chauffeur. The court in this case goes a great length to show that the different degrees of negligence still obtain in Massachusetts, and after reviewing the decisions it was said in conclusion: "Approaching the question apart from authority, we are led to the same conclusion. Justice requires that the one who undertakes to perform a duty gratuitously should not be under the same measure of obligation as one who enters upon the same undertaking for pay. There is an inherent difficulty in stating the difference between the measure of duty which is assumed in the two cases. But justice requires that, to make out liability in case of a gratuitous undertaking, the plaintiff ought to prove a materially greater degree of negligence than he has to prove where the defendant is to be paid for doing the same thing. It is a distinction which seventy-five years' practice in this commonwealth has shown is not too indefinite a one to be drawn by the judge and acted upon by the jury."

And in Eppe v. Parrish (1921) 26 Ga. App. 399, 106 S. E. 297, where it was alleged that the plaintiff was riding as an invited guest in an automobile owned and driven by the defendant, and that the latter carelessly and negligently, and because of inexperience and lack of skill in the handling of the automobile, lost control of it and drove it head on into a tree, by reason

